How the Colonel was Told.

A Tale of Guy Faux Day.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"Is it really so bad, Lancelot?"

"It most certainly is," answered Lancelot Marstone, captain in a crack cavalry regiment, tugging vindictively at a long, drooping, blonde moustache; "I should imagine things are coming to a crisis. There, I am not sure about that being anything," with calm philosophy; "they have developed a tendency in that direction for the past two years."

Rising from his chair, the speaker walked to the window and gazed moodily forth. There was but scant comfort to be derived from outside. Evening was closing in with fog, and darkness was brooding heavily over London. A wretched October, dull and cheerless throughout its course, was bewailing its approaching end in sobbing gusts of wind and driving rain, and suppressing a sigh, at variance with his careless words, the young man resumed his seat. The firelight, flickering on his set features, fell on easels and plaster-casts, on sketches littered about, and pictures in various stages of completion—on all the thousand-and-one accessories of an artist's studio, and on a grave face steadfastly regarding him, the said face and artistic properties appertaining to his friend, Cameron Gray.

"Something must be done," he resumed after a pause, in which the two men had smoked in silence.

"Then, don't you think," said the other earnestly, "it would be better to tell your father of your marriage?"

"Oh yes," with a hard laugh; "Colonel Marstone will be charmed to know that his eldest son is secretly wedded to the governess. What have I to do with love and romance?" he went on bitterly. "I have my debts, and I am sure they are enough. I ought to have gone in for the wealthy marriage my respected parent cut out for me, and caused joy in the tribe of Judah. Offered myself a lamb upon the Hebraical altar, in fact, dear boy."

"Lancelot, for her—your wife's sake, you do not repent?"

"Repent! no, indeed. I am not sure that it was wise in her to link her fortunes with mine. But I would marry my love again to-morrow—aye, a thousand times; only," smiling sadly, "it would make sad inroads on a limited income, or, to speak correctly, no income at all."

Another pause, and a deal of smoke puffed forth in lieu of words, then Captain Marstone spoke again.

"Look here, old man," in jesting tones which yet bore a spice of earnestness, "I have an inspiration—a plan to retrieve my fading fortunes. I am going to sojourn under the paternal roof-tree for a few days—change of air and scene are really necessary for my health; I am weary of the same duns' features; in fact, the Semitic type grows monotonous; and I long for my darling's face. You shall come with me, make love to and marry my father's ward, and then you can rely on my drawing on you to any amount."

"I am willing to help you if I can, Lancelot, without that."

"I know it, old friend, and thank you; but I am in too deeply for your small savings to do any good. Do not look so grave, Cameron; I was but joking. You would not marry for the shakels more than we did, and our united fortunes, after we had fed the reverend gentleman who made us one, and his clerk, an elderly individual with weak knees, who gave away the bride, amounted to eleven pounds nineteen and some odd coppers. But, seriously, Gertrude Trent is a dear girl; awfully rich, and you might do worse."

"Heiresses do not throw themselves away on poor struggling—"

"And not too clever painters," supplied Captain Marstone.

"Even if they did," pursued the artist, not heeding the interruption, "even if they did—!" And a sigh finished Cameron Gray's words.

"Ah, I understand," said the other. "I had forgotten for the moment, or, rather, hoped you had. You love another, as they say in the novels, and it is an unfortunate attribute, as usual, with that other, to be out of reach. Forgive me; I have no right to banter on such a subject, but, like the ancient philosophical party, I jest at everything to avoid tears. You are still faithful to that dream, Cameron?"

"Aye, and shall be ever," rejoined the artist. "You do well to term it so. It is a dream—no more. I know it, and yet, although I have schooled myself to the knowledge—sometimes, when the thought of what might be, wild and visionary as it all is, comes to me, I hunger for talent and fame—I long for—Pooh! I am talking nonsense," and the artist checked himself abruptly. "Talking nonsense and boring you. A dream! Half-a-dozen words in the galleries of Rome, two or three meetings by the Devonshire streams, and then—and then—"

"The unwarranted interference of an elderly unsympathetic gentleman, the lady's father, probably," supplied his friend, "who, with a few words, hardly of a friendly nature, spirited her away."

"Well that he did," said Cameron. "I know not whither my mad presumption might have led me else. I never even learned her name. She was unknown to me, as I am to the world—an obscure artist, unrecognised and poor."

"Which brings me to my mission here this evening, forgotten in the egotism of my own woes. This," extending a letter, "is from my Aunt Doolan, an elderly spinster. She lives with the pater—in fact, rules him and all the household, Gertrude included—has heard me speak of my friend, the rising artist, and longs for his presence."

"Jesting still, Lancelot?"

"I assure you, no. Miss Janet Doolan is quite too too utterly enthusiastic on the subject of art, blue-and-white china, and aestheticism in general. She will not tolerate anything in the crockery line which is not cracked, and fills the house with battered old stewpans and snuffer-trays, much to the colonel's disgust. So she takes the opportunity of his absence—for his old military habits are always urging him to kill something, and he is in Scotland, slaughtering deer or something—to have the picture-gallery overhauled, and our glazed and painted ancestors washed and combed and done up. But read for yourself."

Cameron Gray took the letter, but, reading, a shadow of annoyance crossed his face.

"You should not have done this, Lancelot. Your aunt evidently expects an R.A. at least. Besides, I do not profess figure-painting."

"Then I had better, my dear boy," answered the other with unruffled composure, "tell you candidly that Aunt Doolan cares not for landscape-work, but worships high art, and knows nothing of either. Away with all such modest scruples! Talk the customary jargon, and it will be all right."

"I do not like the idea," said the artist.

"Never mind, you will like to see my old home amidst the Welsh hills. It will be money in your pocket, and I will borrow some. Have faith in your own powers, and touch up the family portraits. As a matter of fact, they are so brown and ugly that, if you cannot improve them, you cannot make them worse. No more objections. We leave here the day after to-morrow."

Ere the artist could say more, Captain Marstone departed, humming a light air, as if pecuniary troubles were unknown things.

"Farewell!" he cried; "farewell until then! And so for the first step of Fame's ladder, with the helping hand of Aunt Doolan!"

But, left alone, Cameron Gray did not look quite like a man about to commence that pleasing ascent. It was his turn now to pull reflectively at a moustache—by no means a very handsome one—not to compare, more than his own somewhat homely features, with the fine points of his friend.

Yet both were well-born. But with the one, there it ended. Left an orphan, even in childhood Cameron Gray, on the smallest patrimony, had had to fight the world, and, as yet unknown, was fighting it still.

CHAPTER II.

A WRETCHED little station, on a wretched Welsh line, a mere shed, in fact, with the painted name of Pont Ennys, or rather as much as the weather had left of it, referring to an invisible, and, probably, by the foresight of a kindly board of directors, far distant township. No sign of life about save "three single gentlemen rolled into one," in the form of the station-master, clerk, and porter, unable to sufficiently abase himself before the squire's eldest-born and his friend, Mr. Gray.

"I am very sorry, indeed to goodness, sir, I am, but there is not any one come from Plas Ennys. I do ask your pardon, sir."

"No fault of yours, Evans," said Captain Marstone good-naturedly. "We might walk, it is only three miles; but our traps?"

"Could I carry them for you, sir?"

"I think you might, Evans," and the captain glanced from the undersized official to three or four portmanteaux; "you might if we carried you."

"Why so much luggage, Lancelot, for a few days?" enquired the artist.

The other smiled, the smile of superior wisdom.

"When you are a married man you will know. These are a few commissions from my wife. Should the dear old governor return in time, I am trusting to the chapter of accidents, with your aid, to make my peace. Nothing like appearances, and I have there, for my darling, the most swell turn-out that Bond Street can do. I don't understand much about packing ladies' finery, so there's the dress in one, and the bonnet, all by itself, in another. But really this is awkward."

"You wrote that we were coming?"

"Assuredly. But I did not tell them the train would be punctual," looking at his watch, "and that accounts for it. Here they are at last," as a carriage came in view, "or rather here is my own," and a proud, happy light was in Lancelot's eyes as they rested on his bride of a few weeks. "Alone, too. I expect Gertrude could not tear herself away from some dear old cottager's toothache or rheumatism, and will be picked up as we drive home."

It was a cold greeting in appearance between these two, but the eyes of the world, as represented by the coachman and station-master, were on them. Yet, as he presented his companion with a staid "Miss Winton—Mr. Gray," Captain Marstone whispered: "Old friend, this is my wife. Nay, Kate, do not blush, it is good for me to be able to breathe the word to some one;" but she did blush all the same, and looked very pretty in her confusion.

Kate Winton, or rather Mrs. Lancelot Marstone, could scarcely have touched her twenty-fifth year, and was indeed "fair to look upon." Not perhaps the loveliest woman in the world, but yet a good excuse for his friend's disobedience, so decided Cameron as Mr. Evans performed prodigies of strength with the luggage, and they took their places.

"Where is Gertrude?" cried Lancelot as they rolled off. "Is it Widow Jones or Widow Hughes to-day, Rhys Rhys, with his lumbago and doubts of the Pentateuch, or Mrs. Williams and her countless brats?"

"Neither," answered his wife. "You are wrong for once, Captain Marstone," with a smile for the formal word. "What a wonderful memory you display. Are you not surprised, Mr. Gray?"

"Not at all," was the gallant rejoinder, with a bow. "I can understand no one connected with Pont Ennys being ever forgotten."

"Very pretty indeed," laughed the captain; "you are developing wonderfully, dear boy. You must know, Kate, he is a perfect Timon at home, in order to appreciate him to the full. At this rate he will take Aunt Doolan by storm, and heal up the sorrows of some love-passages which rent her heart a few centuries since. But again, where is Gertrude? and how is she?"

"A headache deprived me of her company. She does not complain, and insists that there is nothing amiss; but I am sure she is not so light-hearted as formerly, nor does she go about as much as she used to."

"I am sorry for that," said the captain musingly, "so are all the goodies and old cronies of the place, I'll wager. Gertrude cannot be in love—I know the symptoms—there is an utter dearth of material. Our butler is not bad-looking, certainly, and there's the Rev. Baxter, only there's no romance about a fellow of twenty-five without a single hair on his head. Aunt Doolan esteems him for it. If you don't wear your hair on your shoulders, the next best thing is to have none. And how is my aunt—crazy as ever?"

"Lancelot, don't," with a reproving glance. "Miss Doolan is more favourably disposed to us all, I think. She is looking forward to a perfect feast of art with you, Mr. Gray."

"I trust not," said Cameron earnestly. "Lancelot, you should not have done this. I am a very mediocre painter indeed, Mrs. Marstone, and must undeceive Miss Doolan."

"And get turned out as an impostor for your pains," laughed his friend. "But behold the lodge in the distance. Prepare for a stately entrance. Aunt has thoughts of a mediæval trumpet for visitors to 'toot, toot' on, or an ancient 'turling pin.'"

They drove up to an old mansion of square formal architecture, dating back to the Tudor age, and standing on the terrace to welcome them was Aunt Doolan herself, in æsthetic garments, almost of the same period. At any other time the artist might have smiled at the quaint eccentricity of a rustling skirt, well-nigh stiff enough to stand alone, brocaded with immense flowers; shoes with enormous buckles; and a prodigious starched ruff. But, in truth, he hardly saw Miss Doolan, hardly heeded her welcoming words, for beside her was another, fairer form—a girl shrinking back, with a bright, shy flush upon her face. His own name sounded as if it were breathed by someone a long way off—then the name of Miss Trent, and lo! there was his dream a reality once again.

There before him were each line and feature blossoming into the beauty of early womanhood; the exquisitely refined face, framed in sunny golden hair, so well remembered in the Roman galleries; there were the violet eyes he had seen lighting up with a deeper beauty in admiration of the woods and streams of Devon; the same musical voice—he had only heard it so few times!—and it was murmuring something in response to his own incoherent sentences.

Frankly Gertrude Trent stretched forth her hand, and taking it the artist stammered:

"I have had the honour of meeting Miss Trent before, although unfortunate in remaining a stranger. I am not presumptuous enough to hope for remembrance, myself equally unknown."

"Not quite, Mr. Gray; I found out your name, that is," with a brighter blush, "I chanced to learn—I mean I heard——"

"Of course you did," broke in Captain Marstone, and Gertrude looked grateful. "Who has not heard of Cameron Gray, the swell painter—the rising man of the day? He is the great authority, I assure you, in town, and might be President of the Royal Academy, but for his native modesty."

"May I?" and ere he knew what was coming, Aunt Doolan bowed over his hand, lightly touching it with her lips. "It is my homage to true genius, and someone has said it is ever modest."

"My dear madam," cried Cameron in confusion, "you overrate my poor talents indeed."

"Not at all," cried his friend. "Do not listen to him, aunt. You wait a bit—wait until he talks about the Venetian school, and the Renaissance. Hear him contrast the styles of the old masters, the young masters, and the middle-aged masters. Listen to breadth and depth, chiaroscuro, and all the rest of it. And as for old china, ah," with a sigh of admiration, "there's a man!"

"Oh, how glad I am!" said Aunt Doolan. "I long, Mr. Gray, to show you my own poor collection. A humble devotee of the beautiful from afar off, I have worshipped art, and—Alas! there are those abominable children again! Since their father left us, this sort of thing has been going on daily, and it shatters my nerves."

Miss Doolan's complaint was not unreasonable. Her speech had been interrupted by a loud explosion, which made the windows rattle, and amidst a chorus of exulting cries, three or four children, the result of the colonel's second marriage, came trooping in.

"I am so sorry," cried the eldest, a lad of about ten or twelve, "so sorry——"

"So you ought to be," interrupted Miss Doolan severely. "It is shameful, Claude, these frights you are continually giving us."

"Frights!" echoed Claude with boyish scorn. "What is there to be frightened at in this little beauty?" which was a brass cannon, as large as he could carry. "We meant to fire a salute as they came in, but it would not go off. Here, Lancelot," holding the muzzle for the captain's inspection; "only smell; isn't it nice?"

"Thank you," laughed his brother. "I don't care for it myself."

"Then you ought to," rejoined the boy. "A soldier should love to smell powder."

"Perhaps so, young fire-eater. But I fancy this is rather a dangerous playing for you."

"Oh no, it isn't! Papa knows I have it, and we are going to have a grand time on the Fifth. We have clubbed our money, and have got a Guy Faux and no end of fireworks. We are building an awful bonfire, and——"

"A great deal which, excuse me, I must defer hearing about. Come, Cameron, we dine in half an hour."

He linked his arm in his friend's, and as he piloted him up the wide staircase, Captain Marstone said:

"What do you think of my father's ward? Will she replace your dream?"

"Have you not guessed the truth, Lancelot?" replied the artist, and his voice was full of sorrow. "It is the dream itself—more hopeless now than ever."

The speaker's glance wandered to the hall they had left, where the waning light fell through stained glass on armorial bearings and carved oak, on weapons and banners, trophies of war and the chase, on choice plants, and all the evidences of wealth and luxury.

"As far from me," he sighed, "as if we dwelt in other worlds, as, indeed, we do. Let me return to mine to-morrow—at once. I dare not stay here, Lancelot. I know not whither my infatuation may lead me."

There was no romance about Captain Marstone. In a very practical manner he pushed his friend into his room.

"Not if I know it," he observed calmly. "My plans are not to be upset this way. Now, hearken to the voice of the prophet. When you leave Plas Ennys it will be as the accepted suitor of Gertrude Trent. Tush, man! have you no eyes?"

CHAPTER III.

MR. GRAY did not return on the morrow. To the young man, usually so calm, so self-possessed, there came a great change, and for the moment he seemed to yield himself to the fascination of the hour. He cared not to think of the future. He only knew how delightful it was to be under the same roof with Gertrude—to be near her—and the happy days in his prosaic life had been so few!

Yet it was rare that they were ever together alone, though in such times the girl's shy confusion, her hesitating speech, and mantling blush might have whispered hope to one better read in woman's ways.

Rarely alone. In fact, Aunt Doolan took possession of the artist, and, installed amidst the family portraits, watched him engaged in carrying out sundry suggestions and improvements of her own, many of which, but for his skill, had been ludicrous. The old lady had conceived an immense affection for Cameron. In reality, perhaps, but more likely in imagination, he had recalled the dream of early days, for she had decided that he was the presentment of a young subaltern in the East Indies—the one tender episode of her life. She wore his miniature in a brooch, but only herself could trace Cameron's resemblance to a young man in the Company's uniform, the entire colour of whose vacuous face seemed centred in his nose, and who had died of a broken heart, or else too intense devotion to ardent spirits.

Miss Doolan—she had wearied everybody else long ago—loved to dwell upon this. Cameron had been taken into her confidence, and listened with a tender sympathy, which won her still more. In truth, if Gertrude would only be near, he would have been well content to listen to the dullest of "Harvey's Meditations," or the most repulsive chapters of "Foxe's Martyrs." But not so Captain Marstone. Free and careless as ever, he came rushing in upon Gertrude's silence, Aunt Doolan's reminiscences, and the artist's work.

"Now then, old man, away with all this," feigning a dash at the painter's palette. "Does not the true artist seek Nature? Here you stay, cooped up for a week amongst these dead and gone old duffers—"

"My dear boy," this from his aunt, "is this becoming to our ancestors?"

"Yes," quite unabashed, "yes, if they conspire to keep us in with such weather. We do not get many Welsh days like this, and in November too. Here you are," with a meaning glance, which brought a flush to the faces of Gertrude and Mr. Gray, "as pale as a couple of love-sick babes in the wood. Come forth and breathe the mountain air. I have arranged it. I have given the children a holiday to complete their arrangements for a grand flare-up on this the anniversary of the immortal Guy, and we are all going for a walk."

"There is not very much time for you," put in Aunt Doolan. "We dine a little earlier this evening, as the children insist on our seeing their bonfire lighted. Where do you propose taking Mr. Gray?"

"To the most interesting spot in the Principality," laughed her nephew. "Right over Moel Dhu, to the Lover's Leap."

"Is there such a place here?" and Cameron tried hard to speak carelessly.

"Of course there is. Are we to have lofty rocks and not their usual tales? You may have heard the quite original tradition in connection with the forget-me-not, the edelweiss, and half-a-dozen other things. In this case it was the button of the lady's glove, or something as valuable. At all events, the devoted one went down, and, of course, in the interests of the narrative, did not come up. If you are very good, I dare say Miss Trent will send something down for you."

"How can you be so absurd, Lancelot?" But the girl's eyes were averted, as she hurried away for her walking attire.

It was in the nature of things that they should be together, for the mountain-path which they sought was only wide enough for two, and the squire's son was by his wife's side. Gertrude spoke but little. Possibly the captain's light words had stirred her strangely, but she was very reserved. And all accustomed as she was to the Welsh hills, her pulses were bounding wildly. The road—it was little more than a track—led under the crest of the mountain; but as they ascended the grassy slope, bordering a torrent dashing below, grew steeper. The herbage disappeared, and only a few scattered ferns, withering before approaching winter, peeped here and there amidst the rocks. Next came a treacherous stretch of loose stone, and then the pass finished on a broad plateau where the rocks in a sheer precipice frowned over a deep sullen little lake.

"This is the spot, Cameron," and his friend's hand pointed downwards to the dark water. "Here, they say, a Welsh chieftain's daughter, I know not how many centuries ago, tested the devotion of one who dared to love her. He was only a poor man, what we should term a 'bad look out' in these days."

"And his fate?"

"Goes without saying," and Captain Marstone turned to join his wife, who had drawn away. "He died like a gentleman. No man ever tried that little scramble and lived. If Miss Trent does anything of that kind, don't you be tempted."

"Perhaps it were best so," murmured Cameron Gray, "if he had loved in vain. If life had grown valueless, why not render it up in such a service?"

"Not so," Gertrude answered with assumed lightness. "Better, I think, to have gone methodically to work, and to have won the prize, if a woman so cruel was worth the winning. Now here is a place where I have always fancied the thing quite possible."

As she spoke the girl moved away lightly from stone to stone.

"Please do not be horrified, Mr. Gray. It is merely theory, not practice. I am not going down;" but she took another step or two.

"Miss Trent, I beg of you come back. It is not safe. See for yourself, the stones are loose here."

"You forget, Mr. Gray, I am used to mountain-climbing, and— Ah!"

It was only a little cry, barely audible, save to him. But he saw her face blanch with a quick fear as the treacherous foothold slipped, and she glided down the declivity, beneath the brow of which lurked certain death.

"Oh, Gertrude, my darling, my darling!" in his terror for her the words seemed to shape themselves. "Throw yourself down, cling to the rock. I am here to help you!"

Before his voice had reached her, Gertrude Trent had regained her presence of mind, and, falling on hands and knees, had stopped her downward progress.

"No, stay there," she cried; "do not peril your life for my folly."

But in an instant he was by her side. His strong hand was clutching at the rock, at the fern-roots—at anything which gave him a hold, and she was safe.

In that wild struggle the arm thrown around her had drawn the girl to him, so close that he could feel her heart beating near his, her warm breath upon his cheek. Now they stood in safety. Lancelot and his wife were hurrying to them, and slowly, reluctantly, he let her go. But ere he released her, with an uncontrollable impulse he bent his head, and his lips touched the hand yet clinging to his. She did not withdraw it. He felt it tremble in his grasp as he spoke again:

"Pardon me, Miss Trent; pardon my wild utterances. It was my heart speaking in the moment of your peril."

"I can forgive much," she whispered, "in one who risked his life for mine."

"Who would have died with you, Gertrude," he cried passionately. "Oh, darling, will you say that he may live for you?"

Gertrude Trent did not say it. She spoke no word, or it was lost in the ringing accents of Captain Marstone.

"Thank goodness you are safe!" he cried; "but don't try it again, Gertrude."

"No, never again," said Cameron with a proud, happy glance. "In future my life is devoted to standing betwixt this dear girl and any danger."

"Oh, it is that way—eh?" and the captain rang out one of his gayest laughs. "Has not the prophet distinguished himself? But enjoy yourselves, ye butterflies, whilst ye may. With the evening cometh sorrow. I suppose Aunt Doolan forgot to name it, her head being full of Rubens and Vandyke, but my revered parent is expected, possibly to-night, and it occurs to me that for some of us a rough time is coming. Shouldn't wonder if the colonel rigged up the halberds and gave us the cat all round."

CHAPTER IV.

DINNER—which had not been a very comfortable meal, by reason of repeated incursions of the juveniles, headed by Claude, to say that it was time to commence the feast of tar-barrels, and to demolish Guy Faux—was over. The ladies rose to seek a few wraps, and Aunt Doolan—it was surprising the amount of penetration possessed by that remarkable woman—came over to where Cameron was sitting, and laid her hand on his shoulder.

"I am so glad. Let me congratulate you, Mr. Gray."

"Thank you," the young man stammered, in some confusion. "You mean—that is—"

"I mean," she said, "to congratulate you on winning the love of a dear good girl. And I know no one more worthy of it."

"Hear, hear! to the aforesaid," put in the captain, draining a glass of claret. "I say, aunt, who told you?"

"Foolish boy!" and Miss Doolan's smile was pity. "Does blindness come to those who have loved and suffered? Can the heart not speak its gladness to those who have learned its language only in woe? Again I congratulate you, Mr. Gray, even as I do my brother's ward. Fortune has smiled on Gertrude in many ways, yet with no gift so noble as an honest manly heart."

Miss Doolan finished with a sigh for the departed subaltern, and her nephew broke in with:

"Just what I feel myself"—as Gertrude and the governess entered—"my sentiments exactly. So I have given my manly heart to Miss Winton. Aunt, will you be a friend to—my wife?"

"What!" cried the lady.

"Nay, you must have known this from the first," he said with adroit flattery. "A heart which has loved and suffered, as yours, dear aunt, must have read our story. I thank you for the delicacy which has kept our secret, and I implore your aid with my father. For it strikes me there is likely to be a considerable row."

As the captain finished, a glow of flame lit up the terraces outside, followed by cheers from the children.

"Strikes me," he said, "we had better join the festive scene, if only to avert mishaps. Mr. Gray and I have both been playing with fire, and burnt our fingers. Come along," taking his wife's arm.

Juveniles have an intense love of noise, and sparks, and fire. And the children of Plas Ennys were no exception. Tired of waiting, they had started the bonfire, and perched the annual victim on the top, with catherine-wheels and Roman-candles fizzing all around his throne.

"Isn't he grand?" cried Claude, aiming a bundle of squibs at long-suffering Guy Faux. "Doesn't he look lovely up there? And won't he go off directly, that's all! He is stuffed full of powder, and crackers, and things, and my cannon well loaded is in the middle of his stomach."

The fire burnt low a moment, then flared up again, and fiery missiles flew in all directions. The children shouted and huzzaed for joy, but startled, shrinking from the din, Gertrude nestled more closely to her betrothed, whilst Lancelot's bride did likewise, and amidst all the uproar, no one heard the grating of wheels on the drive, nor a firm military step upon the gravel.

"Well done, my lads; well done!"

It was the voice, or rather the roar of Colonel Marstone.

"Give it to 'em hot, boys, and— Why, what the —" In moments of strong excitement the colonel used objectionable phrases, and the fire in a brighter blaze showed him Cameron Gray's protecting arm round Gertrude's waist, and Lancelot in a similar pose with "the governess." "What does this mean?"

No one spoke. No one save the principal figure of the evening, and he responded with a roar, drowning the irate colonel's. Claude had said truly. The interior of Guy was a mass of combustibles, and the fire had reached his vitals. There was an immense explosion, which blew poor Guy limb from limb. It scattered the fire in all directions, and filled the air with whizzing fragments of the boy's cannon. Then the arm of Captain Marstone around his wife's waist, trembled an instant, and relaxed its hold. She was slipping from his grasp. He knew it. And even as, with a quick terror, the knowledge came, she was on the ground at his feet.

"Help!" he cried, but his own voice was altered and weak, as he knelt down beside her. "Help! She is dead! Oh, Kate darling! my dear wife, speak to me."

"Eh! What?" roared the old colonel. "Nonsense!" after a brief examination. "It is a mere scratch, and she has fainted. Are you gone off your head, Lancelot? Your wife indeed! What lunacy is this?"

His son looked at him in a dazed bewildered way. He pressed a weak hand to his forehead, and it came away with a dark red stain.

"It is the truth, sir. My wife before all the world. But I cannot tell you now." He reeled a little as he spoke. "I think I am hurt just a trifle myself, father. Will you give me your arm?"

When Lancelot Marstone came to himself, he was in his own room. His head was bandaged up, and many anxious faces and a doctor were beside him. The latter was speaking, but, not heeding him, the young man looked round until his glance fell on his wife, and rested there in contented love, albeit her fair face was somewhat marred by one or two patches of plaster.

"Indeed," said Dr. Jones, "he has had a narrow escape. I am glad to say he will do now. Only a hair's-breadth, and the temporal artery, you know; he might have bled to death."

"Perhaps it would have been better."

There was something of his old carelessness in the words, as Lancelot's gaze met the colonel's clouded brow.

"I have disappointed you, sir, I know, and am by no means sure that I am justified in coming to life. But this I do know—life would be valueless to me without my own sweet wife. Kiss me, dear, and then go, and if—if he will let you, kiss my father."

If he would let her! As a matter of fact, the old martinet was powerless to help it. Few could have resisted that pleading wistful glance. And the pressure of those warm lips upon his withered cheek brought back some early memories of his own youth, and touched his heart. But he could not capitulate all at once.

"I think I had a right to be consulted," with lingering sternness.

"Yes, sir, and I ask your pardon," with ready alacrity. "But I feared you would not consent, and I could not have lived without my Kate."

"The world seems turned topsy-turvy," growled the master of Plas Ennys. "Young people do just as they please nowadays, and old ones are to meet with naught but disappointments. Here I go to Scotland, and never see a single deer's antler, and come back—my sister-in-law has told me all about it—to find my son married, and my ward engaged to—to"—with anything but satisfaction—"to an artist—a man who paints pictures. I don't care for pictures."

"And I am sure my friend Cameron Gray meets your views there," put in his son with a mocking smile. "No one is expected to care for his."

"My dear colonel," and Aunt Doolan's hand sealed the "dear colonel's" lips, "Mr. Gray follows the noblest pursuit life has to offer. What are we without the refining influences of art? Is it not the one thing to reconcile us to this world of sorrows, where even our brightest joys are shadowed by tears? I have loved, I have suffered;" and Aunt Doolan's hand touched her brooch. "Let us avert such agony from these young hearts."

"Bosh!" said the unsympathetic colonel.

"And Cameron is going to paint a grand historical picture," said Lancelot. "It will represent two happy couples—the happiest in all the world—and standing over them, like their guardian angel, Colonel Marstone, bestowing his forgiveness and a blessing. Further, the artist will infuse into the face of the principal figure a fixed intention of paying his son's debts, and——"

"Bosh!" roared the colonel again, as abruptly he left them.

No, he was not quite gone. The old soldier came back and kissed Cameron's betrothed and his son's wife, and went without a word.

They knew the victory was won then.

"And I rather think," observed Lancelot, "that we have pulled through pretty well. He took his change out of this nasty cut. Still, Guy Faux has certainly helped us in telling the colonel."

My Maiden's Smile.

WITH a smile upon her features
I met her first of all,
As in gay and graceful measure
She tripped adown the hall;
And as I looked upon her,
Love stole atwixt us twain;
And coyly, coyly blushing,
She looked, and smiled again.

Her smile lit up my pathway;
It brightened dullest days;
It shed a golden halo
O'er all earth's dreary ways.
True, as she learned life's darker side,
More tremulously sweet
And pensive did that winning smile
Her lover's coming greet.

Then came, alas! an evening,
In springtide; coming late,
No smile was there to greet me
Behind the garden-gate.
But in her little chamber,
Where woodbine clammers fair
Athwart the opened casement,
I found her lying there.

No motion stirred her features,
Composed in snowy grace;
And not for earthly lover
That smile upon her face!
But as the earthly dawning
Stole o'er the dew-bathed sod,
Weary of earthly sunshine,
She lay in the smile of God.

His Own Guest.

(A SERIAL STORY.)

CHAPTER XXII.

It really was like old times at Meredith Court. Instead of the usual quiet, there was an infinity of bustle, people coming and going continually, messages and telegrams arriving every few minutes, and everywhere there existed the excitement which an election always brings in its train.

It was, indeed, like old times, the times of Sir Charles's grandfather, but there was no one now in the house who could remember them except old Watts. Even he did not find it easy to realise that Meredith was again striving to gain a seat in Parliament; ever since the day at Mr. Pennington's he had been in a very strange state. The excitement of meeting his beloved young master had been too much for him, and his brain, already enfeebled by his great age, seemed likely now to give way entirely. He was painfully subject to lapses of memory; he would totter about the house mumbling to himself mysteriously, then again for a time he would be himself again, and attend to his duties with his former care and exactitude.

Of course all this made Gordon excessively anxious. He was afraid that Watts might unintentionally let slip something which would arouse suspicion. No one had heard, as far as he could discover, what the old man said as he fell down in his fainting-fit, but there was every fear that Gordon's secret might be discovered through the butler's garrulity.

"I'm getting quite afraid," said Gordon to Pennington one day. "Do you think that any of the other servants have heard him mumbling?"

"No; I spoke to Watts yesterday," was the reply, "he was enjoying one of his lucid intervals, and I impressed on him that he must not mention his young master on any account. The worst of it is that now he goes about looking exactly as if he had some weighty secret on his mind."

"I must chance it," said Gordon, "but I don't mean this kind of thing to go on much longer. I've been in the house more than a week, and am no nearer my object than when I came."

"To gain an entrance here is no mean success," said Mr. Pennington.

"But I feel uncomfortable," said Gordon with a touch of testiness in his tone. "What right have I to come to a man's house and accept his hospitality, when all the time I am waiting for a chance of turning him out?"

"What right?" echoed his friend; "the best right in the world. The whole place is yours, and in accepting his hospitality you are in reality extending yours to him."

"I'm not so sure about that," returned Gordon. "How can the place belong to me when I can't claim it?"

"You will be able to do so before long, I'm sure."

"In the meantime I am standing on a volcano. If that poor old Watts lets a word slip, I'm discovered at once; if that cad of a Skooter chooses to be unpleasant, he can show at once that I am not the man I pretend to be. By Heaven, it's humiliating to the last degree!"

Mr. Pennington did not make any further attempt to pacify him. This was not the first conversation they had had on the subject since the memorable day, a fortnight ago, when Gordon made himself known.

Gordon's progress in the good-will of the inhabitants of the Court had been of the most marked character. Sir Charles trusted him to the utmost extent; and feeling that he owed his guest every possible return for his kindness in the matter of the election, he did all that lay in his power to make his visit a pleasant one. Lady Meredith was positively infatuated with him; she recognised in him a powerful and talented mind, tested by varied experiences, ready for every emergency. Lacking all her life a counsellor and friend whom she could trust, she felt singularly attracted towards a man who seemed to be as good-natured as he was experienced, and who in addition was a good friend to her son.

And she needed a friend. The election was perhaps not the greatest of her cares. Charles, in spite of his anxiety in the matter of his candidature, or perhaps because of it, had of late made his affection for Mary Ray much more visible to the world. His mother had noticed it several times during the past fortnight. She was ready to acknowledge that a great deal of the attention her son paid to Mary was expressive merely of that regard for her which he had shown from childhood. But there was something more than that visible now; and her ladyship had now on her shoulders the task of persuading her son to relinquish his intentions as regards Mary, whilst at the same time she felt that on her rested chiefly the blame in the matter.

One thing was certain—they must be rendered impossible, and at once. Lady Meredith endeavoured to acknowledge that her attempt to induce Charles to marry Miss Pennington was a failure, though were Mary out of the way, that project might be revived at some future time. She had not seen much of Edith during the past few days, though they had been under the same roof; engaged in the multifarious duties devolving on the hostess of a candidate's house, she had not enjoyed many opportunities of noting how her new friend Mr. Gordon was not often absent from Edith's side.

There was no time to be lost. Charles's behaviour to Mary in the drawing-room on the previous evening could bear but one interpretation. He was conscious that his mother was watching him, and, as if in defiance of her looks, acted towards Mary as if he had been her suitor.

Lady Meredith had been silent on the subject next day, to her son's surprise. She had her plan, and to involve herself in a conflict with Charles was not part of it.

When she had assured herself that all the gentlemen had left the house on election business, she sent for Mary, who soon joined her in her room.

Mary saw at once that something serious was about to occur. Her heart fluttered, she felt a lump rise in her throat, and she could scarcely command her voice sufficiently to ask, "You wish to see me?"

"Yes, my dear; sit down. I want to speak to you on a painful subject. Don't think I mean to be unkind."

"I should be the last to think that," said Mary; "I have had too many instances of your kindness."

"I have tried to act as a mother to you," went on Lady Meredith; "I have brought you up as if you were my own child. But now I am almost sorry you ever came to the house."

"Why do you say that? What have I done?" cried Mary excitedly.

"Calm yourself, I meant no reflection on you; it is an unfortunate affair—most unfortunate, but I do not blame you. I must speak now, before it is too late. Mary, you are in love with my son, and he fancies he loves you."

"Has he told you so?" asked Mary quickly.

"No; but his conduct compels me to think so. What have you to say?"

"Nothing," was the reply.

"Nothing?"

"No; until he tells me he loves me, which he has not yet done, I have no standpoint. When he has, it will be time enough to consider what to do."

"Mary," said Lady Meredith quickly, "this is not enough. You must promise me you will not accept him if he is mad enough to propose to you."

"Why should I promise you?" asked Mary, with a touch of disdain in her voice.

"Why? Because to me you owe everything."

"There is no need to remind me of that; when you give a beggar a sixpence you may be quite sure he thinks more of it than you do."

"Then do you think you are acting a generous part in what you are doing? If he marries you, he is ruined; you know that as well as I do. You know how the estate is impoverished, how we are straitened for lack of money; that this election will absolutely cripple us. Charles must marry a rich wife; he owes it not only to himself, but to all of us. You must promise me you will refuse him; it is for his sake I ask it—the first favour I have ever asked you."

It can easily be imagined that Mary did not hear this appeal unmoved. Lady Meredith had put succinctly that which had been in her own mind for months. She had often felt as Charles talked to her that there must come an end to her pleasant dream; that marriage between them was out of consideration. But she had always refused to consider the question of their marriage; she had no right to do so till he had spoken. Besides, the dream was so pleasant; why should she hasten the awakening, however inevitable it might be?

Now the awakening had come, and she must face facts.

Lady Meredith watched the poor girl as the tears gradually rose to her eyes. She was genuinely sorry for her, but the welfare of her son demanded that she should say what she had.

It was some time before Mary spoke. When she did her voice was steady, and she had gained the outward calm which results from a definite resolution.

"Yes, I will refuse him," she said, "if he asks me to marry him. It is for his sake I shall do it. You love your son, and you have often shown what sacrifices you can make for him. I, too, love him; I will show too that I can sacrifice myself for his sake. I will not drag him down to poverty."

"Bless you, my dear!" cried Lady Meredith, throwing her arms round her neck and kissing her. "You have lifted a load off my mind. Forgive me the pain I have caused you. I could not help it."

"I must ask you something now," said Mary. "I cannot stay here any longer; I could not live under the same roof with him, seeing him every day. Where can I go? Can you get me a place somewhere?"

"A place!" cried Lady Meredith. "You must not think of that. I have arranged all that for you; in a day or two you shall go on a visit to Lady Harker for a few weeks; she wants you to go, and will be charmed to have you. After that we shall see what can be done."

Mary silently assented, and soon afterwards went to her own room. There she was able to give way to the grief which filled her heart.

"It is cruel," she said to herself; "he will think me coquettish, a flirt, with no heart, and I must try and appear so, and never let him know I love him. Oh, if I could only let him know, I could bear the parting better!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

GORDON did not find his visit to his old home an altogether pleasant one. Leaving out of the question the fact that at any moment a bombshell might explode under his feet, he did not at all relish the position he was in.

He found, on going through the town, that the people who twenty years ago had known him as well as they knew their own children, had entirely forgotten him. This increased his security, and he was so far glad of it, but yet he could not help feeling irritated to find his personality so ignored; then he became vexed at his own unreasonableness, and wished that he had never come near the town.

The morning of Lady Meredith's interview with Mary, Gordon rose early to take a solitary ramble round the old place which had been so dear to him as a boy. He slipped out of the house and took a short cut through the grounds, which would have betrayed a suspicious knowledge of them had anybody been at hand to notice it.

"Hallo!" he mentally ejaculated as he reached the end of the lawn; "what's become of the pond? Has it been filled up?"

Apparently it had; not a sign remained of the water on which, as a child, he used to sail his boats, and even venture himself in a tub abstracted from the laundry.

Nor was this the only change. The stables were altered; the yew hedge had had its old-fashioned eccentricities of shape subdued; the disposition of the beds was altogether changed.

"I'm a stranger here," thought Gordon somewhat bitterly. "Everything is changed. The house, with its new paper and new furniture, is not like the same place, and out here it is worse. Why did I come home?"

Why, indeed? He wandered on through the fruit garden till he reached the spot where formerly stood the avenue with its colony of rooks. How well he remembered the day when his father let him understand beneath those branches that Clara Berthon might become Lady Meredith.

He started as he opened the door in the high brick wall surrounding the garden. The avenue was gone; not a tree remained.

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed, "have they come to cutting the timber? My father would sooner have sold the place than sacrificed the avenue. Poor Charlie! I expect that's his mother's doing."

Gordon did not care to pursue his ramble; he had had enough. He turned to go back to the house, wishing almost that he had never returned from America.

"Why did I come back?" he once more asked himself. But that question was driven away by another: "Why do I stay?"

There was only one answer to be made to that. He knew well enough why he lingered about Meredith Court in spite of the changed place and the false position he was in. He could not leave it unless Edith Pennington accompanied him.

Why should she not? She must have perceived that he admired her, yet she did not repel him. She was no coquette; she would not have let him say what he had said if she had intended him to say no more.

He had resolved, when first he felt her attraction growing too strong for him, that he would make no sign, give no hint of his admiration, till he had cleared his name from the stain on it. But now he began to reconsider that decision; in fact, he had already unintentionally acted contrary to it.

To begin with, there seemed no chance of proving his innocence. Was he to give up his chance of happiness because of a false accusation?

Then Edith was absolutely without suspicion as to his identity. Surely he was not bound to reveal himself unless he liked. That was a matter for her father and himself to decide. Perhaps after betrothal he might reveal himself, but not till he had had time to prove himself incapable of such a deed as that of which he was accused.

He was revolving these and other arguments in his mind when his thoughts were interrupted by the sound of firm footsteps approaching him.

"Good-morning, cap," said a voice which Gordon hated to hear. "Having a look round the old place?"

There was no one whom Gordon would not sooner have met than his old acquaintance. He merely nodded good-morning and turned towards the house.

"Nice place, isn't it?" pursued the colonel, who seemed to imagine it impossible that he could be in the way.

"Yes," answered Gordon shortly.

"Pity that Sir Charles don't know what to do with it. I'd never keep so much land lying waste around it if it were mine; and he's so short he can scarcely make both ends meet."

"I don't think Sir Charles's private affairs are any business of ours," remarked Gordon.

"I shouldn't have got on much if I hadn't poked my nose into other people's private affairs," said the colonel with a smile. "I shouldn't wonder if I get a finger in this business some day."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that I see my way to making a good offer for the place as it stands. Run a branch railway near it, let out some of these fields for building, with a little land to each house, and you'll find that plenty of people from Brightholme will come here after business; it's only a fifteen-mile run. When this election affair is over, I mean to talk to Sir Charles."

"I don't think you had better," remarked Gordon.

"Why not?"

"I don't think Sir Charles would take your offer."

"I can try, I suppose. Of course I shouldn't tell him I meant cutting up the property."

"He ought to know it, I think."

"I don't; and you won't tell him, of course?"

"Why of course?" asked Gordon.

"Because it wouldn't be very wise of you," replied the colonel meaningly. "It strikes me we both have a little game to play here. I don't ask questions about yours; you had better hold your tongue about mine."

Gordon bit his lip; he could have kicked his companion with pleasure. He resolved that it should not be long before he placed himself out of the power of this vulgar speculator.

Probably he would have made an angry retort to the colonel's last observation, but at that moment he caught sight of Edith and Mary crossing the lawn.

The colonel saw them too.

"Let's go and meet the girls," he suggested. "You aren't a very pleasant companion this morning. There's a pleasanter one coming; that little Miss Ray is a perfect little beauty."

Gordon silently acquiesced in his suggestion, and in a few minutes they joined the ladies. Naturally, Gordon paired off with Edith, leaving Mary and the colonel together.

This was not quite what Mary wished. She had not yet had her interview with Lady Meredith, and had come out this morning in the hope that Charles would join her.

However, the colonel was very well suited and did his best to improve the occasion. He had taken a strong fancy to Miss Ray since Lady Meredith had shown him so plainly that any hope of ingratiating himself with her was out of the question. He knew that Mary was poor, but he was rich enough not to let that drawback have much weight.

He tried hard to amuse and dazzle Mary by extravagant accounts of his possessions and powers; however, the only result was, that Mary was disgusted at his egotism and repelled by his outspoken admiration. She could not, however, very well be rude to him, knowing that his aid was necessary for her lover's election.

She was not aware that Lady Meredith was closely watching them from a window, nor that Charles, who had been on the point of stealing out to meet her, drew back in annoyance when he saw who was her companion.

Meanwhile, Edith and Gordon had the pleasantest of strolls till it was time to seek the house for breakfast. Perhaps the pleasantest time of a courtship is the few days before a proposal. Both feel it to be inevitable, but both have the pleasant consciousness of possessing an unavowed secret. Gordon was convinced that at last, after his knockabout life, happiness was in store for him; that, whatever might be the result of his visit home, it could not but end well as far as he was concerned, if only Edith would give him her love. And of that he now had firm hope.

Before they went in he had resolved to seek her father at the earliest opportunity. He felt that in the peculiar position in which he stood, it was his duty to speak to him first, before making any avowal.

During the afternoon news arrived of some importance. It was rumoured that Dolby, the rival candidate, contemplated resignation in view of the unexpected strength of the Meredith party. This was glad tidings to Charles, and he lost no time in seeking out Mary to share his pleasure with her.

He caught sight of her in the conservatory, and at once hastened to join her. To his surprise and annoyance he saw her glance at him and then walk hastily to the door, where Colonel Skooter was standing smoking a long cigar.

What could it mean? Charles was ignorant of the interview between his mother and Mary, so he had no choice but to explain her flight by her desire not to be seen with him openly after what had occurred the previous night.

"I can't stand this," he said to himself, as he turned disconsolately away. "I know my mother wishes me to marry a rich girl, but I must marry Mary. It's no good beating about the bush any longer. I won't be treated as a child and have a wife found for me. Why, there isn't a man on the place who can't choose his own wife, and am I to be worse off than a carter?"

He had felt considerable surprise all day that his mother had not sent for him. He knew she must have noticed his attentions to Mary on the previous evening. She was much too keen-eyed to let it escape her. Hitherto he had avoided anything like a lover's demeanour in her presence; then he had purposely assumed it.

He was walking aimlessly through the hall when he saw Lady Meredith approaching.

"Come to my room, Charles," she said; "I want to speak to you."

Charles obeyed, conscious that the deferred conversation must now take place.

"You don't look very happy, my boy," she said fondly. "Are you over-anxious about this election?"

"No, mother; everything's going as well as it can. There isn't much doubt of my return, I should think, thanks chiefly to Gordon. He's worked like a horse. What a splendid fellow he is!"

This was a subject on which Lady Meredith could cordially agree with him.

"Yes; he is the soul of good-nature. We owe him a deep debt of gratitude. But what is on your mind, Charles? You have seemed very anxious about something or other the last day or two."

Charles hesitated for a moment.

"You know what it is, mother," he said suddenly. "It's no good beating about the bush. I want to win the election, but I shan't care two straws about it unless I can win Mary as well. I love her, and have loved her ever since I can remember. You must have seen it, mother; if not before, at all events, during the last day or two."

Lady Meredith went to him and took his hand.

"My poor boy!" she murmured.

"Poor boy!" echoed Charles. "Why?"

"You will find out only too soon. You were quite right in thinking that I saw your love for Mary, and you know, too, I was grieved. You have not judged her rightly; she has misled you, I am afraid."

"Do you mean she does not love me?" asked Sir Charles incredulously.

"It is not for me to say. I will only remind you that she knows the state of your finances, and that possibly she may prefer the riches of the colonel to anything you can offer her."

"The colonel!" he exclaimed contemptuously, yet not without a touch of uneasiness.

"He is very rich," remarked Lady Meredith carelessly.

"I have had enough of this!" exclaimed Sir Charles. "I will propose to Mary to-day. I should never have postponed it so long had it not been for the fear of grieving you, mother."

"My dear boy, you know I should have preferred your marrying some one who could have helped to re-establish your position. I always thought," she added meaningly, "that you had a liking for Edith Pennington."

"So I have; I think very highly of her."

"I am sure she loves you," said his mother.

"Nonsense, mother!"

"No, it is not. Ah, if you could only marry her, you would make me happy and yourself too."

"If Mary did not exist, very likely I might fall in love with Edith; but I can't now," said Charles.

"Suppose that Mary refuses you; would you propose to Edith then?"

Sir Charles laughed. "I hope she won't refuse me," he said.

"But if she does? Will you promise in that case?"

"I'll do anything you like, mother. I'm so glad to find you don't object to my asking Mary to be my wife."

"Mind, my boy, I have your promise," said Lady Meredith as she kissed him.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"I suppose," said Mr. Pennington to Gordon after dinner, as they sat alone—"I suppose that her ladyship has no idea that you are the returned prodigal?"

"Not the slightest. We get on very well together—excellently, in fact. But she doesn't love you, I think. Why is that?"

"Because I refused to help her in the matter of your reappearance."

"I was afraid that was the reason. She shows a wonderful disposition to make me her chief adviser; she has made me the confidant of various more or less important secrets. She's going to speak to me this evening about something or other."

"About your own letter, perhaps?"

"I hope not. I wouldn't have written it had I known the state of affairs."

"What do you mean?"

"Simply this: that I've made up my mind not to do anything."

"Not to try and recover your property?"

"No; why should I? To begin with, it would stir up the unpleasant subject of that cheque. Now at present the only two people in the world who know that Tom Meredith is alive are you and old Watts. Both of you believe me innocent; so your knowledge of my existence doesn't matter to me."

"You actually think of retiring without a struggle?" asked the astonished Mr. Pennington.

"Yes; what should I gain? I am well off—rich, if you like—and from what I see, the Court would not bring much wealth to me if I got it. Then I find my brother installed, believing himself the lawful owner of everything. He is the best of fellows. I've an immense admiration for him. Why should I turn him out? I've had time to forgive my stepmother for the bad turn she played me; let her live on here and enjoy herself. Yes, I give up the fight."

"And where do you think of going?" was the natural question.

"That I have not decided on; perhaps it may not depend on me alone."

Mr. Pennington looked up enquiringly.

Gordon laid down his cigar and spoke very seriously to tell "I mean, sir, that I love Edith, and want your permission to tell her so. You say you believe me innocent; prove it by letting me marry your daughter. All my happiness depends on her answer; I don't insist on my risking a refusal by forcing me to tell her who I am yet; let me leave that till I have had a little time to show her that I am an unfortunate man, but not a bad one."

Mr. Pennington held out his hand.

"I have always trusted you, Tom. I have forgotten, and you have grown out of your youthful follies; take Edith if you will, and I hope you will find that she is not unwilling to have you. As Tom Gordon or Tom Meredith, is indifferent to me."

As Mr. Pennington finished, the coffee was brought in, and Sir Charles and the colonel lounged in from the balcony, where they had been enjoying a cigarette. A few minutes afterwards they all entered the drawing-room.

Anything was preferable to Mary to sitting near Charles, and suffering the torture of hearing him speak. The colonel placed himself near her, and Charles, repressing his jealousy, began to talk to Edith.

Lady Meredith took the first opportunity of getting Tom into a corner, and carrying on a whispered conversation.

"Mr. Gordon, you have been so kind in other matters, I am bold enough to ask one more favour from you."

"It is the best reward I could ask for anything I have been able to do," was Gordon's gallant reply.

"Thank you. My son has, I am grieved to say, formed an attachment with Miss Ray, who is utterly unsuited to be his wife, as she is poor, and Charles must marry money. I appear very mercenary to you, I'm afraid."

"I'm aware the estate is encumbered," said Tom.

"Yes, we must have money; it is a necessity. Charles must give up Mary, and marry an heiress."

"An heiress in general, or one in particular?"

"One in particular; a charming girl, besides the advantage her fortune is. He is talking with her now."

Tom started.

"Miss Pennington?"

"Yes. It is true he might reasonably have looked higher; but we must sacrifice future ambition to present necessity. She is a nice girl, is she not?"

"Oh, certainly," rejoined Tom.

"There is nothing to object to in her as a wife?"

"Nothing," acquiesced Tom. "I should be the last to think she would not make a perfect wife."

"Then will you speak to my son about it? Just a quiet hint, you know. He thinks so very highly of you; you have such influence over him, you can talk to him so much more freely than I can."

"I will certainly interest myself in the matter," said Gordon warmly, and there is no doubt he meant what he said. "A nice revelation for a man who is on the point of proposing himself!" he thought.

Lady Meredith was not sparing of her thanks, and expressed her content at having so able and willing an adviser as he had proved himself to be. Gordon waited to hear some hint about his own letter, but she did not seem inclined to let any fall.

When, a short time afterwards, some of the company made a move to the terrace, to enjoy a moonlight stroll, Gordon found himself alone by Edith's side. The opportunity was a good one. However, Edith began the conversation.

"You seemed to be having an agreeable tête-à-tête with Lady Meredith?"

"Good," thought Gordon, "there was a touch of jealousy in that. Yes," he said aloud, "we had a pleasant subject."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; you."

"I? Well?"

"We were talking of your marriage. Lady Meredith wants Sir Charles to marry you. You must forgive my answering your question. Don't you think it would be a good match?"

"For which of us?" she asked.

"For both."

"It is very kind of you to interest yourself in my affairs," replied Edith in a tone which implied that his interference was not altogether welcome.

"I can't help doing so. I only wish you could interest yourself in mine."

Edith drew herself up and looked him full in the face.

"So I do, Sir Thomas Meredith," she said in firm tones.

Gordon started in dismay.

"You know me? Has Mr. Pennington told you?"

"No; I found it out for myself. I heard what Watts said, as he fainted at our house; I had my suspicions before. But why do you look so agitated? Are you afraid I shall let your secret be known?"

"I am afraid, I confess; but not of that. You know my story—you know I was forced to fly the country; you find me here now under a false name, unable to own who I am—do you not shrink from me?"

"Shrink from you?" repeated Edith. She placed her hand in his.

"Edith," said Tom passionately, "I have proved a bungler at deception; I will practise it no longer with you at least. I love you; I had intended not to confess it yet, at least not as the outcast I am. Can you love me, knowing what I am?"

"Surely," she said softly, "I should not be worthy of love if I waited till all was smooth and pleasant before casting in my lot with yours."

"But I am going away; I cannot live here. Will you go with me?"

"Anywhere in the world," she whispered. Tom drew her to his breast in a passionate embrace.

Suddenly he drew himself free.

"No," he exclaimed, "I will not ask it. What a wretch I am! Do you think I will accept your love under such conditions? No; I will free myself from this accusation, I will hold up my head before all the world, before I ask you to be my wife. Forgive me, that in my selfish love for you I have acted unworthily, almost dishonourably. I will stay, and before long the world shall know that Tom Meredith is still alive!"

Ebb-Tide.

THE lapsing water leaves my feet,
So softly, scarce I hear it go;
Across its breathing, calm and sweet,
The sunshine burns intense and low:
Oh, mournfullest of sweet, sad things—
The level sand, the level sea,
The last and level light that clings
So wildly and so wistfully!

(A STORY IN FOUR WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER I.

SHE came to us, and a light shone into my darkened life; a star rose and beamed upon me that had never before brightened my pathway. It was in this wise.

My mother and I lived together in Glasgow—not that we were Scotch; we belonged to a younger branch of an old and wealthy English family, but the loss of nearly the whole of our property had led to our taking up our permanent abode there—and had so lived for some years, ever since I came home from my travels. At the time when my story begins we occupied a "flat" in one of the widest and handsomest streets, and my mother, who was old and somewhat infirm, found considerable diversion in sitting at the window and looking out at the busy throngs that everywhere crowd that bustling northern city.

Mine had been a lonely life, bright and prosperous sometimes, and at other times dark and lowering; but neither in prosperity nor misfortune had I ever had a real friend to share my hopes and fears, or a woman's tender love to lighten my way. Since an early disappointment, which had embittered a disposition naturally reserved and melancholy, I had met with no one whose love I had cared to win, though yet I was strongly, often sadly, conscious of the great want of my life, so that it came to pass that at close upon forty I was still alone in the world, with the exception of my mother.

I and my brother Miles, who was six years my senior, had travelled a great deal together in former days; we had had many adventures, and had spent several years on the North African coast, where, after our knocking about the world, and endurance of almost incredible dangers and hardships, fortune seemed suddenly to smile upon us, and in but a short time we had amassed a considerable property, with which we returned home, he to England, where he married and settled down, I to Scotland and my mother, who had lived there upon the little that had remained to us ever since she became a widow, fifteen years before.

I was four-and-thirty when I joined her, and nearly six years passed on quietly and uneventfully. I was occupied a good deal at my office—I had become a partner in a large manufacturing firm, for our present circumstances, though easy, hardly admitted of a life of idleness; nor, indeed, did I desire it—and my mother knitted and dreamt the hours away, living, as she aged do, chiefly in the past.

We were contented and cheerful, in a quiet, dull sort of way—how dull I did not know until afterwards, when I looked back upon my colourless life and pitied myself. I was proud and sensitive to a degree. I had felt my misfortunes infinitely more than my more matter-of-fact brother was capable of doing. My early rebuff, together with the galling poverty through which I had afterwards passed, had chafed me sorely, had made a bitter disappointed man of me—had, for the time, crushed out life and hope from my heart. When at last prosperity came, it failed to cheer me, or to impart fresh life to my dead hopes. It was better to eat than to starve, and the handsome rooms which my mother and I now occupied were a decided improvement upon no lodging at all, as had often been the case; but that was all. I could take no actual pleasure in our improved circumstances.

We had a few friends and acquaintances round us, but I was a reserved man, and slow at making friends; and though I found a little mingling in society cheering at times, it was powerless to brighten my gloomy and saddened mood. But all this lies in the far past—a past that seems so strange and sad to me now that it is hard to believe it ever existed.

My brother Miles had married a widow with one daughter, whom he had soon learnt to look upon as his own. They had had no other family, and two years later his wife had died, after which he and his step-daughter had continued to live on together in the same suburb of London where he had met and married her mother. He had paid us two short visits during those years, but on neither occasion did he bring his step-daughter with him; and I went once to London, but she was away on a visit at the time, and so it came about that we had never met.

Her name was Richenda Todd—a strange, ugly name it sounded to my ear, but when I heard my brother speak of her as "Dickie," I thought it the prettiest, sweetest little abbreviation ever contrived out of an unattractive, far-fetched name.

Just as I entered my fortieth year Miles had an offer to go out to Egypt on very advantageous terms, which offer he was anxious to accept, if possible. The climate would be trying, but he was accustomed to it, and to the natives and their ways, and he felt that he was peculiarly adapted to such a post. My brother was a man of great energy and practical experience—a far finer man than myself, both physically and mentally. He was eminently business-like, with all his faculties on the alert, and if sometimes, in his matter-of-fact, wide-awake march through the world, he missed the beautiful and poetical sides of the various pictures presented to his gaze, he gained instead a substantial and lasting benefit which most men would consider much to be preferred to the dreams and fancies in which I was in the habit of indulging.

When we received his letter, telling us of the appointment which had been offered him, and that his only difficulty lay in disposing of his step-daughter, we were delighted at the solution of this problem which he went on to suggest. He knew the quiet life we led, and he seemed to fear that in proposing she should come to live with us he might be imposing a great burden upon my mother and me. He little knew—we ourselves did not know, until the idea was suggested to us—how welcome a bright young girl would be in our quiet home—quiet to dulness generally, in spite of the roar of the city streets without and the surging tide of busy human life which surrounded us.

My mother's face brightened up at once.

Edited by Charles Dickens.)

"Let her come as soon as he wishes," she said, "the sooner the better. Miles's little daughter will be like a sunbeam about the house. I used to long for a little girl of my own, but God did not see fit to grant me my prayer. Now I shall have a granddaughter, and you, Arnold, a niece to take care of."

As for me, my brother's half-hesitating proposition had softened me and opened my long closed heart in a way that surprised even myself. I had scarcely been conscious of how I had yearned for family ties and affections of my own until this charge was offered to us—this daughter of my brother's wife, whom I might love and care for as he had done, whom it would be my duty to protect, my pleasure to please. My heart leaped within me at the thought.

"I am afraid it will be a dull home for her—" I began, but my mother would not hear me out.

"Not at all," she said with more energy than she had exhibited for a long time; "we will see that she is well amused, and she has been used to a quiet life with Miles. There are the Crichtons, you know—"

"Too old for a girl of eighteen," I put in, trying to cast a shadow over the bright prospect that had suddenly opened upon us.

"And you can take her out to see the shops, and museums, and galleries," continued my mother, without deigning to notice my interruption. "I cannot go far, but you and she will entertain one another well."

I thought the same objection applied to me as to the friends whom my mother had mentioned, and her next words showed that the idea had struck her, though in a different way.

"She will do you good, Arnold," she pursued; "you are getting too silent and thoughtful, always shut up with an old woman like me. She will be a blessing to both of us."

So I wrote to Miles, and the dear old mother was very happy and busy trotting about and helping to get Dickie's room ready, for she was to come at once. And a week later she arrived, Miles accompanying her, partly to act as an escort, and partly to say good-bye to us. I met them at the station, and was decidedly disappointed when I was introduced to my "niece," as she was by courtesy if not by actual relationship. My mother and I had decided that she must be very pretty, very sweet, very charming altogether; but I saw only a small ordinary-looking figure enveloped in a brown ulster, with a cap to match, underneath which was a small, pale, weary face, with hazel eyes, and almost colourless lips. I spoke kindly to her, however, and asked her if she were very tired, to which she scarcely replied; and then Miles told me that she was very faint and weary, and had suffered from severe headache during the whole of the journey.

In ten minutes more we were rattling over the stones in a rickety four-wheeler, between the tall blocks that lifted their blackened roofs amid the city smoke. She lay back in the corner of the cab, looking so still and white, that I thought she had swooned, and was just going to call Miles's attention when she opened her eyes wide and looked straight at me. Finding me looking at her, she smiled—a lovely, frank smile that transfigured her face and pierced my sad old heart with a strange, faint pang, half of pleasure, half of pain. I smiled back at her, and after that I knew we should be friends.

She seemed to rouse a little then, and leaning back in her corner, she surveyed the hurrying throngs with a sort of wistful content.

"I hope you will like Glasgow," I said to her presently, leaning forward to make my voice heard above the rush and roar of the streets and the rattle of our own vehicle in particular—I was sitting on the front seat.

"I am sure I shall," she said, smiling. "It is just like London."

"You like London, then?"

"Oh yes! I never thought I could be content to live anywhere else, but this seems so much like it that I shall scarcely know the difference."

"Yes, she's a thorough little cockney, is Dickie," remarked Miles in his eminently business-like manner. "She was born in the parish of St. Botolph—"

"Within sound of Bow bells, you know," she put in, smiling a little wearily.

"And has always been a City child to the core," he went on. "She never cared for the country when she was in it, but always wanted to go to the town and see the people and the shops, and now well, you would think she had seen people and shops enough to last her a lifetime, but she hasn't."

"That comes of being born within the magic circle," said I, searching in her face for that beautiful smile which so transfigured its pale weariness.

"Yes," she acquiesced. "Were you?"

"I had that inexpressible honour," I replied, half-lightly, half-

"Honour! Pshaw! As if it could make any difference!" commented Miles with a deep scorn that was no doubt intensified by his consciousness of the fact that his own birth had taken place in one of the most insignificant villages of that tiniest county of England, Rutlandshire. "Dick's head is full of nonsensical notions," he continued—not unkindly, however. "I hope you will succeed in curing her of a few of them, Arnold, in your leisure hours."

Her eyes and mine met in another silent smile. And that was how my darling came to me.

We usually dined at six, but the meal had been put off on that day until our travellers should arrive, and tea had been added to it, chiefly on Dickie's account. When we met at the table, the change in her was wonderful. With the dust of travel washed from her face, her skin looked delicately pale rather than faded, as it had at first appeared to me; her light brown hair clustered and curled about her forehead in pretty fluffy irregularity that was yet consistent with her perfect neatness, and by the time a steaming cup of my mother's tea had sent the pink into her cheeks and the light to her eyes, my opinion of her had undergone a considerable change. She had a very winning voice, and her speech was so deliciously naive, the play of her features so piquant, that I found myself continually watching her.

"She is looking better," my brother observed presently; he showed great solicitude for his step-daughter in his matter-of-fact way, though he never seemed to bestow a caress or a word of affection upon her, while to such minor beauties as a soft voice and a rapidly-changing expression he was deaf and blind. "She will be quite herself when she has had a good night's rest. She is never very strong, and the journey has been fatiguing even to me in this heat."

Then she was not "herself" yet, I mused. Would she be prettier still to-morrow? Was she like the enchanted princess in the fairy story, whose beauty waxed and waned with the waxing and waning of the moon, until the prince's kiss broke the spell? I sat watching the face opposite me, and dreaming, while the conversation around me ran chiefly on business matters. My brother was well pleased with the home he had secured for his charge, and congratulated himself upon being able to leave Dickie in our hands.

"I shall feel as easy about her as if she were at home with me," he said.

"I hope you will," my mother replied, looking affectionately at the girl whom she had taken to her arms and her heart at the same moment. "I am sure I shall love her, and do my best to make her happy, and Arnold will not be behind. He was delighted at the idea of having a dear little niece to take care of."

I looked at Dickie as my mother said this, and she glanced up at me. Again we exchanged that silent comprehending smile. We had not said many words to one another, and yet each seemed to know and understand the other perfectly.

It was late before we separated, tired though the travellers were; there was so much to be talked over, and so little time to say it in, as Miles was to take the ten o'clock express to Liverpool the next morning, from whence he would sail, without returning to London.

"Mother is looking well," remarked Miles to me, pausing a moment in the doorway after she had gone away, carrying Dickie along with her to the pretty room she had prepared for her. "And you too—you don't seem to grow a day older. Don't go spoiling that child, Arnold," he went on. "I expect nothing of the mother, she is evidently infatuated already. But you are a man, and have some common-sense to counteract that, I hope."

"I will look after her," I answered half-absently. And I fear I somewhat startled my brother by my next words. "Do you think her pretty?"

"Pretty!" he repeated, staring at me. "I don't know, I'm sure; I never looked at her. What about it?"

"Oh, nothing," I replied; "only I thought she was, rather."

"Well, I should have thought you had seen too many black-eyed Oriental beauties in your time to admire her style," Miles rejoined. And I wondered, as I went into my room and shut the door, whether I should show any more "common-sense" than my mother in the management of Dickie.

CHAPTER II.

It was just as I expected—my niece and I quickly became the closest of friends; to all outward appearance we seemed to be more to each other than all the world beside, though I had a shrewd idea that there was a lover somewhere in the background. She was so frank and confiding that she drew me out of my reserved, melancholy self—so infectiously full of life and sweetness that I became almost boyishly light-hearted and gay in those days. My mother, as Miles had remarked, had also fallen a hopeless victim to the charm which she seemed to exercise over the generality of mankind, and the three young bachelors who occupied the flat above had admiring eyes for the smiling, fluffy-haired girl who was sometimes to be met on the stairs. They would walk slowly down past our door in the hope of catching a sight of her, instead of careering down the long stone flights at their usual headlong pace; but I guarded her like a dragon, and when they made advances to me, in the hope of gaining an entrée into our house, and an introduction to the fair little stranger, their eagerness met with the coldest discouragement.

Until now I had been quite satisfied—or thought I had been—with the companionship of my mother and the few friends we had; at any rate, I had not thought that fate had anything better in store for me, and so was dully content, as we often are from necessity; but now there was a change, and my life was suddenly complete. My first glance, my chief thought, my best care, were all given to this little insignificant girl, who looked so plain and unattractive whenever she felt sad, or dull, or tired, but who brightened and glowed into such a charming little unconscious coquette under the least provocation, or under none at all, for her spirits naturally were of the best.

She and I generally breakfasted à-la-carte, for my mother was in the habit of taking the morning meal in her own room; and I do not think I was aware of how I looked forward, day by day, to the hour when, fresh as a newly-blown flower, bright and smiling as the summer sunshine, she took her place at the head of the table and poured out the coffee, sometimes full of merry chat, at other times soft and quiet, but always ready to sympathise with any and every mood of mine.

"You are not a bit like what I expected, Uncle Arnold," she said to me one morning, as she gave me my second cup of coffee.

"Indeed!" I said, wondering what was coming next, for the child often made the oddest, quaintest little speeches possible.

"I wonder if you mind my calling you 'uncle'?" she went on.

"Why should I?"

"Oh, I thought you would be pretty old—as old as father, nearly—"

"So I am, very nearly—didn't you know that?"

"But you don't look old. Your hair isn't grey like his, and your eyes shine—you seem quite like a young man; and I thought, perhaps, you might like to have the credit of it," laughingly, "and having a niece of my age might deprive you of that in some people's eyes. Besides, you are not really my uncle, or any relation to me."

"So you are not willing to be my niece?" I said, rising from the table and going over to the window to see if it had stopped raining.

"Oh yes, I am," she returned, coming after me and putting her hand into mine with that trusting affection which it had never before been my lot to have given me thus, and which filled my lonely heart with a strange new rapture. "And I like to call you uncle if you like it. I like to have you for my uncle—I never had any other."

"I am not afraid of being thought old," I said. "I know I am no longer young. And do you think I do not value my proprietorship in a dear little niece, who will fill the aching void in my sad old heart, who will be to me—"

I left my vague broken speech unfinished. She broke in readily: "You shall be to me, and I will be to you, whatever you will."

My whole being thrilled at her light, unconscious words, but I finished quietly:

"My only, and therefore much-prized niece. There, it is time I was off! What are you going to do with yourself until my mother makes her appearance? Gossip with Janet, I expect, for one thing, when she comes in to clear away?"

"I never gossip," she returned with spirit.

"I am afraid you waste a good deal of that worthy woman's time which would be better expended upon her duties."

"Well, she has Bridget to help her. She has not much to do."

"Enough, you may be sure, or why should we keep her, Miss Thoughtless?"

I felt constrained to administer a little lecture now and then, in accordance with my brother's hints respecting his step-daughter, though I found it a hard matter to put a finger upon a fault. But I did not wish him, on her restoration to him, to find her what he might consider "spoilt."

"Well, if I am thoughtless, you are as much the opposite," she said gaily. "It is not everybody who thinks so much about their servants. You really ought to get married, Uncle Arnold. You would make such a considerate husband."

"I wonder what your father would say if he could hear you talking to me so?" I returned laughingly. "I am afraid he would think you sadly wanting in proper respect."

"Oh, but father is quite different," she said, still holding my hand and coming out of the room with me into the lobby on which all the doors opened. "I should not think of saying anything not perfectly respectful to him even if he were only my uncle instead of my father; but you—you—well, I say just what I like to you."

I was very glad to hear that; I much preferred that she should look on me in the light of a friend or comrade, than in that of a superior, who commanded undeviating respect and consideration.

We stood a moment in the dim half-light of the lobby. I felt how my melancholy face and sad eyes must contrast with the rounded cheeks and smiling lips of the girl beside me. She seemed so full of life and happiness—I was a disappointed, world-battered, saddened man. No joy that could come to me now could ever have power entirely to efface the lines from my brow, to chase away the deep melancholy which had become second nature with me. I might be gay and boyish for a time, but the life that lay behind me could never be quite forgotten.

"I am glad you feel so towards me," I said. "I was afraid a grave old fellow like me might have a rather depressing effect upon your bright spirits."

"But you are not old, and you don't look so," she insisted; "and you are not grave to me, at any rate, Uncle Arnold."

"Good-bye, Dickybird," I said, as I took down my hat from the stand. "Your pretty name just suits you."

"Your name is pretty, too," she said, and then stopped so suddenly that I turned round to look at her. I was always on the look-out for that lover who, I felt sure, existed somewhere; it was not likely that a girl like Dickie would have gone "unwooded, unwon," all these sweet years of her springing girlhood, and something in her voice struck me.

"Do you think so?" I said carelessly. "And do you think it suits me too?"

"Y—yes, a great deal better than I thought it would. I did not think—"

She stopped there. She was very ingenuous, and had yet to learn the art of concealing her feelings.

"You thought that it would not suit me as well as it does somebody else," I said, "and you find that you were right?"

"Uncle Arnold, how can you know? Whatever makes you say that?"

She blushed as red as a rose as she spoke, and a jealous pain shot through my heart.

"I know nothing, my dear," I answered dryly. "You, yourself, are telling me now."

"I! I have said nothing," she returned in surprise.

But the next moment I had swallowed my sudden anger, and remembered that she and her happiness were to be thought of before the foolish, mad hopes which I had now and then dared to entertain.

"But you will tell me?" I said, drawing her near me for a moment. "You will tell me the next time we have an opportunity? You will not have any secrets from your old uncle?"

"I will tell you," she promised naively. "I would never have told father, but I like telling you things; you seem to—to feel just as I do, somehow."

"Good-bye," I said again, and possibly I should have sealed our friendship with a kiss, but at that moment my mother's door opened, and she came out.

"I heard your voices," she said, as Dickie went up to greet her.

"You are early this morning, mother," I observed.

"Yes," she acquiesced, and I saw that she was watching me intently. I dare say she was astonished to see the brooding cloud lifted from my brow, to see the veil of gloom pierced by a mere ray of light from another soul; yet here—a glance, a smile, a winning girl's voice in my ear—and the thing was done, the transformation effected. I had started on my travels almost immediately after leaving school, so that my mother had known but little of me until disappointment and misfortune had frozen up the well-springs of my passionate heart, and now, perhaps, it was something of a shock to her to see them thawed into life and warmth by the touch of young, loving fingers.

Intensely proud and reserved people will sometimes return with passionate ardour a frank confiding affection given them, as Dickie had given hers to me, without waiting to see whether they have any to offer in return. She had always intended to love me, just because I was her father's brother, and when she came to know me, and to feel how deep and entire a sympathy existed between our apparently opposite natures, the duty of affection was lost in the pleasure and consolation of it. This I know, because she herself told me so, in simple naïve words that would lose half their expression and tenderness if rendered literally, because my pen could not transfer to paper the soft, pure tones of the voice which uttered them, the sweet and ingenuous glance of affection which accompanied them.

Nemesis.

"DEAD and buried." Each separate word
Bright, as if written in fire, appears,
Slowly vanishing, dim and blurred,
Scarcely seen through "a mist of tears,"
Such as never have found a way
Since the sorrows of childhood's day.

"Dead and buried"—and she and I
Once were fettered by love's sweet bond !
Came a cloud o'er the summer sky,
Shadowed the future that lay beyond,
And in a moment the smiling scene
Passed as though it had never been.

Long she pleaded ; my heart was hard,
Careless of all but an angry pain ;
Pride and passion the gates had barred,
Love and sorrow might sue in vain.
"All is over," I coldly said ;
"Trust has vanished, and truth is dead."

Fool ! to set in my own despite
Ill that would last for a whole life long.
Fool ! to turn from the path of right
Into the path of the flagrant wrong,
Flinging in anger and pride away
Love that would gladden the darkest day.

So we parted, the time went on ;
Never again have our pathways crost.
Now, I know, that the years have gone,
All the blessing my life has lost ;
Wide or narrow the earthly scope,
Vanished for ever have love and hope !

Yet, if I only could call her back,
Down to earth from that farther shore ;
If I could follow the self-same track,
Strong in the thought we should meet once more ;
If I could win her from death and fate,
Just for a moment— Too late ! too late !

The Ordeal by Gold.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

It will probably be admitted that a story is none the worse for being true, even though the imagination has not been very vividly called into play in its construction ; and the following narrative was declared, by a person who ought to have known, to be true in every essential particular.

I shall not be identifying the scene too closely, if I say that the action of the brief drama took place at a public-house in London, because everyone who has visited the metropolis must have observed that it contains several public-houses. I may venture on a little closer description, perhaps, and so mention that this was, and is, a very large and busy public-house ; so large and so busy that the takings on a Saturday night, as I have been informed on good authority, averaged more than one hundred and thirty pounds. As this amount was entirely taken in very small sums, I have, I hope, established my proposition that this was a busy public-house.

John Gateleigh, in the year 18—, was out of a situation and, which was worse, had been laid up for some three months with rheumatic fever ; so, what with want of employment and the expenses of his long illness, he and his wife were reduced to great extremities. The struggle told very much on both, and Mary Gateleigh, who had been a rosy-cheeked country belle only a couple of years before, now looked more haggard and white than did her husband, for all his long illness. At this there was little to marvel, for, out of the proceeds of their few valuables (the whole of which were by this time sold or pawned), John had all the nourishing and inviting food that was within their reach, while little Mary, aged ten months, was carefully tended also ; but whenever food was scantier, or money shorter, in the house than was usual, it was Mary Gateleigh who went without her meals, and feigned, always with the kindest and most cheerful of smiles too, to have had her bit of dinner while John slept.

With the natural, and presumably inevitable, selfishness of an invalid (that is, a man invalid ; a woman is rarely so selfish), John had seen nothing of this, and took everything for granted ; but, as he grew stronger, he noted how pale and weary his nurse looked, and, as he still mended, came to understand what a long and willing sacrifice she had made. John, being a good little fellow—he was not very lofty of stature, I may remark—in his way, as Mary was in hers, would allow no more of this self-denial, but it became evident that unless some favourable change took place, things were likely to be in a bad way for both of them.

I have not yet mentioned John's calling—his "profession" as one must say nowadays ; it was not one of the learned professions, and useful as it may have been, it was one which carried some prejudice against it in many minds, but John could not help being what he was, and that was a barman. John was a very smart, civil, active barman, too, and as scrupulously honest as if he were a—I cannot finish my sentence for want of a trade to select as a standard of unsusplicable integrity. He was almost as honest as you and I are, reader.

John had now grown strong enough to walk out, and to call upon two or three friends who, he thought, might interest themselves for him, but he heard on all hands that "things were very flat just now," and in spite of all his efforts, he had still too much leisure time in which he might lean on the parapet of London Bridge, and watch the shipping ; an amusement which never fails to interest, and is one of the cheapest I know. But the hour before day is always the darkest, and although no answer came to the advertisement John had contrived to put into the paper, one of the friends to whom he had applied, called upon him with the welcome and surprising intelligence that having heard the proprietor of The Grand Turk was in want of a barman, he had spoken to him on behalf of John, and the said proprietor had agreed to give him a trial.

This was tremendous, for the house in question—as the reader must already have decided—was the busy one referred to, and was famed throughout the trade as having the smartest and most competent assistants in London. It was rather a rough place, as regarded the general run of customers, and the work was very hard, hence no young ladies were employed ; but the pay was good, and to have been engaged at The Grand Turk, was, one may say, to have taken a first-class degree. So with a great deal of excitement, much hope, and some nervousness lest he should be unsuccessful, John waited upon the proprietor, who was a great, burly, big-whiskered man, with staring eyes, and who—John thought—did not seem particularly pleased with the candidate. The recommendation from a personal friend was, however, sufficient, and in a somewhat ungracious manner he told John he could begin on the following Saturday.

A little abashed by his new master's manner, yet very thankful also, John went home, where his poor little wife shed tears of joy at hearing the good news, and kissed the baby with a warmer hope of new frocks for that young lady than she had dared to indulge in for many a day. There were great troubles yet to be encountered, for John's wardrobe was in anything but a fit state to furnish his outfit, and had not Mrs. Parryble—who, we should explain, was his landlady—lent him by stealth Parryble's Sunday coat, in which to go and see the proprietor, John would hardly have dared to see the proprietor at all. When, however, the situation was obtained, Parryble himself, who was a stonemason, was taken into consultation, and although the Gateleighs were many weeks behindhand with their rent, yet the Parrybles were a kindly soft-hearted pair, who felt for the young couple and sympathised in their struggles. Having no children of their own, they "took to" the baby wonderfully, and they carried their friendship so far, under these combined influences, that, having no money to spare, they became surety with a neighbouring tailor for a brand-new suit of clothes, and thus John was respectably started in his new situation.

He duly went to work, and very soon proved that the recommendation he had received was by no means undeserved ; the other barmen—five besides himself—were all quick and business-like, but none of them were better than John. He carried his civility beyond the public department, and was anxious to be friendly with his new comrades, but, for some reason or another, he could not tell what, he did not make much way with them ; so that at the end of a couple of months he found himself separate and apart, without anything like a quarrel having taken place, or his being in any way able to account for it.

With his master he had barely exchanged a word, although the burly proprietor was in the business a great deal, after his fashion—sitting alone, and often asleep, in his bar-parlour. And so when John was one evening told, three months having elapsed since he joined, that Mr. Cramp wished to see him before he (Mr. Cramp) left, his heart misgave him. He obeyed the summons, and found the proprietor looking, he thought, bigger, burlier, bushier-whiskered, and more staring as regarded the eyes than before.

"You have been in my service three months to-day, Mr. Gateleigh," began the proprietor, whose name, as has been somewhat irregularly intimated, was Cramp.

"Yes, sir," assented John.

"I am not altogether dissatisfied with what I have seen of you," continued the proprietor ; "yet there are some things which I find it necessary to speak about. This is a first-class place, Mr. Gateleigh ; we are A1 here, sir, and I expect my people to be first-class and A1 also. You don't dress well enough for me, sir."

"Not dress well enough !" faltered John, looking down at the suit which was as yet only half paid for.

"Yes, sir," returned Mr. Cramp, "and you have not enough style about you. Where is your watch ? your pin ? your rings ?

You see all the other gentlemen behind the bar have them, and, as I tell you, we expect style here."

"I am sorry to say, sir," replied John, "that before I got your situation I had been out of employment for more than half a year, and had been laid up with rheumatic fever three or four months. I—I have had a great deal of trouble to pull myself round at all."

"Oh, I dare say that is very true," said Cramp, "and I can make allowances; if I could not I should have spoken to you much earlier; but now you know what my sentiments are, and will no doubt think them over. I repeat, Mr. Gatligh, you are the only one of my staff who has not a watch, chain, rings, and pins, and just consider how your want of them spoils the effect. That will do. Good-night."

So John retired, and trudged home very late—for he was on the last turn at the bar—and full of trouble, which his anxious wife noting, she became at once alarmed, would not be evaded, and John was obliged to tell her all about his interview with the proprietor. They both agreed that it was very cruel and very unfair of Mr. Cramp, and that it was almost impossible for them to devise means of complying with his request. Not only were the new clothes still in part unpaid for, but the arrears of rent were not all cleared off; the doctor's bill was in the greater portion still owing, and many things held as indispensable for Mrs. Gatligh and the baby were unpurchased. As they said over and over again before they went to sleep, "What could a man do in three months after such a long spell of misfortune?"

The next day, and the next, as may be supposed, the dilemma was talked over, and at last a resolution was arrived at. The influence and credit of Mr. Parryble were of no avail here, although he was trusted readily enough by all who knew him; but watches and jewellery were a little out of his line, and so, after a great deal of discussion, the unlucky couple determined that John should go on as before, doing his best at the tavern, and paying off his liabilities at home as much as possible, in hope that, after all, Mr. Cramp would not say any more to him on the subject. If, however, he did recur to it, John was to tell him boldly what was the reason for his non-compliance, and then ask for an advance on account of his salary sufficient to buy the watch, etc., required, the amount to be deducted from his pay by instalments. This was the best plan they could think of, and bad, indeed, was the best; their chief hope was that Mr. Cramp might forget all about it.

Another source of discomfort to Gatligh was the evidently increasing dislike in which he was held by his comrades; there was no denying this fact, although he could not guess the reason, and although he made every effort to alter it; but all his advances were treated with the utmost coldness, till he supposed at last that it was his poverty which had influenced their behaviour.

Time rolled on, and Mr. Cramp took no further notice of Gatligh. John at first was sensitively nervous. Every time the proprietor entered the house, he expected to be sent for; every time any one of the staff came out from the bar-parlour, he felt sure he saw a message to himself in his face. But this wore away, and he began to think that all was forgotten, and that he was to be allowed to settle down in his own way.

However, on going to business one morning early—for he was on the "first turn" then—he found, to his surprise, that the proprietor was already there, and John had scarcely got inside the bar, when one of the resident staff said:

"You are to go and see Mr. Cramp at once."

The man spoke rudely enough, but he always so spoke to Gatligh, and the latter did not heed it generally, but on this day it seemed an omen of bad luck, and he obeyed the intimation with a sinking heart.

Mr. Cramp was in the bar-parlour, but he rose as John entered, and led the way into a little sanctum at the back, a kind of counting-house, used only by himself.

"Well, Mr. Gatligh," he at once began, "you, of course, remember a conversation I had with you a few months back. I do not see that you have paid much attention to it."

"You mean, sir," said John, flushing with shame, "about the watch and so forth?"

"I do," returned his employer. "Why have you not procured the things I mentioned?"

With the courage of desperation, the barman plunged at once into his story, told his master how poor he was, how long he had been ill, how his wife had suffered, how they were in debt, but were gradually paying off their liabilities. He told him, too, of the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Parryble, and then proffered his request for an advance, to be repaid by instalments.

Mr. Cramp listened to the story more patiently than John had expected would be the case, and when he had finished, replied, with a curious smile:

"You came to me without a watch and chain, Mr. Gatligh, as have many other men whom I have engaged, but you are the only man who ever remained in my service for six months without getting them, and I never had the least occasion to advise them to do so."

Here Mr. Cramp smiled his curious smile again. He went on:

"The fact is, Mr. Gatligh, you will not do for The Grand Turk. You are a very good barman, I never had a better; but you are too honest. Honesty, as you understand it, won't do here. Do you suppose I don't know that every man behind my bar at this moment robs me? Do you believe I am always half or quite asleep here? They think so, but I am as wide-awake as themselves. Yet they are all honest, after a sort. They draw a line with their perquisites, and it would be useless for me to dismiss them. They are all clever, and their successors would infallibly rob me more—at first, at any rate, until they had settled down, and then they might not be so clever as this lot. Now you haven't nicked a sixpence—'nicked' is the correct term, you know—since you have been here. I am confident you have not. I put the screw upon you a little in the watch and jewellery matter to see what effect it would have, and you have come out well. You are the only thoroughly honest man I have ever met, but you would be out of place here. You would soon be at variance with the others, for, as I tell you, I shall not change my people. So long as I get a certain percentage for my money I am satisfied, and don't intend to go too narrowly into little irregularities. Here is a letter to Messrs. Brimmer and Runlet, to whom I have spoken about you; they are willing to take you into their warehouse—a much better place for a married man than anything in this trade—at a salary which I call handsome, and if you present this letter all will be right."

John, whose breath had almost been taken away by what he heard, and whose head was swimming, began to stammer out something; but the proprietor went on:

"In case Brimmer and Runlet should be as particular about the watch and chain as I am," he said, with the curious smile on his face stronger than before. "I have thought it as well you should be provided for such a necessity, and here"—with this he drew a small case from his pocket—"are a watch and chain accordingly, which I present to you as a token of my respect for your honesty."

John mechanically took the case, but was quite unable to speak.

"There is a cheque for your wages now due, and for a three months' notice. I see what is the matter with you. Go home, tell your good little wife, and then lose no time in hurrying off to your new place, for they expect you."

John tried to say a part of what he felt, but a kind of sob came in his breath when he began, which had a very hysterical sound.

"There! Be off!" exclaimed Cramp good-humouredly, uncere- moniously pushing him out of the counting-house as he spoke; "and if you have anything to say, come to me this day month and say it."

Thus ended this extraordinary interview, and little John Gatligh, scarcely knowing how he got there, hurried home to his wife, as advised. If he had felt any shame at being hysterical, or reluctance to allow the tear to swim in his eye, his wife had no such scruples, for she cried, and sobbed, and laughed, and kissed the baby, and kissed John, and blessed Mr. Cramp, until John broke down as completely as herself.

However, all ended capitally; the watch was of gold and so was the chain. The former bore an inscription inside the case: "Front Samuel Cramp to John Gatligh;" while the letter was better even than gold, for, upon its presentation, Brimmer and Runlet engaged John at once; and, although it is more than twenty years ago since this happened, and the baby is grown up and married, John is in the warehouse still, at the top of the tree. Mr. Cramp, with his burly figure, his big whiskers, and his staring eyes, has long been dead, but, in his way, he was a friend to John to the last. He saw him about once a year, and then barely spoke; but old Mr. Byller, the head clerk, told John, in strict confidence, that Cramp seldom came to the house, of which he was the principal customer, without enquiring about him, and saying something in his favour.

John was not unmindful, when better times came, of the kindness shown by Mr. and Mrs. Parryble; and the capital glass of whisky, of which the worthy stonemason boasted so much every Christmas, always came with "John Gatligh's best respects."

And now the reader knows how John Gatligh got the only gold watch he ever possessed.

The Editor's Note Book.

IF the story of the dynamite plot against Lord Lansdowne is true, it again shows the absolute aimlessness of the Irish-American dynamite faction. No result could have been really hoped for from the assassination of the new Governor-General of Canada, and he does not belong to the class of Irish landlords whose "removal" has been advocated by the party of assassins. There seems, happily, some reason to believe that the plot is only a bogus one after all, and was intended to extract subscriptions from the credulous Biddies and Paddies of New York, rather than for any other purpose.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS.

Edited by Charles Dickens.

THE Daily Telegraph of the 25th October contained an excellent article, under the title "Why should London Wait?" in which the terrible condition of a great part of the population of the metropolis, and the urgent need of a practical reform of the manner in which over four millions of people are left practically without government, are urged with graphic force and yet with the utmost fairness and moderation. Side by side with this article should be read Lord Salisbury's paper in the National Review, in which the Conservative leader deals exhaustively and vigorously with the question of the housing of the metropolitan poor.

THE question is well asked, "Why should London wait?" for a chance of rescue from the frightful evils with which she is afflicted, because a caucus, or congress, or conference of provincial busybodies and doctrinaires chooses to demand as a more pressing measure a Reform Bill, for which, outside of the fussy circles of the smaller professional politicians, nobody has asked, and for which nobody cares.

EVER since I have had the honour of commenting in these columns on passing events, I have written, and that frequently, with the same object and on much the same lines as the two articles I have quoted, and I am rejoiced to find that the question is assuming the importance which it deserves. If Mr. Gladstone, with all his personal and political power, does not feel equal to dealing with the matter, it must be taken up by the other side, and would, I feel sure, be much more valuable as political capital than the stale invective, founded upon what is really ancient history, which seems to be all the stock-in-trade of the present generation of Conservative orators.

It will also be well to remember, when the next patching up of the Constitution takes place, and a Re-distribution of Seats has to be effected, that London, if she is to be represented in proportion to her population, would require rather more than eighty members, who would on any non-political question, as to which they might be united, be able to force the hand of any Government.

It is evident that the Lord Mayor elect has the courage of his opinions, and that his term of office is likely to be marked quite as much by his own originality and independence of character as by the unusual surroundings of his election. Mr. Alderman Fowler has peremptorily refused to accede to an application that he would invite the Transvaal deputation to his inaugural dinner on the 9th of November. Except as a political demonstration there is no particular reason why these gentlemen should have been invited, and from that point of view Mr. Fowler's refusal was almost a foregone conclusion.

THOSE guests at the banquet who are near enough to understand what is said will probably hear a little plain-speaking from Mr. Ferdinand de Lesseps, and will in all likelihood be also entertained by some interesting verbal gymnastics on the part of Mr. Gladstone, who, between politeness to M. de Lesseps and the usual necessity of saying as little as possible about Egypt in as many words as may be convenient, will have a difficult task indeed.

THE Chairman of the Surrey Sessions has instituted a novelty in our judicial system, whether wisely or not, it would be perhaps premature to express an opinion. A man pleading guilty to a charge of stealing a watch, Mr. Hardman informed the prisoner that he had decided on postponing sentence for a year, with the understanding that if the culprit led an honest life during that time, no punishment would be inflicted. The experiment is altogether a new departure, and its result will be watched with interest. I cannot help thinking, however, on the first blush of it, that its universal adoption would be found somewhat inconvenient.

THE police-constable who haled a crossing-sweeper before Mr. Hosack, the magistrate, would appear to have been suffering from an attack of over zeal, as there is really nothing criminal either in sweeping a crossing or in taking a halfpenny as payment for the accommodation. It is impossible to suppose that any municipality, however rich and however well organised, could keep up such an army of sweepers as would be necessary for the principal crossings in London, and the present volunteers contribute not a little towards the public comfort and convenience. It is true that there are black sheep among them, but, although it is quite proper to punish a man for being an insolent, foul-mouthed beggar, there is no reason why crossing-sweepers generally should be put in this category.

A GOOD deal having been said about some alleged gluttony on the part of certain members of the Clerkenwell Vestry, the clerk has written to explain that the refreshments supplied to the Vestry Committees are on the most moderate scale. But why the gentlemen of the Committees should expect to be refreshed at the expense of the ratepayers is not quite apparent. No man is obliged to be a vestry-man. The office is sought with eagerness—either from a desire to be useful, or in some cases, perhaps, from less disinterested motives—and there really is no more reason why vestrymen should be paid with lunches than that Members of Parliament should receive salaries.

NOVICES who entertain the erroneous idea that they are likely to add materially to their incomes by backing horses, would do well to take to heart the lesson of last week's Cambridgeshire Stakes at Newmarket. For this race, as is usually the case in great events, several horses carried the complete confidence and a good deal of the money of their owners, but the majority of the people who know most about such matters looked upon the defeat of a horse called Medicus, the property of the Duke of Hamilton, as being almost an impossibility. Consequently, although the field numbered twenty-five starters, the ingenuous public were content to take less than two to one about the animal, who, however, could get no nearer than third, victory falling to a despised outsider, against whom fifty to one was offered. On the whole backing horses may be amusing, but certainly cannot be recommended as a remunerative profession.

MR. AUGUSTUS HARRIS displays so much energy and liberality in his management of Drury Lane Theatre, that he deserves a better reward than any he is likely to reap from his latest production, an unwieldy and uninteresting drama called "A Sailor and His Lass." In truth the new play is from almost every point of view a bad one, and will give, I think, little, either of reputation or profit, to its authors, Mr. Robert Buchanan and Mr. Augustus Harris.

THE story of "A Sailor and His Lass" is simple and familiar, and mainly turns on a false accusation of murder being made against the virtuous hero, who suffers all sorts of troubles in consequence, even to the point of being pinioned in the condemned cell, and being marched to execution through the yard of Newgate. Necessarily all comes right to the point of this crisis, and the sailor is duly restored to the arms of his lass. A dynamite explosion, a shipwreck, and the story of a stowaway are also introduced into the piece, but do not add much to the simplification or coherence of the main plot.

THESE matters have all been introduced to provide opportunities, more or less reasonable, for elaborate scenic effects, but even these appear to miss the mark—principally, it may be, because of their irrelevancy, but certainly also, in some degree, by reason of their intrinsic absurdity. The scene of the ship, for instance, rigged—or rather not rigged—as no ship ever was since seafaring began, and with openings in her side through which the action of the drama is carried on, is nothing short of ridiculous, while the subsequent scene, in which certain of the characters are presented tossing about on the mast of the vessel, after she has gone to the bottom with singular calmness and deliberateness, cannot fail to recall memories of the somewhat similar effect of the raft in "The World."

IT is, unfortunately, an inevitable condition of the career of a manager who goes in for pieces of this sort, that the difficulty of providing something new and effective increases at compound interest with each new production. Mr. Harris, indeed, may be likened to a modern Frankenstein, and has created a monster who is neither to be guided or controlled, and whose demands become less easy of satisfaction day by day. The pit and gallery of Drury Lane are insatiable, and I do not envy Mr. Harris the self-allotted task of finding them the sort of amusement which he has himself taught them to crave.

NATURALLY there is little scope for the display of the actor's art in "A Sailor and His Lass." Mr. Fernandez has one chance, of which he makes the most; Miss Clara Jecks does all that could be hoped with the little part of the stowaway; and what there is of Mr. Harry Jackson, as the good-hearted driver of a four-wheeled cab, is acceptable. The responsibilities of management, and the labour of superintending the working of the piece, seem incompatible with the proper performance of the part of the hero, and it is possible that, if Mr. Harris had less to do off the stage, what he has to do on the boards would be more satisfactorily accomplished. The other ladies and gentlemen engaged do the best they can with unpromising materials, but their efforts call for no special comment.

IN conclusion, I must join in the protest which the presentment of the ghastly details of the condemned cell and the execution have called forth. Mr. Buchanan says, in vindication, that these things are true, and hints that they have been shown because he is opposed to capital punishment. No doubt they are true, and no doubt Mr. Buchanan is perfectly at liberty to entertain such views on the subject of capital punishment as may seem good to him. But there are many terrible things in life, the mere fact of whose existence does not justify their presentation on the stage, and I cannot agree with Mr. Buchanan that the theatre is the proper place in which such a question as that of capital punishment can be legitimately or usefully argued. That the financial history of "A Sailor and His Lass" will emphatically point this moral by-and-by, I entertain no manner of doubt.

Hints upon Playing Duets.

THERE are probably very few people living who have not suffered greatly, at some time or other of their existence, from having to listen to badly-played pianoforte duets. Few, indeed, at one time, were the families who could boast of two daughters of at all approaching years, who did not expect the unfortunate visitor to sit calm and admiring whilst "La Gazza Ladra" or "Zampa" was trotted out by the twin executants.

WITH a generous sacrifice of good material for the sake of a grand effect, neither of them spared the piano in the course of their joint performance, but each player played with as much force and vigour as if she had been playing all by herself. The whole thing degenerated into an ignoble race as to which should be heard the most. The treble-player knocked out the shrill high notes with an incredibly ear-piercing sharpness, and the one who played the bass displayed the greatest meanness in taking a full advantage of the superiority of her position. Lavishly, indeed, did she deal out the thunders which she had at her command. The two sisters not infrequently dressed alike, and there was supposed to be something extremely alluring about the back view of two long pigtailed tied with blue ribbon, two sashes tied in exactly the same place, and of exactly the same length, and drapery of precisely the same hue and texture flowing on each side of those horrible music-stools; but, considering the sufferings of the unfortunate listener, it is not to be wondered at if he felt irritated rather than pleased by the appearance of his twin tormentors, so that he could have found it in his heart to brain them as they sat.

POSSIBLY, one of the reasons why duet-playing was so peculiarly inartistic some years since was, that people did not know enough about music to enable them to make a good choice of pieces. They always seemed to hit upon things that were good for an orchestra, but particularly unadapted to a piano. "Zampa," for example, which was a very universal battle-horse with duettists at one time, is not suited for a pianoforte at all. On a band it is always highly effective—hackneyed as it is, it is still a pleasure to hear it. The admirable division of the wind and string instruments, the change of effect produced by using various combinations of the same, make it very bright and interesting indeed. But all this goes for nothing on the piano; you get the same tone throughout, and the rumbling down in the bass but ill imitates the thunder of the drums, while in the treble part the fingers fly about in difficult passages that are quite easy when played on the violin. Pieces like this are interesting to play as mere reminiscences of having heard them on an orchestra, or as a preparation to understanding them when you are going to hear them at some concert; but they should not be tried in the light of show-pieces at all. Schubert's Symphony in B, for example, is a highly interesting duet to play, the more you play it the more you discover in it, the more the melody and the composition dawn upon you; but it would be quite absurd to play it to any person who had not heard it on an orchestra and understood nothing of its meaning.

It is supposed to be a struggle between the cherished hope of some sanguine disposition, and the cruelty of fate who says "No," and forbids it. The sweet, hopeful melody comes in again and again, in one key and another, rising and falling, getting stronger and more complicated the more it goes on, like dreams which strengthen as the dreamer dreams on; yet just when the hope appears brightest, down comes a dreadful discord—a loud and decided tremolo which says "No" to that poor heart as plainly as ever it was said in music. Again the heart appeals against its destiny. Is there no reason why its dream should not come true? Sadly and slowly it gives up the ghost of its warm and most cherished desire; it dies very hard, it hopes till the last. And when at last it is whirled down in a black gulf of misery, and fate has got the victory, you can scarcely refrain from shedding a tear for the poor soul that has lost its all. One movement remains. After a pause the soul takes up its strain once more. Bent, not broken, after all. A holy calm, a deep religious resignation, breathe through its accents, and the peaceful movement of the andante is like a calm evening after a day spent in alternations of storm and sunshine.

THIS is the sort of duet that is so interesting to read through with a sympathetic companion. The two parts give one a very fair idea of how it goes on the orchestra, and the pianists must study to imitate orchestral effects as much as possible, giving the close smooth playing of the violins to one passage, the hard sonorous tone of the brass to another, and imitating with the tremolo in the bass the musical thunder of the drums.

FOR serious study, however, or for playing in company, it is better to choose duets that are written specially for the piano, and by people who understand the instrument. Mendelssohn, Hoffman, Schumann, and Mofskowsky have all written interesting duets for pianoforte, and the student will find both pleasure and profit in their acquisition. For, because bad players have put the duet somewhat into disfavour, it would be foolish for the young musician to give up what is in reality both a great deal of enjoyment and a valuable means of training.

THE soloist is only too inclined to trifle with the time of a piece; to play slowly whenever an expression mark is put, to drag because there is a difficult passage. All this is impossible in a duet when the other player is keeping strict time; and the treble player may know that if at one particular place the bass seems to be going too fast for him, that is the bar he will have to work up.

It is only in practising with another player that the student discovers his good and bad points. If he can make his runs sound brilliant while the bass keeps on in perfect time, he may feel pretty happy about his execution. If he can introduce nice expression and yet play in time, he may feel sure that his expression does not depend upon the vulgar habit of slackening.

It is only in reading that certain curious defects come out. One pianist may put little expression in his playing, but be a magnificent timist—always "there" at the beginning of the bar, while the other may be a better player in other respects, but perfectly incapable of coming in right after three bars' rest. One player helps the other in cases like this, and gradually the one gains some insight into beauty through the charming expression of his companion, and the other one gets an idea of the value of time that no amount of solitary practice would give him.

GOOD temper must be preserved throughout all trials, and no time should be wasted in proving who was wrong and who was right. If the readers can possibly avoid it, it is better not to count aloud, or only in a very difficult passage, just to tide them over an exceptionally hard part; but, as a rule, the player should endeavour to accent the bars so nicely that his brother player should have no difficulty in telling exactly where he is. One player should not give in to the other too much; at the same time he is a very poor musician who hurries on in a wooden sort of way, making his companion feel as if he were tied to a barrel-organ instead of a living pianist.

SOME players have a marked predilection for taking the treble, whilst some are more attached to the bass. Amongst professionals the one who plays best is always offered the treble, and it is quite right that the one who knows most should lead. At the same time, it is well to practise playing both parts, as a good musician ought to be equally at home in either. When the bass leads (as in classical music often occurs), the treble must instantly sink, so as to form a mere accompaniment to the melody. It must not go on loudly as if seeking to drown the other part, as that is not the composer's intention.

SOME of the most interesting piano duets available are written by Mofskowsky—one of the most promising of the young composers of the present day. He is a Pole, and reminds one slightly of his compatriot Chopin at times; but there is a decidedly strong individuality about his music for all that. His Spanish dances, and Spanish album, are highly interesting, and abound in national colour. When they are gay, they are as bright as the sunshine; when they are sad, they are romantic and pathetic. Even more quaint is a set of pieces called "Foreign Parts," every one of which illustrates a different nation. There is quiet strain like a song about Fatherland for Germany, a rude, wild, peasant dance for Russia, and a tarantelle for Italy. In the Spanish one the national character is perhaps better expressed than in any other; you can hear the sound of the guitar now and then, and can fancy the melody sung by Spanish voices—voices that obey so instantly the changing feelings of the moment. As for the Hungarian, when it begins you seem to see all sorts of savage instruments flashing, and clanging cymbals, and bells, and I know not what. The bass has some splendid "bits" to play, and the treble has to hold on very hard indeed if he means to get half his runs in.

THE two players enjoy this trial of strength, and leave off excited and laughing; for there is a great deal of pleasure in trying over such things, supposing one learns them seriously; besides, it is worth while spending time over duets like these, as they are always fresh and delightful, and a source of pleasure both to players and audience.

Throwing the Hatchet.

IN the fourteenth century, the situation of the public executioner of the city of Florence became vacant; and as it was a place of considerable emolument, there were three candidates. The first candidate, with a knife, cleverly separated the head of the victim from his shoulders. He was outdone by the rapid stroke of the second, whose glittering broadsword struck terror in the hearts of the surrounding multitude. The third, and least promising, held in his hand a short hatchet, and when the victim was extended with his head on the fatal block, approached him, and in a low whisper enquired if he was a swift runner, and if he could swim well? On being answered in the affirmative, he desired him to spring on his feet and cross the river. The executioner then, putting on a fierce look, swung his weapon round his head, but instead of making it descend on the devoted creature's neck, struck it with great force into the block! Shouts of execration arose from the crowd, and the trembling wretch, astonished at his wonderful escape, had nearly gained the opposite bank of the river before any steps were taken to pursue him. He had scarcely, however, gone ten yards on dry land, when the executioner, taking steady aim, threw his hatchet with such effect, that the body continued running some time after the head was off! From this rather improbable incident, the common phrase of throwing the hatchet is said to be derived.

The Entrance Examination to Our Public Departments.

PART I.

AT the present time, when the question of the employment of "Our Boys" has been so thoroughly ventilated by the public press, we are surprised that greater stress has not been laid upon the advantages which employment in the Lower Division of the Civil Service offers to the sons of the middle class of this country. The principal difficulty in the way is the competitive examination which candidates have to undergo, and in which, easy as it is, failure is very possible. But as no sort of success in life is attainable nowadays without taking trouble for it, it may be useful to consider how this particular matter stands.

IN 1876 a Parliamentary Committee was appointed to consider the whole question of Civil Service reform. Dr. Lyon Playfair acted as chairman, and the scheme which was ultimately adopted by the Lords of the Treasury became known as the Playfair Scheme. The committee advised that the whole service should be divided into two grades, to be known as the higher and lower divisions, and that the bulk of the work in each office should be performed by clerks of the lower division, whilst the senior position of responsibility and direction should be allocated to the higher division. The examinations for these positions, which will in the future afford a much better opening to the very men who are now obliged to content themselves with the lower division, are practically suspended sine die, there being so many redundant clerks of the old establishment prior to 1876, whose "vested interest" to be absorbed into the higher division must be satisfied before any new appointments can be made thereto by open competition. Examinations for the lower division are held about four times a year, and copies of the regulations can be obtained from the Civil Service Commissioners, Cannon Row, Westminster, who will also furnish intending candidates with full particulars as to time and place, fees, etc. It may be taken for granted that those rules which are not hereinafter referred to are of a purely formal or unimportant character.

RULE 2 states that any natural born subject of Her Majesty, being of the prescribed age, and of good health and character, may compete at these examinations, with certain exceptions, such as "persons actually serving in the army or navy," etc.

RULE 3 sets forth that a fee of ten shillings will be required from every candidate attending the preliminary, and a further fee of ten shillings from each candidate admitted to the competitive examination.

RULE 4 gives the limits of age. Candidates must be over seventeen and under twenty upon the first day of the examination, which lasts for four days, the papers being set between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. on the Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of the week in which the examination is held.

RULE 5 lays down the following subjects of examination, with the maximum number of marks awarded to each:—Handwriting, 400; Orthography, 400; Arithmetic, 400; Copying MS., 200; English Composition, 200; Geography, 200; Indexing or Docketing, 200; Digesting Returns into Summaries, 200; English History, 200; Bookkeeping, 200.

RULE 7 is alarming. It states that each successful competitor's name will be retained upon the list for employment until he reach the age of twenty-five years. On completing his twenty-fifth year, or on receiving an appointment, his name will be removed from such list. This is merely so much brutum fulmen. As a matter of fact, when an examination is held in June, the very last candidate is appointed, and at work, by the end of October.

ON looking at the statistics published for last year, we find that five examinations were held, at which 1,800 candidates competed for 300 vacancies. So that one out of every six competitors succeeded in gaining a place.

TURNING to the question of salary, we must frankly admit that neither the actual pay, nor the prospects, are so good as they were prior to 1876. The primary cause of this is the present state of the labour-market; the Government being, of course, entitled to hire its labour in the cheapest market just as much as the private employer; nor, indeed, must we lose sight of the fact that this is a plain duty it owes to the heavily-burdened taxpayers of this country.

IN the majority of the public departments the clerks of the lower division work from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., their salary commencing at ninety-five pounds per annum, and rising by triennial increments of fifteen pounds to two hundred and fifty pounds. In addition there are in each office a certain number of "duty pay" places, to which are attached special allowances not exceeding one hundred pounds per annum, and for which the recipients perform more responsible duties than those entrusted to their colleagues. A steady and industrious clerk may therefore fairly look forward to attaining three hundred and fifty pounds per annum before retiring. After ten years' service a clerk of the "lower" will be eligible for promotion to the "higher" division, when his salary would increase from the figure at which he was transferred, by triennial increments of thirty-seven pounds ten shillings, to three hundred pounds per annum, with, of course, larger prizes in the shape of duty pay than exist in the lower division. As at present advised, "My Lords" state that these promotions will only be made in cases of exceptional merit. But on the occurrence of the next revision of the pay and prospects of Civil Servants, it is confidently expected that the lower-division clerks will succeed in getting the hard-and-fast line drawn between themselves and the higher division removed, when promotion to it will follow as a matter of course, after a certain number of years of approved and meritorious service.

IN comparing a berth in the Civil Service with one in the open market, there are some very important points to be considered.

First. This is almost the only career in which a youth can support himself from the outset. A knowledge of this fact often proves a great inducement to the high-spirited lad, who knows that there are brothers and sisters at home to be provided for.

Second. The newly elected clerk, having once proved his capacity, need trouble no more about the security of his salary than if he derived the same sum from Consols. Now, any impartial observer during the recent commercial crisis through which we have passed, must have noticed that some of the most apparently stable houses of business, the most soundly constituted corporate bodies, came to an untimely end through causes over which they had no control, and without any blame attaching to them. In many of these cases hard-working young men, after several years of patient labour, and just as they were expecting to reap their reward, had to begin life all over again.

Third. A clerk entering the service at twenty, and retiring therefrom at or at any time after having attained the age of sixty, is entitled to a pension of two-thirds of his actual salary at the time of his retirement. Provided, then, that he insure his life in favour of any who may be dependent upon him, he is justified in living closer to his means than a man who has to provide for a certain number of years during which he will be incapable of work.

HE who joins the Civil Service to-day must, however, recognise the fact that the "Circumlocution Office" received its death blow from the pen of the author of "Little Dorrit," that the method of "How not to do it" is rapidly giving place to the method of "How to do it in the quickest and most business-like manner," and that the race of "Barnacles" is being rapidly superseded by the race of "Open Competition" men, who are actuated by the twofold desire to put as much information as possible in the way of those "who want to know, you know," and to show the taxpayers at large that their money is now finding its way into the pockets of those who recognise that they, as well as others, must do a fair day's work for a fair day's wage.

Gibbon in Love.

MR. GIBBON was at that really dramatic passage of his life in the middle of the year 1787, when he was completing his history, and on a certain night in June had written the last line of the last page of the great work. Very familiar is the description of the almost solemn act performed in a pavilion at the end of his garden. Laying down his pen, he took several turns in the "acacia alley," with a feeling of joy at getting back his liberty, after this long and arduous servitude: but dashed with a certain melancholy, as he thought, however lasting might be the reputation of the book, the days of the writer might be numbered. Lady Elizabeth Foster, who afterwards became Duchess of Devonshire, arrived shortly after, and struck him, as she struck all, with the elegance of her form and manner, her esprit, cleverness, and, above all, the nice apropos of her compliments. She took a great interest in the dramatic completion of the great history, and was one morning asked to breakfast to inspect the very scene. In the meantime Mr. Gibbon had interpreted her "sweetness," and elegance, and all the compliments as so many proofs of the impression he was making upon her heart, and it seemed this occasion would do excellently to bring on a dénouement. After breakfast was over, he brought her out to look at the famous acacia-walk, and the view of lake and mountain which it commanded. She was enthusiastic in her delight, and expressed herself in all the raptures becoming admiration for scenery, when the historian affected to be suddenly jealous of the praise bestowed on such objects, and electrified her by an eloquent and passionate declaration, at the same time falling on his knees. The astonished lady could hardly understand at first; then burst into a fit of laughter. The situation must have been ludicrous indeed; the unwieldy lover still pouring out his vows, and she remaining some paces off, and trying to soothe him. At last he understood his mistake, and then she bade him get up. But this was impossible; gout, enormous fat, and rheumatism utterly incapacitated him. The brilliant lady, cruelly ignoring the romance of the situation, came to his aid and tried to raise him; but it was in vain; and it was determined that she should go for assistance, and give out that Gibbon had fallen. She went, and two stout peasants of the place came up, raised him between them, and landed him in his familiar easy-chair.—Appleton's Journal.

The Family Doctor.

RHEUMATISM.

ONCE more, mist and damp abound; and at such a time, many begin to suffer from aches and pains, which are put down, en masse, as "rheumatic." And, indeed, so much suffering is produced by "rheumatism," that we might as well know a little about it, and about the drugs, diet, and precautions best adapted for its cure or prevention. Three diseases are commonly classed under this name, yet differ widely from each other. There is "acute rheumatism," or rheumatic fever, chronic rheumatism, and muscular rheumatism.

RHEUMATIC FEVER is produced by cold and damp. Sudden exposure to chill after excessive heat, or undue endurance of rain and frost, are the main causes of this disease. Even these, however, will only induce it in those predisposed to it. For there can be no question that the tendency to this disease is hereditary. Those with rheumatic predispositions should take them into account, when they decide on the locality and the occupations in which their lives are to be spent.

THIS fever, like all others, is ushered in by shivering. Then follows great heat of the skin, and, what is most characteristic of the disease, the sufferer is bathed in a copious and sour-smelling perspiration. The pulse is rapid, the tongue furred, and the appetite impaired. There is rarely delirium, unless the heart become involved. Use of the thermometer would show the temperature of the skin to be extraordinarily high. Coincident with the above symptoms, one or more of the large joints become enlarged and inflamed; the skin over the joint may be reddened, and the joint is extremely painful—the slightest movement producing agony. In a short time, this joint may rapidly recover, and apparently resume its normal condition, but another will become affected in a similar manner, this shifting feature of the disease being usually well marked. Its whole tendency is to attack "fibrous" structures, and while it confines itself to these in the neighbourhoods of the joints, it is devoid of danger. But, unfortunately, it often attacks those around and within the heart. When this complication occurs, the patient is seized with palpitation, the breathing is oppressed, and a feeling of anxiety and alarm is experienced. Delirium may ensue.

ALL are agreed that this is a constitutional disease, but it is still a question what is the specific poison which causes it. It is certain that a large amount of lactic acid exists in the system during an attack of this fever. Animals that have been largely fed on lactic acid have had their joints affected in a similar manner.

THE treatment of so serious a malady should be at once entrusted to a medical man. But we may say that if a predisposed person suspects that through exposure, etc., an attack is impending, he should at once go to bed, and try to induce a free action of the skin. A glass of good gin largely diluted with hot water may be taken; though, when once the fever is begun, stimulants should be discarded, except, possibly, in cases where they have been habitually taken to excess. The patient should be kept warm, but not too warm. Except in cases where the patient is very weak, the diet should be low, consisting of milk, beef-tea, and farinaceous food. Bi-carbonate of soda or potash should be given every four hours in doses of thirty grains. Quinine is recommended by many. It can be given in two-grain doses, and may be combined with the potash or soda. To allay the thirst, lemon-juice may be freely taken; some recommend it as a specific. The affected joints should be wrapped up in cotton-wool. If the joint be very hot and swollen, some recommend applying compresses wrung out of cold water. This sometimes affords considerable relief. Moderate doses of castor-oil may be taken if required, but excessive purging is to be avoided. The patient should stay in bed for a week after the fever and pains have entirely gone, and the diet should continue simple and unstimulating for at least ten days after the fever has departed. Relapses are common.

If there is the slightest reason for suspecting that the heart is affected, there should be no delay in summoning medical aid. Rheumatic fever, though not immediately dangerous to life, is still to be carefully guarded against, for it lays the seeds of future suffering. Many of the distressing forms of heart-disease are traceable to an attack of this malady, it may be many years before. Further, an attack of this fever gives no security against a future attack, but, on the contrary, predisposes towards it. Those with such a tendency should avoid all food that is difficult of digestion, and should abstain from stimulants; no malt liquor should be taken. The proportion of animal food should be moderate; there should be care in the choice of a residence, etc. Cold, damp, and over-exertion should be avoided; warm clothing is essential. Each should select the kind of warm clothing in which he feels most comfortable. Anything which suppresses perspiration should be avoided, also anything which keeps the skin too moist. Flannel, woven silk, spun cotton, or an under-dress of chamois leather may be recommended.

SUB-ACUTE RHEUMATISM is a variety of the disease which occurs in young and weakly persons. It is very tedious. The fever is slight, and one or more joints continue affected for a long time with little or no deformity; instead of heat the affected parts often feel cold. Treatment resolves itself into employing every means to strengthen the general health. Quinine in two-grain doses and alkaline waters are useful.

CHRONIC ARTICULAR RHEUMATISM.—This affects old people, coming on gradually as age advances; but it may follow an attack of rheumatic fever. The smaller joints are attacked, and the tendency to shift is not so marked as in the acute disease. The parts around the affected joints become thickened, and so the joints grow stiff, and there may be a dull aching pain. The precautions already recommended may be taken. Baths are useful; warm baths, or the Turkish, salt-water, sulphur, or alkaline bath may be beneficial. The affected joints may be bathed locally. Rub them daily with some liniment, such as opium liniment. Shampooing and kneading them are beneficial. They ought to be kept bandaged, and the patient should be allowed a moderate amount of exercise. The internal remedies are numerous. Quinine, cod-liver oil, or tincture of iron—of the latter five to ten drops twice daily—are useful. Mineral waters, such as those of Bath, Harrogate, Buxton, or Cheltenham, are useful. Good, nourishing, and easily digested food is a necessity. A small quantity of alcoholic stimulant may be of benefit in some cases.

MUSCULAR RHEUMATISM is a local affection caused by cold, wet, or over-fatigue. A direct cold draught will produce it. The attack is usually sudden, or comes on during the night. In some cases the torture is intense. Sometimes the part or muscle may be slightly tender to touch, or it may only give pain when moved. There is no fever or constitutional symptoms save those induced by fatigue from want of sleep. The heart is never affected. When acute, this form of rheumatism passes off in a few days, but when it grows chronic the patient becomes a barometer, whose readings are registered by his pains. It may attack any of the voluntary muscles. In its varieties, it is called wry-neck, or stiff-neck, pleurodynia, or rheumatism of the chest walls, or lumbago, where the muscles of the small of the back are involved, which is a very common and painful form of muscular rheumatism. In acute cases, the chief point of treatment is to keep the affected part quiet and at rest. Hence it is well to apply a plaster—such as a belladonna plaster—of a size suited to the affected part. Warm fomentations sometimes give relief. A sub-cutaneous injection of morphia may be desirable, but should never be administered without medical assistance. A hot drink and wrapping up in blankets further the cure.

In chronic cases, quinine in two to three grain doses, or iodide of potassium in five-grain doses, three times a day, are among the best internal remedies. The iodide of potassium should be taken in a mixture, one drachm of the iodide dissolved in six ounces of water, and of this a tablespoonful may be taken thrice daily. It may be as well to remember that some people are very sensitive to this drug, and that such persons, on taking it, are troubled with symptoms which resemble the beginning of a cold in the head. Under these circumstances they should stop taking it, until these disagreeable symptoms disappear, and they should begin again with a teaspoonful of the above mixture thrice daily. In these chronic cases, ironing the affected part with a piece of brown paper put over the skin has proved useful. Of course, there are a great number of local applications which are recommended and may be tried, such as friction, shampooing, liniments—such as opium liniment—cold compresses, and sub-cutaneous injection of morphia.

WE may mention that a disease exists, which probably has no connection with rheumatism, yet is called rheumatic arthritis, which title simply means inflammation of a joint, as in rheumatism. It leads to great deformity of the affected joints and requires medical supervision.

In conclusion, it may be as well to utter a strong word of warning against the growing habit of using sleeping draughts for the relief of pain. In extreme cases, such narcotics are necessary, but anything like the formation of a habit of using them should be strenuously resisted. Such cure is worse than any disease.

SPECIALLY in connection with rheumatism, it is well to remember the adage that "Prevention is better than cure;" a little trouble in changing wet garments, a little care in passing from heated atmospheres into chilly ones, would often save many years wasted in agony. There is no prodigal so reprehensible as the prodigal who squanders health. Money may be said to be even harder to keep than to gain, health is certainly more easily kept than regained.

A Tiger's Jaws.

GRICE of the Twenty-sixth and I having obtained two months' leave of absence to kill tigers and panthers, made our preparations for the jungle, and started one day in March with a fine band, consisting of one big drum, one big bell, four small drums, and a pair of pistols always loaded with coarse powder and continually being let off. The noise of this concert would have been sufficient to frighten any animal out of the jungle; and, when it was not, we had some twenty or thirty men to set up supplementary yells. Our battery consisted of ten double guns—some of them rifles—and two brace of pistols. We began shooting the day after our start, at about nine in the morning, our plan being always to go some half a mile ahead of our beaters; and, having placed ourselves in some likely spot, to sit quietly, and (if possible) concealed, until they had beaten up to us. Owing to rain we saw nothing until the 22nd; when, after having walked some miles, we posted ourselves, guns and all, in a small tree, and put the beaters in. We had been in the tree about twenty minutes when Grice whispered to me—"Tiger!" I saw her almost at the same moment; we fired four barrels, all of which took effect. She charged with frightful speed right under the tree in which we were sitting, and was into the jungle in a moment. Immediately after, a peacock began calling, a sure sign of a tiger being near; and, sure enough, in another minute out came a small cub, about the size of a dog, and this Grice shot. We then began the ticklish work of "following up," generally done on elephants; but, not being rich enough to sport them, we had to go on foot. We traced our prey about half a mile into the jungle, which was so thick that one could not see more than ten yards ahead. I had separated about six or seven yards from Grice, and was looking down close to the ground, when I heard a frightful roar; and, literally before I had time to cock one barrel (I had imprudently gone into the jungle with my piece on half-cock), I felt myself jammed in the brute's jaws. She carried me about ten yards, my face, I believe, touching her cheek, when Grice, with wonderful presence of mind, put two bullets into her ear. She dropped, but still held me, when Grice running up, pulled me out of her mouth before she was actually dead. I am told that there was not two inches of space between my head and the spot where the bullets hit. Had Grice's hand shaken, I should have probably been shot through the head, as he had so very small a mark to fire at. I was perfectly conscious when pulled out of the brute's jaws.

The skin, of course, I kept as a trophy. It is nearly twelve feet long. The accident occurred fifty miles from camp; and if it had not been for Grice, Heaven knows how I should ever have got back; but he was well known to the natives, in fact they were afraid of him (his nickname was "Tiger Grice"), and he told them they would be well paid if they carried me to the next town, Jaat, about twelve miles off. After some little arrangement, they did carry me on my bed to Jaat, where Grice was almost worshipped, owing to his having, a year before, killed a tigress which had at different times killed twenty-four of the villagers, and at the time he shot her, she was in the act of eating an unfortunate woman. Twenty-four men were sent from camp with a palanquin to meet me. Grice rode all night by my side, to within a couple of miles of the camp, when he went back to continue his sport. I suffered great agony from the moment I was bitten, and a very clever doctor told me that if I had not had an iron constitution, it would have gone hard with me. As it was it took a long time before the wounds healed, and I was perfectly convalescent and able to go about.

Household Gardening.

We are now in the midst of the Chrysanthemum season, and those who have grown the plants well will have a feast of beauty such as has scarcely been surpassed at any period of the year. Beyond all doubt this is the queen of autumn flowers, and it is as much at home in and near towns as in remote country districts. It is even grown to greater perfection in the environs of cities than in village gardens, and it is on this account it has so many admirers. Wonderful are the magnificent blooms of the incurved varieties, which are almost as round as, and many of them, larger than, cricket-balls. They are also represented in a great variety of colour: golden-yellow, soft primrose, pure white, blush rose, pink, lilac, bronze, chestnut, and crimson. Those are varieties of the Chinese Chrysanthemum which have been improved and ennobled in this country. Then come the more modern, grotesque, and richer-coloured Japanese sorts that are so rapidly increasing in popularity. Some of these have round and twisted florets like gold and crimson threads, others have flat petals which hang like rich tassels that cannot be equalled either in delicacy of structure or richness of colour by the most costly textile fabrics. Besides, there are the distinct reflexed and anemone-flowered varieties, and the chaste and diminutive Pompons. There is thus a great diversity in form as well as a remarkable variety in colour of these beautiful November flowers. As many of our readers have never seen the finest examples of Chrysanthemum culture, they can have no conception of the full beauty of the flowers; but vast numbers of them need not long remain in ignorance, but may see them and admire.

CHRYSANTHEMUM SHOWS.

By these we do not mean the annual displays in the Temple Gardens, London, which admirably represent the Chrysanthemum as a city flower, and which can be seen free of charge throughout the month; nor do we allude to the excellent collections, open to the public, in the Victoria and Finsbury Parks of the metropolis, nor of the superior examples of culture at the Crystal Palace. All these are worthy of a visit, and are inspected by thousands of persons weekly. But the shows to which we would particularly direct attention are the annual exhibitions of the several Chrysanthemum societies which offer valuable prizes, including many silver cups, for the finest cut blooms and plants that can be produced.

There are many Chrysanthemum societies in the vicinity of the metropolis, and exhibitions are also held in most large cities and towns. Those, therefore, of our readers, and the number is undoubtedly great, who desire to see what can be done by skilful culture, have the opportunity of doing so, and those who avail themselves of the opportunity, and especially those who can visit the finest exhibitions, will, after they have seen them, thank us for directing attention to the subject.

It will be news to many, and probably to thousands, to learn that they are within reach of splendid displays of these flowers; and it may also be observed that they may be inspected in the evening as well as in the daytime, these exhibitions, unlike most others, showing to advantage under artificial light.

Yet we advise all who can do so to visit them in the afternoon, when the plants and flowers can be examined closely and inspected comfortably, as at night the crowd of persons is often so great as to render it difficult to see the stands; no shows, as a rule, being so well attended as these, except, perhaps, some notable Rose shows.

Some of the exhibitions to be held during the month are at Putney, the Westminster Aquarium, Kingston-on-Thames, Lambeth, Hampstead, Stoke Newington, and other places round the metropolis; also at Southampton, Northampton, Bath, Bristol, Birmingham, Liverpool, Lincoln, Newcastle, Manchester, and, in fact, in most large cities and towns, and the dates may be found by consulting the local papers.

Thus these beautiful autumnal displays of flowers are within easy reach of millions, and it is difficult to imagine any way in which an afternoon hour could be more agreeably spent. It is for this reason that we direct attention to these, the most bright and attractive of floral exhibitions.

MANAGEMENT OF THE PLANTS.

A great number of readers of these notes possess Chrysanthemums of their own, and desire to know in what way they can keep them fresh and healthy over the longest possible time.

In the first place they should be sheltered from rains, and no water should now be sprinkled on the foliage and flowers; then those under glass must have as much fresh air as possible—a close murky atmosphere is fatal to the flowers; neither must the air be parchingly dry.

Special attention must also be given to the question of moisture at the roots. The soil must never be allowed to become dry, but water should always be given in anticipation of that contingency, and with the object of preventing its occurrence. Dry soil means withering foliage and short-lived blooms.

Until the flowers are half expanded, liquid manure, such as soot-water, may be given with advantage, or Carter's Fertiliser may be sprinkled on the surface of the soil and watered in. This will intensify the colour of the blooms; but, when these are nearly open, pure, soft water will be all that is needed for their support.

The great enemy of these plants is the mildew, which covers the leaves as if dusted with flour. This is in reality a living parasite, which feeds on the sap and exhausts the plants. When examined through a microscope this mildew is seen to consist of myriads of mushroom-like growths, and if not promptly destroyed they will destroy the plants.

The remedy is sulphur. Damp the leaves slightly—a spray-diffuser being admirably adapted for this purpose—and if a little soft soap is dissolved in the water it will be all the better; then, when the leaves are wet, dredge them with sulphur until the mildew is covered. In twenty-four hours the enemy will be conquered, and the sulphur can be washed off again.

CHRYSANTHEMUMS IN WATER.

For furnishing vases for the adornment of rooms, no flowers are more suitable, and few last longer, than these. If cut just when they are fully opened, or a day or two before, and the stems placed in soft water, or inserted in sand and water just of the consistency to keep them upright, they will continue fresh for three weeks; but to ensure this they should be removed about twice a week, have an inch cut off the ends of the stems, and be given fresh water; all decayed leaves and mouldy petals to be carefully removed at the same time.

The reason why flowers keep better by having the ends of the stems cut off occasionally is this: The stems are full of small tubes, up which the water passes to support the bloom; but in time the natural decay of the ends of the stems closes the tubes and renders them inoperative; therefore, cutting off a small portion from time to time removes the decaying part, and the sap-vessels remain open for the transmission of the fluid. Now that the matter is explained, the advice that is given on this subject will be the better understood, and consequently the more readily adopted, to the well-being of the flowers and the satisfaction of their owners.

CROCUSES.

We have previously alluded to some of the most beautiful and deservedly popular of spring flowering bulbous plants, such as Hyacinths; but the bright and cheerful Crocuses must not be forgotten, as the bulbs are so cheap and the flowers so gay.

These are true flowers of the sun, and should therefore not be planted in shaded positions, nor should the planting be delayed. Some bulbs may make some growth before they are placed in the soil, and then succeed fairly well when planted; but Crocuses, if they make growth an inch or more long before being placed in pots or beds, cannot be relied on to grow satisfactorily afterwards. Thousands of bulbs are destroyed yearly by the practice of waiting until spring before purchasing, because they are then sold cheaply; they are, however, in reality dear, as not one in ten, even if it flowers, will make roots and form fresh bulbs for another year.

When grown in pots the bulbs should be placed closely together, just covered with soil and buried in ashes or cocoa-nut fibre refuse, as advised for Hyacinths, until the pots are filled with roots, and the top growths are stout and strong. Pots of yellow, purple, white, and striped Crocuses are very beautiful in sunny windows and greenhouses.

When planted in clumps in gardens the soil should be well forked up, so that the water passes freely through it, the bulbs then to be placed an inch or two apart, from six to twelve in a clump, and covered two inches deep with light soil; if embedded in a little sand or gritty matter of any kind it will be an advantage.

For forming a fringe to flower-beds and borders in sunny positions, Crocuses are admirably adapted. They should be planted in a double row, the bulbs being placed about two inches apart. When in flower they are charming, and afterwards the gracefully arching foliage forms an elegant fringe of dark green, which imparts a most agreeable finish to the beds, and shows to advantage the later flowers that it encircles.

A Noted Duellist.

ONE of the most famous duellists in the beginning of the present century, a period when duelling was of everyday occurrence, was the profligate and riotous peer, Lord Camelford. He was not only a duellist, but a boxer and a wild fellow upon town, notorious for his encounters and for his pugnacious disposition towards high and low; indeed, he was a veritable representative of the Mohocks of a century earlier.

In 1799 he savagely assaulted and wounded a gentleman in a riot at Drury Lane Theatre. Soon after he headed an attack on four "Charleys" in Cavendish Square, and maintained the struggle for an hour, when he and his associates were carried off, guarded by twenty armed watchmen. At the general peace in 1801, he came into collision with the mob, because he refused to light up his apartments in New Bond Street. He had, about the same time, a regular pugilistic encounter with a naval lieutenant in the lobby of the Royal Circus (now the Surrey Theatre), owing to the lieutenant having knocked off his hat, which he had neglected to remove when "God save the King" was being sung; and he became so great a terror to the town, that on a foppish young fellow, who had had some sort of encounter with him in a coffee-house, learning from the waiter who the stranger was, he speedily subsided from his vapouring, and stole out in a state of extreme terror, leaving untasted the wine he had just paid for.

It was after the encounter at the circus, that James and Horace Smith, who had seen the provocation his lordship had actually received, called on him to say that they were ready to testify to the fact in the event of legal proceedings being taken. They found the mantelpiece adorned with bludgeons, horsewhips, and other weapons of offence; and the noble lord, who received them with much cordiality, expressed his gratitude in a very characteristic manner. "All I can say in return is this," he exclaimed: "If ever I see either of you engaged in a row, upon my soul I'll stand by you."

Not very long after, in 1804, his violent career came to a violent close. He got into a quarrel with one Captain Best, and a meeting was arranged to take place the following morning in the fields behind Holland House. Best, who was an old friend, frequently endeavoured to come to an amicable understanding, but the other pertinaciously refused. The encounter resulted in Lord Camelford being mortally wounded. He was carried to Little Holland House, not far off, where he died three days after. With all his ruffianism, there must have been something generous in his nature, for, after he had fallen, he took the captain by the hand and said: "Best, I am a dead man; you have killed me, but I freely forgive you;" and he reproved some labourers who had run up and were endeavouring to detain his adversary, telling them that he himself had been the aggressor. Best had the reputation of being the finest shot in England; and, though Lord Camelford knew himself to be in the wrong, he refused to retract, fearing the imputation of cowardice. The scruple was mere vanity; but it serves to illustrate the half-insane character of the man.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

BLODWEN.—Write to Sampson Low, Marston, and Co. for their list of publications; you will then be able to make your own selection.

BOSCO.—Paxton's "Botanical Dictionary," price 25s., Bradbury.

CONSTANT READER.—The reason why one person should have a naturally hairy skin and another person a smooth one is not known. Constitutional peculiarities, race, climate, and heredity have their several effects. Nothing, at present, is known which can be used with safety to alter the texture of the skin so as to stop the production of hairs. If the superfluous hairs be inconvenient, shaving should be practised daily, or the depilatory which was recommended in our article, "On the Care of the Hair," can be cautiously employed. If properly applied, and the skin be not too tender, it will produce the same result as very fine shaving.

E. L. T.—Prevention in such a case is better than cure. Are there creepers such as ivy outside the house? At any rate you must find out the cause of the visitation and get rid of it.

FRANCES ALICE.—1. If you wish to have apple jelly of a rich red colour, you must have russet apples, which must not be ripe. The jelly, however, can be made of any firm, good cooking apple. Quarter, pare, and core the apples; put them in the preserving-kettle, with a pint of water to each pound, and boil gently until the apples are soft but not broken. Strain the juice through a napkin and boil for twenty minutes, taking off all scum as it rises. To each pint of the juice thus reduced put half a pound of lump sugar, and boil until it will jelly. If liked, a quince or two may be used, or a little lemon peel. 2. Your handwriting is legible, and for that reason we like it. See answer No. 2 to "Ram Shackle." 3. No reply has yet been given to the question of "O. K. K. B. W. P."

GUIDO FAWKES.—In "Murray's Modern Domestic Cookery," under the head of "Gingerbread," we find the following: "Take one pound of treacle, one pound of butter, two pounds of flour, one ounce of ground ginger, sliced candied orange, and a glass of brandy. If not intended to be rich, omit half the butter, the brandy and lemon, and make it of rye-flour, household-flour, or oatmeal. At Leeds it is made with equal quantities of oatmeal and treacle, mixed with an eighth part of melted butter and brown sugar, and one ounce of powdered ginger, with half that quantity of other spice, to four pounds of meal. This is called in that neighbourhood 'Parkin,' and is made in almost every cottage on the 6th of November, and pieces sent about as presents. The treacle should be perfectly sweet, for, if in the least degree sour or too thick, the bread will be indifferent in flavour and appearance. Ginger, too, should be fresh ground, as it loses much of its strength by keeping. When baked, the tin must be well buttered to make the cake come out; and when done, a fork if thrust into it will come out clean."

HERMIA.—You had better apply to Messrs. Silver and Co., 67, Cornhill, of whom you will get all the information you require; or you can procure their "Handbook to the Colonies," in which you will find every particular which can interest intending emigrants.

JOHN R. W. (Philadelphia).—Newbury kindly sends a copy of the verses for which you ask. He says: "I met with them in a magazine in a coffee-room in London upwards of thirty years ago, and have never seen them in print anywhere since." We will print the verses, which are entitled, "The Nautilus and the Ammonite," as soon as we have space. Can any correspondent tell us who is the author?

KITTY OF COLERAINE.—1. We will endeavour to find the quotation for you. 2. "Of" is from the Latin word confer, meaning compare. 3. Darby is an old name in Yorkshire. It is known to fame by the ballad of Darby and Joan, called "The Happy Old Couple."

LADY JANE.—The verses were written by John Ruskin at the age of sixteen, and are to be found in a very scarce volume of his poems printed for private circulation in 1850.

GOOD NIGHT.

She lays her down in beauty's light,—
Oh, peaceful may her slumbers be!
She cannot hear my breathed "Good Night,"
I cannot send it o'er the sea;
And though my thoughts be fleet and free
To fly to her with speed exceeding,
They cannot speak, she cannot see,
Those constant thoughts around her dwelling.

Thou planet pale, thou plaintive star!
Adown whose light the dew comes weeping;
Thou shinnest faint, but wondrous far;
Oh! surely thou behold'st her sleeping.
And though her eye thou canst not see
Beneath its arched fringes shrouded,
Thou pallid star! 'tis well for thee
That such a lustre be clouded.

Oh! haste thee then, thy rays are fleet,
And be thou, through her casement gleaming,
A starlight in her slumber sweet,
An influence of delightful dreaming.

Oh! is there no kind breeze to swell
Along thy silent looks of light,
And at her slumbrous ear to tell
Who sent thee there to say "Good Night!"

LEPUS.—You will find all you require in "Book of the Rabbit," 12s. 6d., Upcott Gill, 170, Strand. A useful little book, by the same publishers, is "Rabbits for Prizes and Profit," 2s. 6d.

LONGEVITY.—There are not many animals whose span of life is longer than that of man. Camels live from forty to fifty years; horses average from twenty-five to thirty; oxen about twenty; sheep eight or nine; and dogs twelve to fourteen. Concerning the ages attained by non-domesticated animals only a few isolated facts are known. The East Indians believe that the life period of the elephant is about three hundred years, instances being recorded of these animals having lived one hundred and thirty years in confinement after capture at an unknown age. Whales are estimated to reach the age of four hundred years. Some reptiles are very long-lived, an instance being furnished by a tortoise which was confined in 1633 and existed until 1753, when he perished by accident. Birds sometimes reach a great age, the eagle and the swan having been known to live one hundred years. The longevity of fishes is very remarkable. The carp has been known to live two hundred years, common river trout fifty years, and the pike ninety years; while Gesner relates that a pike caught in 1497 bore a ring recording the capture of the same fish two hundred and sixty-seven years before.

MADGE.—1. It is not likely that you could mend your ivory umbrella-handle yourself so as to make it serviceable. 2. We can only advise you to follow the directions given with Judson's dyes, and if you cannot succeed, to write to the maker for further instructions.

RAM SHACKLE.—1. You are probably thinking of Lloyd's Weekly London News. 2. As to "the best person to whom to write to have one's character told from one's handwriting," we can only say that our opinion of such persons is pretty much that entertained by Lord Dundreary, that "one is as good as another, perhaps better."

VULPUS.—1. A book entitled "Shorthand Systems," which includes, of course, Odell's, is published by L. Upcott Gill, price 1s. See answer to "Phonetic," HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 125. 2. "Ambulance Lectures," by Dr. Weatherly, 1s. (Griffith and Farran), would probably suit you. We are not aware that the questions have been printed. 3. Many thanks for your kind offer, of which we will avail ourselves should opportunity occur.

Puzzles for Prizes.

RULES.

1. Answers should be written on one side of the paper only, and should be posted so as to reach the office, 24, Great New Street, Fetter Lane, E.C., by the first delivery on the Tuesday after date of publication. Envelopes must be addressed, "The Puzzle Editor," and each answer must bear the nom de plume of the writer legibly written on the top of the first sheet.

2. A First Prize of TEN SHILLINGS and a Second Prize of FIVE SHILLINGS will be awarded each week to the best and second-best answers respectively to the two puzzles set. The Puzzle Editor reserves, however, the right of withholding either the First or Second Prize, or both, if, in his opinion, the answers received should not come up to the required standard of merit.

3. No winner of a First Prize will be eligible for another Prize during the same quarter. A winner of a Second Prize will be eligible for another Second Prize in the same quarter, but not for a First Prize.

4. Every Prize-winner must consent to send his or her name and address for publication.

5. The Puzzle Editor's decision is to be taken as final.

PUZZLES.

1. Five Duplicates.

We propose this week a task which our readers will find somewhat worrying and trying to the patience. It is to compose Five Duplicates, that is, sentences in which the letters at the beginning of certain words are duplicates of those at the end of the preceding word. The following example will better illustrate our meaning than further explanation: Papa patronised Edwin's institute. We shall afterwards give for solution a selection of the Puzzles that will be sent in. The duplicated syllables must be carefully underlined to facilitate examination.

2. Charade Word-Square.

The lights of the following Charade form a five-letter word-square.

My first, made with care, will your patience reward;
My second, if wise, you will not over-rate;
Do my third to the answer ('tis not very hard);
Of my fourth there's no end in this tolerant state;
My fifth in the plural, and free from pomade,
Add beauty and charm to a young woman's pate.

Prize-Winners in No. 129.

Three Equal Prizes, 5s. { "Acacia."
"Ethel May."
"Abracadabra."

All competitors are requested to send their names and addresses.

The Winner of the First Prize in No. 126, was Mrs. Clarence Joyce The Hops, Hookwood Common, Horley, Surrey ("Hookwood").

UNASKED RIDDLES.

1. Why is a twelvemonth tenancy like a very wide mouth? Because it goes from (y)ear to (y)ear.

2. What is the difference between a strawberry and the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes? One is a nice berry and the other Berenice.

3. What is the difference between a man who views a flydriver and one who interviews a lawyer? One sees a flyman and the other fees a sly man.

4. Why does a note of hand resemble the French for yes? Because one is an I O U and the other oui.

5. Why may a bargeman be said to weigh less than General Mite? Because he is a lighterman.

ACACIA.

1. Why is a very pronounced smile like poor Uncle Phulox's hair? Because it goes from (y)ear to (y)ear.

2. What is the difference between an illustrious lady of old and a ripe currant? One is a nice berry and the other is Berenice.

3. How does a person looking at the driver of a hired carriage differ from one who employs a private detective? One sees a flyman and the other fees a sly man.

4. Why does an Englishman's promise to pay differ from a Frenchman's word of consent? Because one is an I O U and the other oui?

5. Why would a Swede make a better bargeman than a Spaniard? Because he is a lighter man.

ETHEL MAY.

1. Why is an annual tenancy like a very broad grin? Because it goes from (y)ear to (y)ear.

2. How does a strawberry differ from the lady who was alone privileged to witness the Olympic Games? One is a nice berry and the other Berenice.

3. What is the difference between a gentleman looking at a cabman, and another who gives a cheque to a lawyer noted for sharp practice? One sees a flyman and the other fees a sly man.

4. Why is the memorandum of a debt unlike a French adverb of affirmation? Because one is an I O U and the other an oui.

5. Why is it probable that a bargeman, if he wrestled with another man, would come off second best? Because he is a lighterman.

ABRACADABRA.

The Riddles do not call for much remark. Those sent by "Irish Exile" are perhaps expressed with greater point and conciseness than the others, but as she is not eligible for another Prize during the present quarter, the Prizes are divided equally between "Abracadabra," "Acacia," and "Ethel May," there being very little difference between these answers. The same ideas have presented themselves to the minds of most competitors, but they have been expressed pithily by some and clumsily by others.

1. Why is a large mouth like an annuity? Because it goes from (y)ear to (y)ear.

2. What is the difference between a strawberry and a lady once famed for her fine hair? One is a nice berry and the other is Berenice.

3. What is the difference between one man hailing a cab and another tipping the railway-porter? One sees a flyman and the other fees a sly man.

4. What is the difference between a promise of money and a promise of marriage? Because one is an I O U and the other an oui.

5. Why should a bargee have a better chance than Fred Archer in riding a handicap? Because he is a lighterman.

IRISH EXILE.

1. Why is a telephone like a clock that needs winding only once in a century? Because it goes from (y)ear to (y)ear.

2. What is the difference between coffee and some Egyptian ruins? One is a nice berry and the other is Berenice.

3. What is the difference between a man hailing a cabdriver and a man paying a private detective? One sees a flyman and the other fees a sly man.

4. Why is a note of hand of no more value than a Frenchman's word of acknowledgment? Because one is an I O U and the other is an oui.

5. Why does a stout boatman, carrying a sack of coals on board a vessel, weigh less than the champion sculler. Because he is a lighterman.

AMBROSIA.

1. Why is "HOUSEHOLD WORDS" like "Humpty Dumpty's" mouth in "Through the Looking-Glass." Because it goes from (y)ear to (y)ear.

2. What is the difference between a strawberry and a lady with famous hair? One is a nice berry and the other is Berenice.

3. What is the difference between a small boy gazing at a cabby and a man paying his lawyer's fee? One sees a flyman and the other fees a sly man.

4. Why is a promissory note like a French affirmative? Because one is an I O U and the other an oui.

5. Why would a bargeman be a better jockey than Archer? Because he is a lighterman.

KATE.

1. Why is a broad grin like an almanac? Because it goes from (y)ear to (y)ear.

2. What is the difference between a gooseberry and an ancient queen? One is a nice berry and the other Berenice.

3. Why is one who hails a driver of a fly like one who pays a detective? One sees a flyman and the other fees a sly man.

4. Why is the acknowledgment of a debt like a French affirmative? Because one is an I O U and the other an oui.

5. Why would you rather carry a dock boatman than a sailor? Because he is a lighterman.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—CACKLE.—We should have replied to your letter, had we received it early enough for the answer to be of use to you. You will see the explanation in the answer to the Acrostic printed above. BROWN WREN AND JOHN STREAKS.—We regret very much that your papers have been destroyed. Had your request been sent a few days earlier it would have been in time.

Answers to Puzzles in No. 128 received too late from Lara, Conyn, and Bettina.

Odds and Ends.

DANIEL WILSON, Bishop of Calcutta, was a most eccentric old man. As usual, at family prayers, which he invariably conducted himself, he prayed by name for the people staying with him. There was a gentleman from Madras for whom he prayed, and then he said, "Let us pray for his dear wife and dear children." A thought struck him; he paused, and said to his chaplain, "By-the-bye, is he a married man?" "No, my lord, he is not married." "Ah well, never mind," he remarked, "he may marry, and the children may come." On another occasion it is related that he was preaching against the sin of avarice, when he delivered himself of the following remarks: "My brethren, there are several forms of avarice; one form has recently been brought home to me most unpleasantly. You all know my archdeacon there, a most excellent man. Well, last week he sold me a horse for five hundred rupees; it is not worth ten. This, my brethren, I consider a most unpleasant form of avarice."

A TEACHER finding it difficult to obtain the prompt attendance of the boys in her class resolved to adopt a plan which she felt sure would be successful. She said to the boys: "Now, I will give a bright penny to each one who will be in his place every Sunday." The plan seemed to work well until one Sunday not a boy appeared in his place. The teacher was surprised and somewhat discouraged that her plan had not succeeded. But the next day, while walking down the street and thinking what to do next, she met one of the boys and said to him: "Well, Johnnie, where were you yesterday?" "At home, mum." "But why did you and the other boys not come to Sunday-school and get your pennies?" "Oh, teacher, 'cause we've struck; we won't come for less than twopence now." We were not informed as to how long the strikers held out, or whether the advance was granted.

DR. YOUNG was walking in his garden at Welwyn in company with two ladies (one of whom he afterwards married), when the servant came to acquaint him that a gentleman wished to speak with him. As he refused to go, one lady took him by the right arm, the other by the left, and led him to the garden gate; when, finding resistance in vain, he bowed, laid his hand upon his heart, and spoke the following lines:

"Thus Adam look'd when from the garden driven,
And thus disputed orders sent from heaven.
Like him I go, but yet to go am loth;
Like him I go, for angels drove us both.
Hard was his fate, but mine is more unkind;
His Eve went with him, but mine stays behind."

At a period when hotels were fewer and less attractive in Peterhead than they are now, a native of the sunny south made a sojourn at the best one of the time. Before leaving he called for his bill—a request that somewhat puzzled the worthy landlord, who was not in the habit of giving written bills, nor by any means an adept of caligraphy. The traveller, however, was to be puzzled in return, for on glancing at the contents of the bill when produced, he was fairly put to a stand by the following entry: "Threepence for fash." "Fash!" exclaimed the indignant cockney, "what is that? I never got any fash." "Ou no, man," said the landlord coolly, "but ye gied some."

THE depressing intelligence comes from Washington that five years must elapse before the scientists have finished their calculations upon the transit of Venus. The announcement, no doubt, will cause considerable gloom, and the wheels of progress may be retarded by the delay, but as long as we can read in our scientific journals that, if a man had an arm long enough to touch the sun with his forefinger, the burning sensation would not reach his body during his lifetime, we shall try to worry along a few years without the transit calculations.

HORACE WALPOLE gives an instance of ready wit in a Paris fishwoman. The Dauphin having recovered from a serious illness, the "dames de la Halle" waited on the King (Louis XV.) to offer their congratulations. "What would have become of us had our dear Dauphin died?" said the spokeswoman; "we should have lost our all." "Yes," put in a second fishwoman, who observed the king's brow darken at this somewhat equivocal compliment to himself, "we should, indeed, have lost our all, for our good king would never have survived his son's death."

A SCOTCH minister was one day engaged in visiting some members of his congregation, and he came to the door of a house where his gentle tapping could not be heard for the noise of contention within. After waiting a little he opened the door and entered, saying, "I should be much obliged if you would tell me who is the head of this house?" "Weel, sir," said the husband and father, "if ye sit down a wee while maybe be able to tell ye, for we're just trying to settle that point."

DR. JOHNSON was very outspoken in his opinion regarding stupid people. Inveighing against a worthy but extremely foolish female acquaintance, a lady present reminded him that she was a very good woman, adding, "and I trust we shall meet her in Paradise." "Madam," roared the exasperated doctor, "I never desire to meet fools anywhere."

A FEW days ago two persons were heard disputing as to the meaning of the word "lampoon." The one accused the other of never having heard of the word before. "What! Do you think I have never heard of lampooning whales!" was the reply.

SOME medical writers maintain that it is conducive to health for a man to sleep with his head towards the north. Without enquiring closely, we may infer that it is but the natural result of the affinity that reaches from pole to pole.

"It is very sad," said a Scotchman, "to think on the number of the world's greatest men who have lately been called to their last account. And the fact is," added he, with unction, "I don't feel very well myself."

JAPAN is unnecessarily cruel to her police. A late press regulation compels editors to hold original manuscripts three weeks to permit their perusal by the police.

THERE is no music in a hat-band. This is, perhaps, the secret of their universal popularity.

HUME relates an amusing anecdote of the Earl of Dorset, in the seventeenth century, who was certainly an ingenious quietist. Some young gentlemen, known to the earl, had foolishly drunk "Confusion to the Archbishop," Laud being then at the height of his unpopularity. Information being laid before the Star Chamber, it might have gone hardly with the rash youths, but for the ingenuity of the Earl of Dorset, to whom they appealed for protection. Learning that the only witness against them was one of the drawers at the tavern, "Tush," he cried, "the drawer was mistaken; you drank confusion to the archbishop's enemies, and the fellow was gone before you pronounced the last word." It is needless to say that the young men adopted this kindly suggestion as their line of defence, and saved themselves from fine or imprisonment.

ONCE Tom Sheridan asked his father for a supply of cash. "Money I have none," was the reply. "But money I must have," said the other. "If that be so," said the affectionate parent, "you will find a case of loaded pistols upstairs and a horse ready saddled in the stable—the night is dark, and you are within half a mile of Hounslow Heath." "I understand what you mean," said Tom, "but I tried that last night. I unluckily stopped Peake, your treasurer, who told me that you had been beforehand with him, and had robbed him of every sixpence in the world."

WHEN Sir Joseph Napier was made Lord Chancellor in 1858, it was found that he was physically disqualified for the duties. To mend the inconvenience of his extreme deafness, however, he mastered, in advance of each case, all the documents connected with it, and the subsequent performance in court partook very much of the character of a dumb show, so far as the observation of Sir Joseph went. Years after he was appointed Judge of Appeal. "What!" exclaimed Mr. Justice Keogh, "a man who cannot hear the sound of his own bell, to make him the Judge of a Peal?"

IN Germany smoking is forbidden in certain aristocratic parks. An Englishman was walking in one of these places puffing a cigar, and accompanied by his servant. Suddenly a policeman halted him, and demanded the fine of ten marks for smoking. "Here is a twenty mark bill," replied John Bull. "But I can't give the change," replied the policeman. "Here is a cigar, John," said the Englishman to his servant, "you smoke off the other ten marks."

A LATE judge was a noted wag. A young lawyer was once making his first effort before him, and had thrown himself on the wings of his imagination far into the upper regions, and was seemingly preparing for a higher ascent, when the judge exclaimed: "Hold on, hold on, my dear sir! Don't go any higher, for you are already out of the jurisdiction of the court."

A CITY clerk has just proved that Paris green on certain kinds of pie is entirely harmless. It is the pie which is generally fatal.

Our Lucy.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

THE prettiest girl in the regiment—that's what she was, bless her! and as good as pretty, though I say it who ought to hold my tongue, perhaps, seeing that Lucy is my own daughter—the only child left to me and the missus, out of four. Yes, they're all of 'em gone except Lucy; but she's left to us still, and has little ones of her own now.

Of the other three, all boys, one died of croup before he was twelve months old; another was taken from us by cholera, poor little chap! but the third lived to be near seventeen—a fine, likely lad, who might have been alive still—poor Bob!—but for his own rashness.

No, I won't call it that neither, for it sounds like blaming him, and I don't mean to do that. He was always a venturesome little fellow; though as good as gold, in spite of being brought up in a rough school; and fond of all sorts of games and sports from the time he was first able to run about—cricket, football, running, and jumping, anything, in fact, in which he could use his limbs. But what he took most delight in was the water. He was a splendid swimmer, and never seemed to get tired. One day, poor lad, he miscalculated his strength. He was in the band of ours, and went out one morning with a party of his comrades for a swim in the Goomtee. We were stationed at Lucknow then. The Goomtee is not a particularly wide river just there in ordinary times; but it is deep, and the current swift and strong always, and after the monsoons, as it happened to be just then, the river swells to double its usual width, and runs like a mill-race.

Not far from the cantonments there is an old palace called Bibiapore, where the King of Oude formerly kept his womenkind, and in the garden that surrounds it—the Secundra Bagh—is a ghat, or landing-place for the boats that used to come up from the Chutter Munzil. Being dug out of the bank, it made a capital bathing-place out of the current, and most of the lads contented themselves with a dip there. But Bob and another, as venturesome as himself, swam across and made their way along the opposite bank to a bridge of boats nearly a mile up the river—towards the city, that is, and then they plunged in and raced down to where they had left their comrades. My boy was the conqueror, but not by a great distance, for they were pretty nearly matched. His opponent was rather put out at being beaten, and said it was only because my poor lad knew the river better than he, and had chosen the side where the current was swiftest, and challenged him to race part of the way back against stream.

Well, Bob accepted the challenge, though some of the more cautious among the party tried to dissuade them both from attempting such a severe trial of their strength, but neither would listen. They were good friends enough in all other ways, but there was a little rivalry and jealousy between them on this one point, and once more they plunged into the water to decide it.

Poor lads! Neither one nor the other came to the shore again alive. The stream was so swift and powerful, that, strong as they were, it was as much as they could do to make the least way against it. Still they kept on, till a shout from the watchers at the ghat told Bob that something was wrong. So there was; for the other lad was sinking. My boy made for him—bless his brave, good heart!—though it was right into the midst of a swirling, twisting eddy on the far side of the river, where it was deepest and swiftest. Those who were looking on could give no help, and under their eyes the two lads, exhausted as they already were, were swept struggling away, never to be seen alive again.

Ah well! it's many a long year ago now since that blow fell on us. We've got over it, of course; but it was heavy enough then—worse, I'rape, on the missus than me. We'd one thing to be proud and thankful for, though. Our lad had never in his short life given us a moment's trouble from any ill-doing, and he died bravely trying to save another from death. Another thing gave us some little comfort. We were afraid that we should never see him again, for it's a lonely country the river runs through for many miles after getting past Lucknow; and infested with reptiles in the water, to say nothing of tigers prowling about the banks, and carrion-birds by the hundred. I had been all through the Mutiny, and many a time seen such horrible sights that the mere remembrance of them made me shudder to think of poor Bob's remains meeting such a fate.

But, thank Heaven, that was spared us! The news of the sad accident was no sooner brought up to cantonments than the adjutant at once told off a search-party, and in less than a couple of hours afterwards my poor lad and his unfortunate companion were found, washed ashore and undisfigured, not more than half-a-dozen miles down the river; and though, as a general rule, only men belonging to the same troop follow a private soldier's funeral, the whole regiment was turned out by the Colonel's orders in honour of my Bob when he was carried to his last home.

But it was not of him, after all, that I began to tell my story, but of my girl Lucy, only when I mentioned his name I couldn't help retelling the manner in which he was lost to us, and so left her alone for our comfort.

And a comfort she was, to be sure, in every way, being then the only one left us. We didn't spoil her, though, on that account; but, indeed, I don't think if we'd tried to do so ever so hard it would have been any use, for she was the best child ever lived—clever, too; and for good looks—!

Well, for my part, I often puzzled me how she could have come by them. For good looks they were, mind you, not mere prettiness; and there's a deal of difference between the two. Why, she might have been a lady born, might Lucy, instead of the daughter of a rough sergeant of dragoons and his wife, who had worked too hard all her life to have soft, small, and well-shaped hands and feet and delicate features, like our girl, to say nothing of a figure and way of holding herself as she walked that a born princess mightn't have been ashamed of.

Perhaps it isn't quite the thing for me to be sounding her praises, but facts is facts, and, as I said at the beginning, and everyone gave in, that there wasn't another girl in the regiment as could hold a candle to our Lucy. And proud enough we were of her—her mother and me—I need scarcely say.

For all that, there came a time when we both of us felt rather uncomfortable about this very thing, though, and half wished she wasn't quite so different from the rest. It wasn't only that her face was pretty, you see, but her manner was so good, and, as I mentioned just now, she had such a way of carrying herself that no one could help noticing her. Perhaps my drilling her helped to that a little. I didn't see why a girl should stoop and not know how to carry her head any more than a boy, and knowing how many of them I'd changed in my time from lubberly slouching louts into smart-looking soldiers, I took her in hand the same way while she was young. I'd noticed, too, how nearly all the native women I saw had a stately way of holding their heads, from balancing pitchers upon them, and I taught her the same way, and she took to it quite natural.

Then she was clever, too, and taught herself by books a good deal more than was to be learnt in the regimental school, so that, what with one thing and another, as she grew up she came to look and behave like a little lady more and more every day, till, the truth is, I began to get uneasy—and so did the missus, too, for that matter—and afraid Lucy might grow discontented, and perhaps look down upon us for not being as well educated as herself.

But not a bit of it. I say again, she was as good as good could be, a more loving nor obedient daughter never lived; and as to another fear that we sometimes had, lest her good looks might prove a snare to her, why she never seemed even to know that she was beautiful, much less to give herself airs about it or seek for admiration.

But, if she wasn't aware of it, others soon found it out for themselves, and as Lucy grew out of girlhood and came to look more the woman every day, there was more than one tried to make up to her, amongst others a young subaltern of my troop, not long out from England, who was constantly making some excuse or other for dropping in at my bungalow at odd times.

It wasn't all at once that I took any particular notice of this—I was sergeant-major of the troop then, and the captain being away on leave up the hills, Mr. Conyers was left in charge during his absence. Of course all the real work was in my hands—keeping the books, issuing pay, looking after the discipline of the men, and so on, but Mr. Conyers, as a commissioned officer, was in command, and nominally responsible, so that it was quite natural that he should often have occasion to consult me, who knew more about the duties than he could possibly do, and if he was good-natured and easy-going enough to come to my quarters instead of making me attend him at his, it was not altogether so uncommon a thing as to seem strange.

So for a while I suspected nothing, and I don't believe anybody else in my place would either. Mr. Conyers was a fine, manly young fellow, but very little more than a lad after all, and meant no harm, I'm sure. But cantonment life in India is very dreary, especially during the hot months, when all who can possibly get leave are off to Simla, Kussowli, or some of those places in the hills, and only enough officers remain on the plains to do duty, and so, finding time hang very heavy on his hands, Mr. Conyers took it into his head to fall head over ears in love with our Lucy.

My eyes were opened at last, and as soon as they were I knew it would never do, of course. Mr. Conyers was not only my superior officer, he was rich and of good family, while I came of people only just a bit above the labouring class, and my wife's relations were nothing but small tradespeople. So when I first began to suspect the real reason of his taking so much interest in troop affairs, and being so anxious to see that all went straight that he was continually finding his way to my bungalow on some pretext, sometimes as often as two or three times a day, I watched a little more closely, and soon felt satisfied that my suspicions were correct.

I didn't have any trouble in this. For one reason, because Mr. Conyers was really too honest and frank to hide his motives as well as some men might have done, and it wasn't long before I saw as plain as could be that if I chose to take advantage of his folly I might have a gentleman for my son-in-law. There was no mistake about it, he meant honest. If he hadn't—if I'd thought he was seeking my little girl's ruin, it would have been worse for him, that's all.

But I'd no call to be afraid of that, as I soon found out.

I don't take long making up my mind about a thing when I once set about it. Straight ways and always above-board has been my motto through life, and I've mostly found 'em act best in the long run. It's much better to speak one's mind openly than go at it in a roundabout fashion, I say; so when I saw which way the wind was blowing, I made up my mind to put the stopper on at once before matters went too far, and tackled Mr. Conyers one evening after the men had left the horse-lines, and he and I were walking together across the parade-ground.

I didn't quite know how to open the ball when it came to the push after all, and felt a bit awkward, but he gave me a good chance, and I took it up sharp.

"There's the muster-roll to look over for to-morrow's parade, sergeant-major," says he, off-handed like. "I'd better step over with you to your quarters now and see that it's all in order."

"Very well, sir," says I, for the excuse was a fair one this time, but as soon as we got inside, I saw, by the way his eyes wandered round the room, what he was looking for. Lucy was not there, however, as she usually was. I had taken care of that, and I up and told him plump that it would be the same every time he came.

"What do you mean, Miles?" says he, stammering a little, and his face flushed up just like a girl's, and that's no bad sign, I take it, that a man's not a scoundrel at heart. "You surely don't think that I—"

I stopped him there, and told him quite plain just what I did think, and asked him, as a gentleman, to leave off paying attentions that could not be meant serious. At that he blazed up, and declared I insulted and wronged him. It was quite true, he said, he did love Lucy, and wasn't ashamed to own it. He cared nothing for difference of rank, or what the world might say, and, in short, ended by declaring that his firm intention was to make my daughter his wife if she would accept him.

Well, it was a temptation, and I shouldn't be telling the truth if I denied it. I hadn't quite lost my senses, however, if he had, and I told him that though I was proud enough of the honour he did Lucy by such a proposal, more particular as it proved him to be the gentleman I always took him for, that it wasn't to be thought of for a moment. His friends would never consent to it, I knew; and though he was so madly in love then, and so bent upon having his own way, that it would have been easy enough if I had been so minded to make sure of him by letting them get married on the sly, I couldn't bring myself to be a party to any such underhand doings. I told him this, too, and though he begged and prayed that he might be allowed to see Lucy herself, and plead his own cause with her, I held firm, and I thought then—I am quite sure now—I was right.

I dare say that plenty of men would have acted different, and small blame to 'em, p'raps; for it's not every day such a chance turns up to have one's daughter made a lady of. I don't deny that I was sore tempted, but I had sense enough to know that though money and position are very good things to have in this world, they are not all that are wanted for happiness, and that the chances were a good many to one that if Mr. Conyers had his way he'd very soon repent when he found his wife looked down upon by the people he belonged to, or, even supposing his love was a true one instead of the mere boyish fancy for a pretty face I took it to be, and that in time his wife's origin was forgotten and she was received in society, it could only be at the cost of giving up us, her parents, and becoming as much a stranger as though she had never belonged to us.

Still, I think I'd have risked even that to see our Lucy rich and respected if I'd thought it would give her happiness; and I told the missus what had happened, and asked her to try and find out whether our girl had any liking for Mr. Conyers. Indeed, we both of us sounded her on the subject, very carefully though, so as not to let her suspect what we were at, much less that matters had gone so far that he had actually asked for her hand, and the upshot of it was that I felt quite satisfied she not only didn't care a dump for him, but hadn't the least idea of the fancy he had got into his head.

And I wasn't sorry, for Lucy was only sixteen, after all, and much too young to my fancy to be troubling her head about love and marriage; and so I told my gentleman next day that it couldn't possibly be, and appealed to him again as a gentleman and a man of honour not to persist.

But I might just as well have talked to the wind. He insisted upon seeing Lucy; declared that nothing but her own word should induce him to give her up; and went on like a regular madman. I was at my wit's end what to do, for I couldn't shut the girl up, and sooner or later the young idiot—that's just what he was then, no better—would get to speak to her, and what good could that do except to upset her and make her uncomfortable? If we'd been at home, I might have sent her away for a time to some of my friends or her mother's, but out there it was impossible. I'd got a tidy little sum put by in the regimental savings bank, certainly, but not enough to spend on such an expensive business as sending her to England.

There was only way I could see out of the mess, and I took it. I went to the Colonel and told him all about the affair from beginning to end.

"You're quite right, sergeant-major," he said, when I'd finished. "If Mr. Conyers were an older man I should say let him please himself, but, as it is, such a match would most likely ruin all his prospects in life. However, make yourself easy, I'll take care you shall have no more trouble in the matter."

And Colonel Sartoris was as good as his word, for in less than a fortnight an order came down from the Commander-in-Chief's office at Simla detailing Sub-Lieutenant the Honourable Percy F. Conyers to proceed to Deolalee in charge of invalids and time-expired men who were going home that season, and the Colonel told me on the quiet, that private instructions from head-quarters had been forwarded to the invalid depôt that Mr. Conyers was to be told off for duty there during the season, so that there would be no chance of his returning to Lucknow for at least six months.

"And in that time," says the Colonel to me, "the young idiot will have come to his senses, most likely. Why, he'll be a peer one of these days, and though your daughter is pretty and good enough for any man, it would be folly to suppose that anything but misery could come of raising her so far above her station. However, I needn't point that out to you, Miles," he went on, quite friendly like, "your conduct in the matter has been that of an honourable man"—that's just his own words, though, for my part, I don't mind confessing that I'd thought more about Lucy's happiness than what people might think of me—"and depend upon it you will not regret it."

Well, the upshot was that Mr. Conyers went away—not without making several attempts to see Lucy, but I managed to keep so close a watch over her, without her once suspecting it, that they never met, and she didn't know till long afterwards how near a chance she'd had of being "my lady" if she'd liked. One thing I'm quite sure of, though. If that had come to pass, she wouldn't have been as happy as she is now, bless her heart.

But I shall come to that by-and-by. As I said, Mr. Conyers was gone at last, and I was more easy in my mind. Still, what had passed served to show that our little girl was no longer to be looked on as a child, that men would be seeking her, and I must make up my mind to losing her some day, and that soon, for in India it is a rare thing for any girl of marriageable age to have to wait long for an offer, and one wasn't a great while coming, that seemed to me suitable in every way.

Our trumpet-major, Stephen Redfern, was the man, and as far as I was concerned, there was no need for him to ask twice. He was a fine handsome fellow of about seven-and-twenty, a first-rate musician—indeed, he acted as bandmaster, and had been recommended for the post as soon as it was vacant—a well-educated man, and with the best of characters. Perhaps, however, I shouldn't have been in such a hurry to give my consent, only that I thought it would be much better that when Mr. Conyers came back he should find Lucy married. Anyhow, I told Redfern he had my best wishes, gave him every opportunity of settling it with Lucy, and all seemed to go just as we wished.

Certainly Lucy hung back a little at first. The fact is, she had known Steve ever since she was a toddling wee thing of five or six years old, and he, a trumpeter then, about ten years her senior, used to take her backwards and forwards to school. Then as she grew up, he was a constant visitor at my quarters, and little by little, he told me, love for her had crept into his heart. He was a good-looking fellow in his way, that many a girl would have jumped at, but he kept aloof from all but Lucy, though she, somehow, didn't seem to care for his attentions. This I put down to shyness, however, and both her mother and myself constantly sung his praises to her, till in the end she consented to become his wife.

They had known each other so long, that there was no need for any delay when the matter was once settled, and the wedding was fixed for Christmas, we then being in October. But when the time came it had to be put off after all, for our poor little girl was very ill with a low fever, and the doctor looked very grave over her.

It was nothing actually serious in itself, he said, for her constitution was sound, but he was afraid that another hot season might be dangerous, and advised, if it was at all possible, that she should be sent home by the long sea route for change of air.

As I have said, I had a little money put by, and I needn't say that I'd have spent every rupee of it to save our girl's life, and restore her to health, but there was no occasion to touch it, after all, for our major's wife, a delicate young lady, was going home for the same reason, so she offered to take Lucy with her as her maid, and to bring her out again the next year when she rejoined her husband.

Of course such a chance as that was too good to be thrown away, and though it was hard enough for us to part with her, it would have been harder still to lose her altogether, as the doctor said would most likely be the case if she stayed in India.

So we had to let her go, and Steve Redfern was obliged to wait another year for his wife.

CHAPTER II.

INSTEAD of twelve months, however, it was two years before our Lucy came back to us, and long and lonely enough the time seemed, I need hardly say, seeing we'd never lost sight of her before in her life for as much as a day. Poor Stephen, too, went about looking quite dismal, and seemed to take no pleasure in anything but getting to our place of an evening and talking to the missus about the one subject that was uppermost in their minds.

And in mine, too, as far as that goes, but then, of course, I'd plenty to attend to, having been promoted to regimental sergeant-major soon after Lucy went away. I didn't want to take the step at first, seeing that I'd a half suspicion as it was offered me as a sort of reward like, for what I'd done by Mr. Conyers and Lucy, but the Colonel assured me that he'd had me in his eye for the berth as soon as it was vacant all along, and as I knew that the only man senior to me really wasn't equal to it, being no drill, and worn out with long service, too, I made no more bones of the matter. It gave me a good deal more work, of course, but I didn't mind that, and a little later on Steve was appointed bandmaster, so we both got a bit of a rise in the world.

Meanwhile it was a long time before we heard any word from Lucy, or any news of the ship she went home in, being a sailing vessel that touched at no port; but as soon as she reached England, as she did quite safe, she wrote regular every mail (it was only once a fortnight then), generally to us, but sometimes specially to Steve instead, and he always brought her letters for me and the missus to read.

And there was no reason why he shouldn't. Affectionate enough they were, no doubt, but I sometimes fancied that if I'd been a young man and my promised wife was divided from me by thousands of miles, I should have liked something from her a little less matter-of-fact in style than the way our Lucy wrote to Stephen Redfern.

However, they seemed to satisfy him, which was the chief point, and, in return, never a mail left for England but carried with it a long letter from him to her.

So the time passed on, but at the end of the first year, when we were expecting soon to hear from Lucy that she had started on her return voyage, there came instead a letter from Mrs. Villiers to her husband, telling him that her doctor had advised another year's stay at home.

There was a message for me, too, to say that the same gentleman had seen our Lucy, and recommended a similar course in her case, as, though she was in perfect health then, her recovery was too recent to make it quite safe to expose herself so soon to the danger of a relapse.

There was no help for it, therefore, and it was settled she should remain the other year, part of which time—while the major's wife was travelling on the Continent—she was to spend with my only living relation, a sister who was comfortably married in Yorkshire, and to Riggdale Farm Lucy accordingly went in due course.

From there she still wrote very regularly, and at first as cheerfully as ever; but after a time both her mother and I began to notice a change, and her letters to Stephen grew less frequent. Her health was quite restored, she told us, and her aunt and uncle were both very kind to her. She had made a number of nice acquaintances, too, for my brother-in-law was pretty well-to-do in the world, and had many friends, and she felt almost sorry to have to leave a place where she had learned to be so happy, but that it would be to come back to her dear parents.

To Stephen she wrote less often, certainly, but her manner was altered. I thought then—and so did he, poor fellow!—that it was absence had wrought the change. There's an old song tells us that it "makes the heart grow fonder," and that's what we both thought had come to pass, for when she did write to him now it was as though there was no other thing she longed for more than to be back with him, and she made so many allusions to the subject that it was no wonder we were deceived.

For deceiving ourselves we were, all of us, or, I should say, being deceived by her. Not wilfully, though. Our Lucy was too honest-hearted a girl for that; but there's the truth, and it's got to be told.

She came back to us at last, just after the second Christmas she'd been away. Pretty and engaging she'd always been, but now she was beautiful—there's no other word for it. I went down to the station to meet her—a new line had just been opened up to us from Cawnpore—and I could hardly believe my eyes when she got out of the train and came towards me.

"Can this be our Lucy?" I says, taken quite aback, for she looked a lady, though her dress was plain and quiet enough, she never being a girl to trick herself out in finery above her station. "Can this be our Lucy?"

"Yes, father," she cried, sobbing a little as she flung her arms round my neck and gave me a hug; "come back to you again, your own Lucy."

And with that she burst out crying as though her heart was like to break. But between us, me and her mother managed to quiet her after a bit, and while the natives I had brought down with me were collecting her trunks, I went a few steps away and returned with Stephen, who had been waiting impatiently enough in the background till our first greetings were over, and thinking, I dare say, poor fellow! that his claim to welcome her was even greater than ours.

"Here's someone else to say how d'y'e do to, my dear," I says, and she looked without seeming to know him at first, for he wore a suit of coloured clothes—civilian's dress, I should say; but that's what we soldiers always call anything but regimentals—and Stephen seemed rather hurt, for he'd have known her anywhere, changed as she was, and in any dress, he said afterwards; and then she turned first pale and then red as she went up to him and put both her little hands into his.

"Stephen," she said, trying to smile, "I have come back to you, you see."

"Never to be parted again, darling," he answered, kissing her in front of everybody, and there was a good crowd at the station too, for we had got a draft out from the depot by the same ship that Lucy came in.

She blushed prettily, but allowed him to kiss her, though she drew away from him almost directly, and I noticed a sort of half-frightened, appealing expression in her eyes as she looked away behind me. There was something so odd in the glance that I turned my head sharp round, but could see nothing to account for it, except that there was a group of young fellows close by, and perhaps she hadn't liked to be kissed with them looking on, particularly as one of 'em, a smart, soldierly young chap, with as handsome a face as ever I saw, had got his eyes fixed straight on hers. Oddly enough, too, I fancied at the time, though I understood what it all meant afterwards, he was nearly as white as she turned then, but just at that moment the officer in charge of the draft gave the word for his men to fall in to march them up to cantonments, and there was a general bustle and confusion for a few moments, in the midst of which I lost sight of the man whose singular behaviour had attracted my notice, and the incident passed from my mind.

I needn't say how pleased me and the missus was to have Lucy with us once again, nor how we made much of her, and petted her to our hearts' content, particularly as we knew we should soon be called upon to give her up altogether, for there was no further reason for delaying her marriage now, and it was settled to take place in the beginning of February. I may as well mention here that Mr. Conyers was back with us, but all uneasiness on his account was at an end, for he was engaged to be married to a young lady whose acquaintance he had made at Nynee Tal the year before. However, that has nothing to do with my story except to show that I was quite right in the beginning in not trusting to his constancy.

Well, as I was saying, the wedding-day was fixed, and even earlier than we intended, by Lucy's own desire. She was as good and as affectionate as ever, but there was something about her manner that made me, and her mother too, feel uneasy. For one thing her spirits were so variable. At one moment she would seem all lightheartedness and full of fun, even feverishly gay, especially when Stephen was by, and then, all of a sudden, without any conceivable reason, just the opposite, regularly down in the dumps, and with not a word to throw at a dog, as the saying is.

We couldn't make it out, and there was no use questioning her. She was quite happy and contented—quite, she declared, or would be, at any rate, when all the excitement was over and she had settled down into her new life, and for a little while I was satisfied with her assurances and persuaded myself that it was nothing more than fancy that she was changed.

But I was soon to know better than that.

One night—it only wanted a little over a week then to the day that was to see her Stephen Redfern's wife—I went home rather late from the mess. My bungalow stood by itself in the middle of a compound, or garden, that I took rather a pride in, for there was a clump of fine mango-trees behind, and all round I had planted shrubs and flower-beds. The doors of the bungalow were all open, for the night was warm, and even in winter bolts and bars are things unknown, and under the verandah sat my missus, stitching at some finery for the approaching wedding—her fingers were never idle; she was always doing something. I was going towards her, when I fancied I saw something white gliding among the shrubs.

Now it chanced that, after a great deal of trouble, I had managed to rear some English roses of a fine variety just about that spot, and I was afraid that somebody might have taken a fancy to them, so I slipped quietly round another way, and reached a part of the compound in deep shadow, from where I could see whether my treasures were in danger.

They were quite safe. But what I did see gave me more concern than if every flower and shrub I had planted there and was so proud of had been uprooted and carried away.

My daughter—my little Lucy—was standing there, sobbing fit to break her heart, her head on the shoulder of a man whose arm was round her waist. My first impulse was to burst out upon 'em at once, but I held back, for I could see who he was—the same young fellow I had noticed at the station: a private in O troop, named Leonard Armstrong.

I can't call to mind now all the words that passed between them, nor does it matter. I heard quite sufficient to tell me that they had known each other for some time, that he was urging her to brave my anger and be true to him, but that she refused.

"I cannot, Leonard," I heard the poor girl cry; "I cannot! I told you before that though I loved you, I would never break my promise to the man I gave it to. Ah, why did you come here? Why did you follow me to tempt me so? It was cruel of you—cruel!"

And then she besought him to go, to leave her and forget her, but all the time she clung to him, poor child! in a way that showed me she could no more bear the thought of parting than himself, and I thought it was time to interfere.

I needn't describe their surprise when I stepped out into the moonlight, and I can't exactly remember now what I said, I was in such a state of misery; but Armstrong went away, and I took our Lucy in to her mother, and between the pair of us we soon got at the truth.

And bad enough it was.

Lucy had met Leonard Armstrong at Riggdale Farm, next to which lay his father's, and before long the two young people gave all their hearts to each other. There's the whole story in little. Our Lucy, however, when she discovered his meaning, told him honestly that she was already engaged, and though he would not take no for an answer, she had hoped that, when she left England, as she was soon to do, he would learn to forget her. Poor lass! she was sore tempted, she told us, for she loved Leonard dearly, but she thought of us, of Stephen's goodness, and resolved to do her duty.

It was this struggle in her mind that had brought about the change in her letters. Up till then she had thought that she loved poor Stephen, but the knowledge came to her too late that it was not so. Still, he had her promise, and she would keep it faithfully, as he deserved. So she returned to India, only to find in one of the draft that came out in the same ship the man she loved, and who loved her so much that he had left home and friends and enlisted for the purpose of being near her.

I tried to be angry, but I couldn't. What father could in such a case if he cared anything for his child?

It was about as hard a nut to crack as ever I had. As far as one thing went there was not much to choose between the two men. Indeed, Leonard would have been the better match, for he was his father's only son, and the old man farmed over four hundred acres of his own land. But that wasn't the point.

Lucy had given her promise—she would have been Stephen Redfern's wife long ago, indeed, but for the illness which sent her home—and she considered herself bound by it.

I didn't know what to say or do in the matter, that's the truth. On the one side there was my poor comrade to be considered. He had waited so long and so faithfully for Lucy, everything was ready for their wedding, and to tell him now, at the very last moment, that it must all be over between them!

How could I do such a thing?

But on the other hand there was my child's happiness to be considered, and that, after all, was of more consequence to me than twenty Stephen Redferns, however sorry I might be for him. Still, it was a hard fix to be placed in, and I got no sleep that night thinking of it, and what I should do.

And when morning came I was no nearer seeing my way clear. There was a brigade field-day, and I was, of course, regimental marker, but I made so many mistakes in taking up position that the adjutant rode up to me at last.

"Are you ill, sergeant-major?" he asked me, rather sharp, for I dare say he thought, maybe, I'd been drinking the night before, and not got over its effects. I told him no, but that I'd had something to trouble me very much, and really didn't feel fit for duty, so he gave me leave to fall out, and I rode home.

Lucy was not out of her own room. She and her mother had been up nearly all night, I found out. Altogether, it was a miserable time for all of us, and when after breakfast I saw Stephen coming across the parade-ground, and making straight for my bungalow, I'd willingly have given a month's pay to be out of the road.

But that couldn't be, I knew, and I waited till he came in, feeling that it was my duty to let him know the truth, but not knowing how in the world I was to set about it.

Poor fellow! One look at his face told me that he knew already. It was so sad, so pale, that he hardly seemed to be the same man.

There was no beating about the bush with either of us then.

"I want to see Lucy," he said—"to see her once more before I give her her promise back, and then say good-bye."

"Who told you?" I asked him. "I only found it out myself last night."

Then he explained how he had followed me from the mess, and passing my bungalow on the way to his own quarters had accidentally been an unseen witness of the scene I have described.

"I heard all that passed," he said, "and there's only one thing to be done now. Let me see Lucy, and speak to her myself. Don't be afraid, old fellow, I shan't reproach her. Poor girl! she has suffered enough as it is."

Of course I made Lucy come out to him, and there and then he rose up and spoke like the good, true, honest man that he was, and told her if she couldn't give him her heart he wouldn't take her hand without.

"I love you too well for that, my dear," he said, and strong man as he was, I could see he nearly broke down as he spoke the words. "I shall never care for anybody else, but I don't blame you. It was all my own fault, mistaking a girl's innocent liking for what I honestly believed it to be. I hope you'll be happy."

He didn't get any further, for Lucy burst into a perfect passion of tears, reproaching herself and declaring she was ready and willing to fulfil her promise, and for a moment there was a look of hope on his face, as though he was tempted to take her at her word.

But it died away again, and he shook his head with a sad smile.

"No," he said, "that would be bad for both of us. Worse for me even than the pain of giving you up, my dear. I'm not afraid but you'd do your duty, but that's not all a man looks for when he marries a woman; if he's worth being called a man. Can you give me your love? If we two kneel together in the church, and take the vows there that can never be unsaid as long as we live, the vow of heart's love till death shall part us, can you keep it?"

Poor girl! She could make no answer to that, only to weep, and beg him to forgive her, and after a few more words he went away, leaving her free.

Ah! a noble fellow he was, no doubt; but he told me afterwards that it hadn't been without a hard fight with himself that he was able to do what he thought right. There was murder in his mind, he said, when he saw the two together, and learned, all in a moment, that the happiness he'd so long been looking forward to, that seemed so near him till that moment, was never to be his.

But Steve Redfern was a man of a thousand, and saw the right thing and did it. He wouldn't take advantage of a girl's weakness to press her into a union which could only bring misery upon her and himself.

And that's about all there is to tell, I think, for it's not hard to guess what came afterwards. Still, I may as well make a proper wind-up, while I'm about it.

Of course, when it became known that not only was the match broken off between Stephen and our Lucy, but that she was going to marry Leonard Armstrong instead of the bandmaster, there was no end of wonderment and talk about it in the regiment. But it's no use trying to stop people's mouths, so we let them jaw as much as they liked, and took no notice. Our Lucy's a happy wife and mother now, with a daughter nearly as old as she was herself when Lieutenant Conyers—he's Lord Hylabroke now, and left the army a long while ago—fancied himself in love with her, though he soon consoled himself with another sweetheart better suited to his rank. And Stephen Redfern, too, got over his disappointment in time, and married happily enough, I'm glad to say. Perhaps that's not what one would call a romantic ending. He ought to have shot himself, or taken to drink and bad ways, and gone to the dogs, or something else desperate. But the truth is he didn't do anything of the kind, in which I think he showed more sense than if he'd gone moping through the world and making a misery of his life for the loss of a girl, even though she was such a one as "Our Lucy."

Last Night and To-day.

HARK ! to the thrilling bird of day,
As to the sky he gaily springs ;
Joy, joy ! the night has fled away,
And rosy dawn brings brighter things.
Gone are the shades and gone the gloom,
The golden sun is rising fast ;
And all the dew-filled flowers bloom
The brighter for the darkness past !
At eve my heart was sore oppress'd,
Because my love had proved unkind ;
But now a sort of charming zest,
At morn, in her caprices I find.
For who would love the calm blue sea,
If he had seen it not when stirred ?
And why should I down-hearted be,
Just for a fair girl's careless word ?
Sing on, oh birds, and shine, oh sun !
New hope comes with each cheering ray,
For dawn so brightly hath begun,
My fate I'll tempt again to-day !
There's courage in the morning light,
There's vigour in the morning air ;
I'll try again—the proverb's right,
"Faint heart ne'er yet won lady fair !"

His Own Guest.

(A SERIAL STORY.)

CHAPTER XXV.

It had been a busy day with Lady Meredith, who, once in a quarter, went through the household expenditure and ways and means generally.

On a small table beside her lay the still untouched luncheon, which, to save time, she had had sent up to her in her own room.

With a sigh she laid down her pen and pushed the book of figures, at which she had been at work, from her, upsetting, in so doing, a symmetrical pile of correspondence which she had read or written in connection with her quarterly audit.

It was a sigh that might have been interpreted as one of relief that the work was over, or one of regret that, whilst the expenditure of the Court had, owing to the election business, greatly increased, there was no corresponding increase in the receipts. It is true there was no absolute deficit in the banker's book ; but then, did not the creditor side of her son's account contain the following pithy entry by the banker's clerk : "Gordon, £2,000." And that money she knew had been lent upon security that no other creditor would have deemed sufficient, and at a rate that would have brought tears to the eyes of a West End money-lender.

Mr. Pennington had told her that Mr. Gordon had money lying idle, which he would be only too happy to know was being employed in returning a Conservative member to Parliament.

But easily as the necessary funds had been obtained, Lady Meredith reflected that, sooner or later, the amount, together with any further loan they would require, must be repaid ; and the more she thought over the matter, the more she approved of the steps she had taken to prevent her son marrying a woman without a fortune.

To obtain her boy a position which she deemed worthy of him, Lady Meredith had hesitated at sacrificing no person or thing, and she felt that the time had come for sacrificing, in his own interests, the feelings of the son himself. In response to her sigh came one from Mrs. Tuttle Morgan, who was imitatively laying aside her tating-needles as Lady Meredith had her pen.

"What on earth, Rubina, is the matter with you ?" asked her ladyship querulously, accentuating the "you."

"I was thinking, dear, how tired you must be. Can I help you any further ?"

The reply was soft enough to turn away even wrath, and Lady Meredith could not repress a smile when she thought in what Rubina's help had consisted.

The previous evening the Court people had been Mrs. Tuttle

Morgan's guests, and Lady Meredith had mentioned she must leave early, as she had a tiring day's work to get through on the morrow.

That was enough for Rubina. She felt that it was her duty to share her friend's burden, and so, after routing out of their beds her own servants as soon as it was daybreak, she found herself at Meredith Court long before its mistress was awake.

From a pleasant slumber Lady Meredith was roused by Rubina's audibly stealthy tread as she entered her friend's room. The visitor, when the bell for breakfast sounded, was not forthcoming, and the meal was delayed whilst she was being searched for, and ultimately found fast asleep in the library over a book of poems, her unusually early rising having caused her to fall into an untimely slumber.

When breakfast was over the pair retired to the hostess's sanctum. But far from being a help, Lady Meredith found Rubina a hindrance, and in order to keep her innocuously employed, gave her a packet of letters in ungummed envelopes to seal. Even in this slight undertaking the unhappy Rubina's good intentions seemed to persistently go awry. Lady Meredith soon put a stop to an operation which consisted in her amanuensis enclosing cheques to tradesmen, and sealing them with a seal which hung on her chataleine, and had for device a dove carrying a four-cornered note, with the device, "This to my love."

After a while the conversation turned into the—to Lady Meredith—congenial topic of the election.

"You have heard," said her ladyship, "that there is a probability of there being no opposition to Sir Charles Meredith's election ?"

"No ; that is good news. I suppose that as soon as the matter is settled, Charles"—Rubina always spoke of her old pupil by his christian-name, and without the prefix of his title—"will take chambers in town ?"

"Unless he marries and takes a house there," replied Lady Meredith.

"They will make a charming couple," observed Rubina gushingly ; "but will the estate be able to bear the extra expense ?"

"Who do you mean by 'they' ?" Lady Meredith queried sharply.

"Charles and Mary, to be sure."

"Oh, I have not put a stop to this matter any too soon," thought her ladyship. "If Rubina has noticed it, then it must be the talk of the county. My good Rubina," she said aloud, "I don't know what put such nonsense into your head ! My son, when he marries, must wed a fortune, and as for Mary, surely you must have noticed Colonel Skooter's attentions in that quarter."

"Colonel Skooter !" ejaculated Rubina, fairly taken by surprise.

"Yes ; he is peculiar, I admit, but wealthy, I believe. Of course, before I gave my consent to an engagement between him and Mary, I should take care to change belief into certainty as to his power of providing comfortably for her. Until my death, Mary has absolutely no fortune, and what I can leave her is but just sufficient to make her independent of her husband for pin-money. I have let Colonel Skooter know this."

"Has the brute asked you for her hand, then ?"

Rubina had not forgotten or forgiven the pointed allusion the colonel had made at the dinner-table relative to marrying grandmothers.

"No, he has not asked me, but I plainly saw the drift of certain questions he put indirectly to me. Mary is a pretty girl, and is as charming and good as she is pretty. To any man who is not absolutely obliged to marry a fortune, she would be invaluable."

"And Charles ?"

"His affection, for Mary, brought up as they have been, is quite natural, and, if he has ever thought of marriage in connection with it, he will on matters being put before him in a proper light see it is impossible."

"I will put them before him," said Rubina resolutely.

"I trust you will not mention a word on the subject to him," exclaimed Lady Meredith in alarm. "What is necessary to be said I will say. I have invited Colonel Skooter over to dinner here to-day ; if he proposes to Mary, I trust to your good offices to show her the advantage of accepting him so far as referring him to me for my consent goes. I will see, before giving it, that it is not a man of straw she marries."

Ready as Rubina usually was to obey the wishes of one whom she still continued to regard as her patroness, she gave but very reluctant assent to the present request. She really had a great affection for Mary Ray, although it was of a very different kind to her almost worshipping admiration of Lady Meredith, and she had a great dislike to the American ; added to this, with a woman's instinct for scenting out a love-affair, she had divined something of the position of affairs between Edith Pennington and Mr. Gordon, and it is not astonishing that what Rubina was pleased to call her brain had got into as great a tangle as the tating which now lay unheeded in her lap, and that she welcomed the sound of the dressing-bell as an excuse to get away to the room which was set apart as hers whenever she was a visitor even for a day at Meredith Court, there to think matters over quietly.

In the meanwhile Sir Charles had been playing the part of host to Colonel Skooter, who, upon the strength of an invitation to dinner, had looked in, as he termed it, early in the day, and been kept to luncheon. Later on the Penningtons had come to pay Lady Meredith a call, and were easily persuaded by Sir Charles to join their dinner-party in spite of Mr. Pennington's protestations that they were not in evening dress.

That morning Sir Charles had received a telegram summoning him to the chambers of a very dear old schoolfellow, who had been taken suddenly ill, and had no relations in England and no friend sufficiently intimate for him to ask to come at a moment's notice but Sir Charles.

Of this telegram Lady Meredith knew nothing, as it had arrived after she had gone off to her room with the accounts. In due course she would tell her son how money matters stood, but he never troubled himself to go into details which she had managed during his minority, and which her love of authority made her loth to resign even to him. It was an understood thing that only most pressing matters outside those connected with the audit should disturb her ladyship.

That evening, Charles was resolved to refute his mother's statement relative to Mary Ray's partiality for the colonel by asking the girl to become his wife, and the fact of the Penningtons remaining would, after dinner, engross Lady Meredith's attention as hostess, and so give him a chance of a little à l'été with Mary.

As yet, at her aunt's request, she had not mentioned the fact of her approaching visit to the Harkers, and she was even at that moment packing up her things in her own room. Lady Meredith would incidentally mention the fact of the invitation at dinner, and invent an excuse for Mary's going at so short a notice.

Edith, hearing her friend was upstairs, proposed going to join her, but Gordon begged for a match at lawn-tennis before she removed her hat, as the afternoon was yet young, and Sir Charles and the colonel had arranged for a ride before dinner.

"And what is to become of me?" asked Mr. Pennington.

"Why, settle yourself quietly in this chair," said Edith, putting her father into as comfortable a looking one as ever beguiled elderly gentleman into an afternoon nap, "and finish the paper which you had not time to get through at breakfast, and brought away in your pocket."

"Anything interesting in it?" asked Colonel Skooter.

"Parliament is not sitting, colonel, so papa is sure to say no. I had a good long read at it before he came down to breakfast."

"And found it interesting for that very reason, I'll be bound. What woman ever cares for Parliamentary intelligence?" teased Mr. Pennington.

"Intelligence! Perhaps it's the want of it that makes the subject so uninteresting, but when we get Sir Charles in we shall cry, 'Nous avons changé tout cela'—eh, Charley?" laughed Edith.

"When a woman takes up the paper she commences with the agony column, generally skips all the intermediate part between that and births and marriages, and winds up with deaths," said Mr. Pennington, returning to the charge.

"And, pray, what could be more appropriate, sir?" asked Edith. "By the way," turning to the colonel, "I understand you were nearly figuring in one of what papa calls my favourite columns."

"Which was that—the marriage one?"

"No, colonel, the obituary; I hear Charley's horse Satin was too much for you when you tried him yesterday. I hope you are not going out upon him again this afternoon?"

"Not exactly, miss. I ought never to have trusted myself on a horse with such a name."

"It's a fine animal, and I thought I heard Colonel Skooter say that when he got on a good thing he always stuck to it."

"Well, I guess there's always exceptions. This brute of Meredith's doubled itself up like a two-foot rule, and sat me on the grass. S'pose it's a nat'ral gift he's got of sending folks flyin' all over the scenery!"

"Folks that he doesn't know he always tries to master. Satin is a cunning old hand," said Gordon.

Sir Charles looked surprised, and Mr. Pennington from behind his paper shook his head warningly at the speaker for exhibiting a knowledge of an animal which, as Gordon, he had never ridden.

The former, however, assumed he must have heard the horse's dislike to a strange hand upon his bridle from one of the grooms.

This slip the colonel, however, either did not or appeared not to notice.

"I warned Colonel Skooter against riding him," said Sir Charles apologetically; "but when I told him he had been over twenty years in our stables, he wouldn't believe but that he could manage him."

"And ther ain't many things that I can't ride, from a Jerusalem pony to an express car; but this animal flew off with such orful rapidity that one minnit I seemed up among the birds, and the next down among the reptiles. The stormy petrel as can fly when he's put to it seemed warring for the mastery with the humble lizard. I did my level best—"

"And found it," laughed Gordon.

The colonel glared at the speaker. He had no objection to making a joke at his own expense, but he was not partial to other people doing so, and that Gordon should take it upon himself to laugh at him was most distasteful to his feelings. There was no love on his part towards the man he had known out in Mexico, and who was acquainted with some of his shady transactions.

"You had better be careful, sir. Those who make fun of Colonel Skooter must look out for trouble."

"Come, come, Colonel Skooter, you must not take offence at Gordon's good-natured chaff," said Sir Charles.

"Waal, I can't see the good-nature in any chaff; it's so selfish; the fun is all on one side," observed the colonel sulkily. "If I'd have had my way, that horse's nearest relations would have been widder and orfans before bed-time."

"Come, forgive and forget, Colonel Skooter," broke in Mr. Pennington.

"It ain't possible to do one in a hurry, and I ain't in a hurry to do the other, Mr. Pennington, when I'm hurt, whether it's in my body or in my feelin's. I may bide my time, but I never lose my opportunity."

The latter part of the sentence, and the malevolent glance which accompanied it, were evidently pointed at Gordon.

During much of the above conversation Edith had not been present, having passed out of the open French-window—although the autumn was somewhat advanced, the weather was bright and warm—to survey the state of the lawn; she now returned, tennis-bat in hand.

"What are you men squabbling about?" she asked. "Is Colonel Skooter still—"

"Trying to ride the high horse—yes," replied Gordon maliciously.

"Come, Miss Pennington, let us go to our game."

"You are in a hurry for another defeat again to-day, Mr. Gordon," said Sir Charles, hoping to turn the conversation into a more pleasant channel for his American guest, although at heart both his defeat by the old family pet and Gordon's chaff amused him.

"When a man lets a lady win, it's hard to be taunted with it," said Gordon.

"You let me win—eh?" asked Edith sarcastically.

"Didn't you win?"

"Yes."

"Well, that proves it."

"Come, then, and take your revenge."

With this invitation Edith walked towards the window again; this time Gordon following.

"Yes, revenge is sweet," said Edith's companion when they were in the grounds.

"How do you know? You have never taken it—at least, not of me at tennis."

"Ah, tennis is very much like real life—one makes love and the other makes game of it."

"Making love at tennis seems your strong point. I think it was at tennis you first made love to me," said Edith archly.

"And you game of me," replied Gordon.

"Come and make love again," laughed the girl, walking backwards, and holding her bat before her face as she smiled one of those bright arch smiles for which Edith Pennington was famous.

"What, not content with conquering me the other day, you want to do so again," said Gordon, accepting the tantalising invitation.

"I declare," he resumed after a lengthened pause, "you must be photographed like that. You looked a living picture—art and nature combined—frame and all complete."

"Photographed like what, sir?" Edith asked saucily.

"I was harking back a bit," said Gordon.

"Beginning again where you should have left off," retorted Edith.

And the happy pair played their game and commenced another, and harked back a good deal, whilst the evening shadows gathered, and the gold, purple, and russet leaves fell from the trees and fluttered about them like a host of night butterflies.

Gordon for the moment gave himself up to the enchantment of the situation, and accepted Edith's decision that if he would not ask her before the world to be his wife until he had freed himself from the accusation which Lady Meredith had brought against him, yet that she would not release him from the burden, as she called it, of her lot being cast in with his.

In these circumstances it is not surprising that the equestrians got back from their excursion by the door, sooner than the lovers came in by the window.

Mr. Pennington had fallen asleep, and at his feet lay the newspaper he had been reading.

Colonel Skooter awoke the one, and picked up and pocketed the other.

He had not read a paper that day, and it would be something to do on reaching home, before he went to bed.

In the advertisement columns was this notice, which none of the party had as yet seen :

"If T. M., who left England and went to New York by the Corrie Roy, in 188—, where he passed under the name of Smith, and has subsequently been heard of in Mexico, will communicate with Messrs. W. and F. Ridge, 217, Broadway, New York, he will hear of something to his advantage.

Arnold.

(A STORY IN FOUR WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER III.

"I WONDER how much longer you are going to keep me waiting, Dickie?"

"For what, Uncle Arnold?"

"For a certain confidence of yours, promised me, I can hardly remember how many weeks ago."

"You never asked me again."

"I never press any one's confidence. I thought you would tell me of your own accord."

"Proud thing! But you have descended to worse than that now!"

"Worse?"

"Yes; hinting is a great deal worse than asking right out."

"Well, we will waive the argument and come to the point."

"A very nice way of getting out of it!" she laughed.

We were standing together on a lofty ridge of ground in the West End Park. Down at our feet, and stretching far around, lay the crowded city, the topmost windows of whose grimy houses were burnished with the rays of the setting sun. Up to our perch ascended the murmur of voices, the subdued roar of traffic, the thousand and one sounds of city life, blended all together by the distance into a vague, soothing buzz, save when ever and anon a cry from a pair of lusty lungs, or the sharp bark of a dog, broke into the dreamy monotony for a moment, and then died away.

July was far advanced, but the grass was yet fresh and green beneath our feet, and every tree was in full leaf. Around us and on every hand the dark Scotch firs rose up like huge grim sentinels. Dickie sometimes declared that the stern unbending aspect of these dusky trees frightened her; and when we walked in the park—as we frequently did when the slow summer twilight was drawing on—she would run and peep behind the nearest ones, as though she expected to come upon some grim apparition in hiding, and then hasten back to me and cling to my arm half-laughingly, half-timidly, paling and flushing the while with that suddenness that was peculiar to her, and which formed one of her greatest charms. For she seemed as full of charms as the greatest beauty that was ever photographed; and yet, if I did but look into her, I could scarcely find a single one. A more ordinary girl, when unanimated, could hardly have been found in all the teeming city. She was not ugly; her features harmonised well; and that was all that could be said for her. Yet there were few who escaped her witchery, which, nevertheless, was exercised with perfect unconsciousness, otherwise she would probably have been less irresistible.

"Let us go and sit down a little while," I proposed, looking back towards a seat which stood a few yards behind us.

"Very well," she acquiesced. "I like to see the sunset, and we shall see it here."

We sat down, surrounded, as far as we could see before us, by nothing but sky—wide, roseate-tinted sky—cut off, as it seemed, from the rest of the world. I glanced at the face beside me. It was so serenely content that I could not refrain from speaking of what was in my mind:

"Dickie, you look very happy, and yet I hardly dare to believe that you can be contented in this black, smoky place after your pretty suburban home—with our quiet, uneventful life—"

"Contented, Uncle Arnold!" she interrupted. "I am more than content—I am very, very happy—happier than I have been, oh, for a long time! I want only one thing now."

She held one of my hands in both of hers as she spoke, and looked at me with the smile of an angel.

"And what is that?"

"A letter from father. How soon do you think I might expect to hear?"

"Oh, any day now. But, Dickie, I expected a very different answer to my question."

"Why, what do you mean?"

She looked up without a shadow of consciousness in her clear, questioning gaze.

"I thought you meant that you could never be quite happy while one person was absent from your side. You know whom I mean."

She looked at me again, and then smiled and cast down her eyes, flushing a little.

"How can I know, Uncle Arnold?"

"You know. You know I mean that 'Arnold'—the fellow for whose sake you love that name." I spoke half jealously, half angrily—perhaps more so than I was aware of.

She laughed.

"Uncle Arnold, don't ever talk to me again about women jumping to conclusions. You have chosen to assume that there is an 'Arnold,' dropping her voice a little on the name. 'I never said there was one.'"

"No, but you never denied it—you have tacitly admitted it."

There was silence for a few minutes, while the sun shot his red parting rays across the girl's bent head and into my eyes. Nobody was in sight. We were in an unfrequented part of the park, and though footsteps and voices could be heard at no great distance, there was nothing to be seen save the wide sunset sky above and the rocky eminence upon which our feet rested. I put my hand half affectionately, half encouragingly, upon her shoulder.

"Was he very handsome, Dickie?"

"I—I think he was," she replied in subdued tones. "Oh yes, he was. Everybody said so."

"And what did Miles say to it? Did he know him?"

"Father? Oh no; he did not know him; he never saw him. I met him at the house of a friend with whom I was staying."

"And he knows nothing?"

"There was nothing for him to know. See here, Uncle Arnold, I will tell you all about it, and then you mustn't always be talking about him, because it doesn't do a bit of good."

I told myself, bitterly, that she loved him so much that she could not bear to hear his name pronounced by careless lips.

"What are you looking like that for, Uncle Arnold?" she demanded, looking up at me with the air of confident affection that she frequently assumed, and which made my long-unstirred heart beat wildly against my breast.

"Like what?"

"Oh, as if you were going to bite a piece right out of me. But it's gone now, so I'll look over it this once."

"About Arnold," I reminded her.

"Well, two years ago 'come August,' as the washerwomen say," stopping to laugh.

"You would never hear that expression about here."

"No; but then, you see, I'm a real bond fide Londoner, and have brought away some charming cockney vulgarisms with which to spice my conversation and astonish the natives."

"Come now—to the point."

"Two summers ago I went to stay with an old friend of my mother's, who lives in the country. Father was glad for me to go, to get the change of air and enjoy myself, as he thought, and so did I, at first. There I met Arnold. He seemed to like me directly, and we became great friends. I soon liked him very much too, and—I don't want to seem conceited, Uncle Arnold, but I am telling you things as they really happened—he did not seem to care to be with anybody else; he—he made no secret of his liking for me. But Mrs.—no, I won't tell you her name—it isn't fair, when I am telling the story against her, as it were—was very angry about it; she tried to keep him away from me, and when he wouldn't be kept—you see the two families were very old friends, so that he was almost like a son of the house, and did not stand so much upon ceremony as a stranger must have done—she made the place too hot to hold him, and soon succeeded in getting rid of him. Of course he couldn't stay on when he was openly told to go. She wrote to his mother, I know, and made a breach between her and him. She did not care what trouble she made, so that she succeeded in separating us."

"But why? What objection had she? I should have thought that, as an old friend of your mother's, she would have taken pleasure in seeing you nicely settled. Was he not eligible?"

"Oh yes, he was very well off. His mother had estates in France, which would come to him at her death. But you see the lady had a daughter, and she wanted him for her. She, the daughter, was very pretty indeed, but, no doubt through having known her from a baby, and seeing her so often, Arnold did not seem so impressed by her beauty as her mother wished, so— Oh, Uncle Arnold, don't think me malicious and uncharitable!"

"You need not be afraid, dear. Every word you have uttered goes to prove the very opposite of that."

"Well, you know, I have eyes and ears, and an average amount of perception, I suppose. I could not help seeing, very soon, that I had been asked down there as a—a sort of foil to the daughter's beauty. The lady knew I was plain—she had not seen me for two or three years, but she knew I could not have grown pretty—nothing could make me that."

I clenched my teeth and my hands, and my heart throbbed with passionate anger as I pictured to myself the mortification to which the dainty, delicate girl must have been subjected at the hands of the selfish, designing woman. She did not notice my emotion. She went on slowly, as if to herself:

"She thought the great, immense difference between us would strike him, and that his eyes would be opened to her daughter's loveliness by the comparison. But when he cared for me she was so angry that she scarcely tried to conceal her scheme. She was one of those people who can form plans, and carry them out, too, as long as nobody contradicts them, but who have not sufficient coolness to persevere in the face of opposition. She 'threw down her cards,' as people say, not washerwomen though," smiling a little, "in a rage, and we, I especially, could not help seeing what was on them. Arnold, being a man, was not so quick-sighted," she added a little slyly.

But I did not smile at her sally; I was too deep in bitter rumination over her simply-told little story. Perhaps I was ultra-sensitive; certain it is that the sorrows of one whom I already loved with an absorbing affection—though of what nature that affection might be I had scarcely as yet attempted to analyse—caused me far keener pain than it seemed to give her to recount them.

"So poor Arnold was driven away," she continued; "but I don't think he had any idea that we should never meet again. I know I expected to see him again soon, though I did not know how it was to come about; but I didn't trouble about that then. After he was gone she did not trouble herself to be unkind to me, and I finished my visit on father's account, because he would wonder if I returned sooner than I was to have done, and I wanted to keep him from ever hearing a word about it all, partly for my own sake, and also because I knew he would be so angry if he heard the truth. Father has always been very good to me, and taken great care of me," she went on with an exceeding simplicity that was touchingly childlike. "He would not let anyone treat me as Mrs.—as she did, if he knew of it. He doesn't sympathise, as you do"—with an accent that made me draw her close to me for a moment—"but he would go down and see the—the lady, and want to cut her head off, or something. He is like you there," with an uncertain little laugh.

"And you have never seen or heard of him since?"

"Never. He knew that I lived in London, but he might as well know that I lived in Europe, or the world. He may have tried to get our address from her, which I am sure he would not succeed in doing; or he may have forgotten all about me—I cannot tell. But, somehow, I hardly think that—I think he did really care for me as—"

"As she cared for him," finished I to myself when she stopped.

"I know where he lives," she went on. "He told me, and described the place. No"—answering my look—"I am not going to tell you, or anyone, where it is. I have never been there, and I should not like to go—now—if I had the chance."

"And his name?"

"You know that," blushing rosily.

"Then you are not going to tell me his surname? You will not give me the means of identifying him if I should ever—"

"Uncle Arnold!" She was scarlet from forehead to throat now. "Not for the world! What would he think? What should I feel? Uncle Arnold, I would never have said a word to you if I thought you could ever betray my confidence."

"Don't alarm yourself, my dear child; your secret is safe with me." I felt relieved. I did not want to know the name of Dickie's lover. "I only thought to do anything I could for your happiness. Do not tell me his name unless you wish, and I will never breathe a word of all this, I assure you."

And in my heart I thanked Heaven that London life had not succeeded in rubbing the bloom of this most delicate peach.

"And you have not forgotten him?" I ventured presently, after a long pause.

"He is not the sort of man to be forgotten," she returned softly.

"Was he so—"

"I will tell you what he was like," she said, pressing my hand nervously between her small soft fingers, as though to allay some freshly-stirred emotion within her heart. "He was tall and well made, with an air of—of—"

"Fashion?" I suggested, as she paused for a word.

"Well, it might be that—I suppose it was; but one would never think of calling him fashionable-looking. He was too manly for that, and too aristocratic."

"A prince in disguise—eh?"

"Uncle Arnold, if you laugh at me I won't say another word."

"Dear, I wouldn't laugh at you, or at anyone for whom you cared, for the whole world, with the moon and principal planets thrown into the bargain."

"Well—I believe you are laughing, but never mind—he was very dark, darker than you are, and he had a long nose, and more moustache than you have, but no whiskers or beard. His hair was cut very short, of course; but it had a wave back from his forehead that made him look noble. He knew all about everything, and there wasn't anything that he couldn't do," she finished up, with a simple faith in her lover's capabilities that touched her listener oddly.

"After that, Dickie, I wonder you could go back to your old life so cheerfully, or ever learn to be content with the society of commonplace men like Miles and me."

I said this experimentally, though not with any idea of her answer, as it proved to be.

"Commonplace!" she repeated, looking at me. "How can you call yourself commonplace, Uncle Arnold? You must know that you are nothing of the kind. Why, your beautiful, sad, fierce, dark eyes would make any face uncommon; and to hear you talk is like listening to a beautiful story!"

I cut her short with my laughing; but how her sweet, frank, partial flattery made my old heart beat with pleasure! It was not true, I knew; but she thought it was, and that was all I cared about.

"At any rate," I said, "if my little niece admires me, I shall not trouble myself about anyone else's opinion. But, Dickie, to return to our subject. Was it not very hard to be cheerful—at first?"

"I was not always cheerful," she returned simply. "Sometimes I would think about him, and wonder, and wish he would come, until I made myself miserable. But that could not last—nobody can be miserable always, I think; I never could be for long."

"True, my little dickybird; and you have a most bright spirit."

"But you must not think," she went on affectionately, "that since I have seen him I am unable to appreciate anyone else because they are not like him. I loved father just as much after seeing him, and directly I spoke to you, I knew we should be friends. That is all, Uncle Arnold. Do you think me very silly?"

"Silly? No. Why should I? But suppose you never see him again, Dickie; are you going to sacrifice your life to his memory? Could you never care for anyone else?"

"I don't know," she answered, looking up at me with a contemplative air; "I never thought about it. I never did care for anyone else."

I was not dissatisfied with her answer. She seemed so cheerful, too; her spirits were generally so bright and buoyant, I did not know how to believe that this love-affair had been a serious matter to her, though she had looked very sad for the moment, and her voice had taken a wistful tone that had touched my heart to the quick.

"I think he might have found out your address somehow or other," I remarked, half angry at the way in which she had apparently been slighted, half irritable at the very idea of this paragon of perfection and embodiment of all the graces in the shape of a handsome and fashionable young man.

The best part of my own life was lived; when I had had youth and health I had wasted them recklessly; when riches had come to me, half of them had been squandered without a thought; now I was old and sad and broken-down; my health was none of the best, and good-looks had never, at the best of times, been mine. How, then, must I appear in the eyes of this romantic, yet most critical young girl? Such were the bitter thoughts that chased one another through my mind as I spoke.

"No, I am quite sure he could not," she replied, "unless the lady chose to give it him, and I am equally sure that she would not do that."

"He might have asked the daughter."

"Hardly. He and she certainly understood her mother's wishes, and she acquiesced in them. Besides which, I do not think she knew our address. She and I had never corresponded, and her mother wrote to invite me, and arranged all about my going there. No, Uncle Arnold, please don't suggest any such thing. Don't try to destroy my faith—"

Her voice broke. I clasped her to my side with a passionate impulse of pity and protection.

"My dear, I will never say a word, never think a thought, that could make you unhappy. Have patience with me, and if ever I vex you with my stupidity, remember that nothing in the world could be farther from my wish or intention."

Her forehead was bent against my arm, her face turned away from me. I stooped my lips to her fluffy, light-brown hair, and then we sat still for a little while, and I watched the last rosy sunset cloud fade into grey, and the twilight gather apace. But it was not long before she raised her face, and then she got up restlessly and went to the railings which closed in the rocky point on which we stood, drawing me with her by my hand that she still held. Side by side we stood looking down upon the city streets, bright with gaslight and thronged with people. Nothing poor or tawdry could be descried at that distance and in that light; all looked brilliant and beautiful, like a painted show; rags and bare feet were invisible; the roar of traffic, the rough voices of quarrelsome men and the scolding scream of wrangling women, were softened into a dreamy beauty of low sound to us two on the silent, starlit hill-top.

"I love the city," said Dickie softly, as she had often said it.

"I think, if you had seen anything else worth seeing," I replied, smiling, "you would not think so much of the city, or of this black, smoke-choked Glasgow in particular. In two or three years, when Miles retires on his laurels, and you go out to him, to live on the shores of the blue Mediterranean—"

For those were my brother's plans.

"I will not go!" she interrupted.

"Child, you don't know what it is! You would think you were in fairyland."

"This is my fairyland. And how could I leave you, dear Uncle Arnold? For I am conceited enough to think you would miss me."

"I could not tell you how much, my Dickie."

"I, too—how I should miss you! Father is very good and kind, my own father could not be kinder, but he cannot talk to me, or listen to me, as you do. He thinks it nonsense to talk as you and I often do," with her eyes still bent dreamily upon the Rembrandt-like picture beneath, with its deep shadows and brilliant bursts of light.

I looked at her long and earnestly, and thought again of the story she had told me. Her profile was distinctly outlined against the golden light in the western sky where the sun had gone down. She thought she was plain, and perhaps she really was, in one sense; she did not know, unless she had been told, how she smiled and glowed into loveliness with every happy word that she uttered, with every joyous glance out of her bright eyes; she did not understand how such a face as hers could be preferred to one more regularly beautiful, but without the witchery of her smile, the charm of her ever-changing expression.

We went down to the waterside, and strolled under the trees for a little while, but so many pairs of lovers were there, that spot being a favourite trysting-place with the descendants of the brave followers of Bruce, that Dickie soon proposed leaving them to themselves again.

"It is really too bad to put the poor things out," she naively remarked. "I sympathise with them, and can imagine how vexing it must be to be disturbed."

I laughed, and wondered if she were thinking of that other Arnold as she spoke thus lightly. Could she really care for him? She was but sixteen when she met him; did she know what love really was? Yet I had witnessed on that very evening the first sorrowful emotion I had known her to display, and that was when she spoke of him.

It began to grow dark in earnest then, and there was no moon to beguile us to farther wanderings, so we turned our steps homeward, Dickie twittering away like any little bird on a bough. Her talk was worth listening to; it was full of bright keen observations on persons and things which crossed our way, while yet an odd pleasing vein of romance ran through all her speculations concerning them.

Did she look up at the lighted and, frequently, uncurtained windows of the ascending "flats," each little home-scene that she spied was made the foundation of a story; the faces of the little gutter-children as they popped up momentarily into the garish light of the shop-windows would be commented upon, criticised, or admired, according to their merits; the long, even rows of lighted lamps that ran up and down the steep side-streets like a glittering train of stars were not overlooked. No effect of light or shadow seemed to escape her, and I, accustomed to solitude and silent observation, and apt to ponder over things that came under my eyes, was able to see all that she saw, and follow her flights of fancy to their height.

I could well understand her meaning when she said that Miles did not "sympathise." In her company just then he would have been as a blind man walking with one who saw. Neither the beauty or the romance of the city by night would have been apparent to him; he would have remained untouched by the emotions of the crowd; and her happy, wandering, speculative talk would have sounded to him rather less intelligible than Chinese.

And so, though he was truly good at heart, his face had grown a little hard, his eyes a little cold, while my darling, who sorrowed for every sorrow that was brought before her sight, and rejoiced in every joy, would, in spite of the lines and wrinkles that Old Time must perforce draw on her smooth forehead, remain ever soft, and fresh, and young with renewed youth in the lives of others.

CHAPTER IV.

"UNCLE ARNOLD, what do you think I heard at Mrs. Crichton's last night?"

Dickie made this enquiry of me at one of our tête-à-tête breakfasts. We had spent the previous evening at the house of one of our few friends. There had been a small gathering in honour of a guest of theirs, and my mother and I had been glad to seize the opportunity of a little change for Dickie, who had in consequence created quite a small sensation with her delicate English face and winning ways among the stiff Scottish folk.

"A good deal of flattery, I expect," I replied.

"Oh, but I didn't mean that. I meant that I heard some news—about you."

"About me? From whom?"

I looked up from my coffee-cup half angry, though I did not know why, and met her gaze—a little doubtful, a little grave, upon my face.

"It wasn't told me as news. I was asked for further information—that is how I came to learn it."

"Well, what was it?"

"I was asked when your marriage with Kirsty Crichton was coming off. There, Uncle Arnold! What do you say to that?"

There was a gleam of laughter in her hazel eyes, but yet she did not seem so merry as usual.

"Who asked you that?" I enquired.

"Mr. Hanahan."

"Could he not find in his own affairs sufficient food for conversation without interfering in those of other people? But I can guess why he said it," I said, frowning darkly.

"Oh dear, what are you looking like that for? You don't mean to say you are angry?"

"Not with you," I replied. "But I am vexed with Hanahan for putting such ideas into your head. And I am surprised that he should attempt to draw information out of you in that way."

"Well, I can tell you this, Uncle Arnold, that it is no new idea to me. I have often thought the very same sort of thing, but could hardly have mentioned it to you without seeming inquisitive and suspicious. But when another put my—my thought into words, I could not keep it to myself any longer; I—"

"What made you think it?" I enquired abruptly.

"Oh, two or three things. You seem so friendly together, and you always call her by her christian-name."

"Is that the evidence on which I am convicted? Well, let me ask you a question—why do you call her Kirsty?"

"That is a very different thing."

"Perhaps; but still, why do you do it?"

"Oh, I—I hardly know. It seems natural somehow—it does with some people. I tried to call her Miss Crichton at first, but it sounded almost ridiculous, and I continually forgot and said 'Kirsty,' and soon she told me not to mind about it—everybody called her 'Kirsty.'"

"Exactly my own reasons, except that I have never had her explicit leave to drop the more formal address. I fell into the habit quite unconsciously, and we have known each other so many years now that it is not noticed by either of us. Why, Hanahan himself never calls her anything else."

"But she calls you 'Mr. Challenge.'"

"Yes. That, to use your own expression, is rather a different thing."

Perhaps there was, quite unconsciously, some slight reserve or shortness in my manner; at any rate, Dickie, quick to interpret my every look and tone, seemed to apprehend something of the kind.

"Don't be angry, dear Uncle Arnold," she said. "I won't even ask if it is true, if you mind."

She was standing beside my chair now, one hand laid appealingly on my shoulder. I put my arm round her and looked up into her face half smilingly, though the cloud was hardly chased from my brow.

"Do you wish it to be true, Dickie?"

She hesitated a while, and when at last she spoke it was with a visible effort:

"I wish you to be as happy as ever you can, Uncle Arnold."

The time was forgotten. My coffee-cup was pushed back untasted, while I gazed up at the girl's delicate face, which revealed every emotion, and into her bright expressive eyes.

"And do you think that to marry Kirsty would make me happy?"

No answer.

"Tell me what you think," I persisted.

"How can I, Uncle Arnold?" she said then. "How can I criticise the arrangement if it is already made? It would not be fair, either to her or to you."

"But if I tell you that the arrangement is not made, and never will be, then you will favour me with your opinion."

"It is not? Then"—as I emphatically shook my head—"I am glad! I don't mind saying it now, Uncle Arnold. I think there are not two persons in all the world more unsuited to one another than you and Kirsty."

"Why? She would make an excellent wife, everybody says, and you have already told me that I should make a good husband."

She laughed, and blushed a little at the finishing clause.

"Yes," she said, "she would take great care of you, and give you good dinners, and see that you always wore flannel next to your skin, and all that kind of thing; but she would starve the other part of you—your heart and your soul. She could not appreciate you; she would not know how to appreciate a real love."

She spoke with unconscious warmth; her eye kindled; her cheek paled and glowed alternately. I watched her curiously.

"Then you think I could give my wife 'a real love'?" I questioned.

"Yes, I do."

"What makes you think that?"

"Oh, I hardly know. Nobody who looked at your face could doubt it, I think."

She looked at me as she spoke, surveying the countenance raised to her own with a grave, considering gaze. But something in that long look of ours, too passionate on my part, I fear, seemed to awake sudden consciousness on hers. A quick nervous flush leaped to her face, and she turned away. My hand fell from her waist. A sudden chill breath of reserve seemed to float in between us—we, who had been so happy and confidential together in our happy and confidential relations of uncle and niece. There was a silence; I could not have told whether it lasted an hour or five seconds. Then I spoke in my usual tone—or, perhaps, I made it a trifle more fatherly than was my wont.

"My dear child, don't you trouble your head with any of Hanahan's absurd ideas. I thought he had more sense. And rest assured that the day is not down in my calendar which will see Kirsty Crichton and me anything but quiet old friends, as we are now, and have been for years. I should not suit her, not to speak of her not suiting me."

"I dare say if you wanted her you could make her like you," remarked Dickie, who had far more confidence than I in my powers of fascination.

"Not she. She would never have patience with a lazy fellow like me. And I do not wish it, Dickie, so there is an end of it, so far as I am concerned."

"Perhaps he wants her himself," I presently went on to suggest, more to find out whether Hanahan had, by his marked attentions on the previous evening, made any impression upon the child's fancy, and wanted to discover whether the coast was clear, than from any belief in my own words.

For even as I spoke I knew the very idea was absurd. Kirsty Crichton was a staid, sensible Scottish lassie of five-and-thirty, while Hanahan was a dashing young Irishman of scarcely five-and-twenty.

Dickie laughed and clapped her hands.

"That would be lovely!" she exclaimed.

"Oh, you wouldn't mind that?"

"Oh no! And, though it seems ridiculous, they are really not so unsuited as one would think at first sight—in some things, at any rate. They would never tread upon one another's mental toes, as you and Kirsty do."

"Do we? I never knew it," I answered in surprise.

"No, and that makes it worse. You say something that vexes Kirsty, and you never know it, and so can't be sorry for it; and she snubs you violently, and is equally unconscious, and you feel very cross, but don't know why. Oh, you needn't look so alarmed—you have not behaved very brutally to her, and she is, however unintentionally, quite a match for you!"

"You keen little observer!"

"I can't help it, Uncle Arnold. I can't help seeing and hearing."

"And putting two and two together and making five out of them—eh, Dick?"

"No, four precisely, Uncle Arnold. I never add anything, or take anything away. I should if I were writing a story about you, very likely, to make things fit in nicely."

"About me and Kirsty?"

She nodded.

"I hope you'll never do that. It isn't worth while. If you ever write a story, let it be about you and me—the happy hours we have spent together—the long walks and talks we have enjoyed—and finish it up, Dick, finish it—well, the way you would like best yourself."

I rose abruptly from my seat. She was trembling; I could see that.

"It is time I was off," I said, trying to speak carelessly, but only succeeding in making my voice very rough.

"Aren't you—aren't you going to finish your breakfast?"

"No; haven't time. Good-bye. Take care of yourself and mother. Wherever is my hat?"

The last sentence was uttered as I went out into the lobby, and searched high and low for the missing article. She had to come to my aid at last.

"Here it is," she said, giving it to me from almost under my nose.

And then she went back into the room, and I opened the door and went out and down the resounding stone flights, scarcely knowing where I was or what I did.

After that I saw less of my Dickybird. A constraint sprang up between us, though I could not have told the reason, nor, I am sure, could she—and more than once I heard her sigh. I thought she was pining for that lover of hers—that other Arnold—fretting, perhaps, over his apparent forgetfulness of her; and brooding over this and over my own hopeless love for her—yes, it had come to that—I grew more silent and sullen, more of a bear than ever I had been. In my new happiness the summer had seemed to pass too swiftly; but now its latter days dragged intolerably, and I longed for the time when the bright morning sunshine should be quenched in autumn rains.

But more happiness than I had dared to hope for was in store for me.

Coming into the drawing-room one evening I found her alone and in tears—such an unusual thing for her that I felt alarmed.

"Dickie, what is the matter?" I enquired anxiously, for, however miserable I was, I could not bear to think that she, too, was unhappy. "You will distress poor mother terribly if she comes in and finds you like this," I went on gently, taking what I thought would be the best means of calming her.

She stopped her sobbing with a great effort, but did not raise her head.

"She is lying down. I thought you went out after dinner."

"I did, but I came back again."

"I did not know—I did not hear you; I——"

Her voice was quenched in fresh sobs.

"Dickie," I said, sitting down by her side upon the sofa, where I had found her with her face buried in the cushions, "you have some trouble that you had not when you first came here. You have been quite different lately—not at all like the bright little bird who fluttered into this quiet, dull home of ours and made a fairyland of it for two sober old people who had thought they had forgotten that there ever was such a place."

It was long since I had dared to trust myself to talk to her in this strain. I did not know what made me resume it on this particular evening.

"I know there is something troubling you," I went on; "but you do not tell me anything now; you don't confide in your old uncle as you used to do"—thinking of the time when we sat together on the hill-top, and she told me of her handsome young lover—that other Arnold, so different from the Arnold who sat beside her now and held her hand.

There was no answer; but she did not withdraw her fingers from my clasp.

"Why have you avoided me lately, Dickie?" I pursued. "Why have you not come out for any walks with me? There was a time when you would have hardly let me go alone even if I had wished it. And why do you nearly always steal away to your room in the evenings now? I have missed you so, my little Dick."

"I—I have been busy," she stammered.

"And why has your manner towards me altered so much?" I asked, impelled onward by I hardly knew what impulse. "Have I done anything to offend you?"

But I knew I had not, and her tremor and confusion made my heart begin to beat wildly with sudden, mad hope.

"No," she answered, still keeping her face out of sight. "And I did not know that—that I was different. It is nothing, only I felt lonely this evening, and it made me miserable, I suppose."

"You should never feel lonely again if it rested with me," I replied sadly. "But it does not. I could never fill your life, though you have already filled mine."

"Uncle Arnold!"

The low sobbing exclamation roused my hopes afresh.

"Dickie, don't you know that I love you?" I whispered passionately. "You might have guessed it long ago."

A half-smothered sob was the only answer.

"Dickie, my darling! do you think me very presumptuous? I know I am old, and ugly, and broken-down—not at all the sort of lover a young girl would choose. But I have dared to love you, and to wish that you could care for me enough to— Dickie, you always said you loved your Uncle Arnold, but that, of course, was quite a different thing. If it is quite impossible for you ever to think of him in any other relationship, just shake your head—you need not look up—and he will never trouble you again with his foolishness, but always take the greatest care of you as his dear little niece."

But she did look up, and shaking off the tears that disfigured her face, there rushed over it such a roseate glow of love and beauty as fairly transformed it. There was no need for words; I read my answer in that lovely, radiant face, and my life's love and happiness came to me in that moment.

"I loved you, Uncle Arnold," she told me a little while afterwards, between my passionate kisses; "and once or twice I thought that—that you loved me. But then you seemed to change, and I thought how unlikely it was that you could ever care for such a silly little thing."

Edited by Charles Dickens.)

"My dearest, I dare hardly believe in my own happiness! Yet I have always thought that we seemed made for one another."

"Uncle Arnold—"

"Do you know what you have called me twice in the last minute, Dickie?"

She laughed, and blushed beneath my loving scrutiny.

"Well, I will call you anything you like."

"Will you call me Arnold now?"

She blushed more deeply, and her eyes fell.

"Yes, if you wish it."

"What about that other Arnold, Dickie? Are you going to forget him now for my sake?"

"I—I think I have forgotten him, since I came here. It seems like a dream now. I can hardly believe it ever happened."

And at her words the slight misgiving that I had felt concerning that handsome young lover in the past died altogether away, and, as I bent to kiss her, I devoutly thanked Heaven for its goodness to me.

Ah me! that autumn evening, when we sat in the window together and looked down from our eyrie upon the surging crowd beneath! Many and many a pair of lovers did we see amidst the shifting throng, but none, we thought, so happy as ourselves. It passed like an Elysian dream, and when I woke the next morning, and remembered it all, and knew that it was true, it seemed too much happiness. Our summer storm had gathered, and burst, and passed away, leaving only new brightness behind it, new flowers springing in the old path. We seemed twin souls; and when I saw how her happiness returned—how the shy light sparkled in her eyes—how lovely she grew, with a new loveliness, in the days that followed our exchange of vows, I was confirmed in that impression.

Ghosts.

I FELT them take their seats that night
Beside us, as we drew around
The wood-fire's warmth, whose cheerful light
Threw curious shadows on the ground.
I felt them open wide the door,
And enter in our lives once more.

Mine was a ghost with hazy brow,
Faint eyes that were not really eyes,
Long hair that curling fell adown,
A mouth that uttered naught but sighs;
A maiden such as ne'er is seen,
The ghost of what, perchance, had been!

He sat beside our hearth, and gazed
From her to me, and held her hand.
I did not feel one whit amazed,
So oft had I his features scanned.
It did not need that ghost's sad lore
To know that we were two once more!

And she who shared our fire that night,
The guest we loved, had, too, her ghosts;
They trooped around the glowing light,
Dead days, dead loves in motley hosts.
She did not speak: yet could I see
Her thoughts were years away from me.

Ah, we are quits! Sure all the world
Has somewhere folded near its heart
(That heart that never is unfurled,
That bears alone its dreary part),
Days sweet with fragrance all their own;
Thoughts, hopes, that not one more has known.

Nay, 'tis not well to know too much;
Play we our parts, love, laugh, or kiss.
We cannot hope to know our touch,
The only one that makes her bliss.
Is hers the only one we've known?
Ah me, we live, we love alone!

A Goldfield Reminiscence.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

"How long have you been in the colony?"

"I arrived just a week ago."

The answer to my interrogation was given by my neighbour, a fresh, vigorous, handsome young fellow of five-and-twenty, or thereabouts, who had been my travelling-companion on the top of Cobb and Co.'s coach during the transit between Melbourne and Castlemaine.

He was a Welshman—a farmer's son, I inferred, and one of the last batch of recruits who had rushed out to the great battle-fields where the daily strife for gold was waged so passionately and bitterly.

Of course, he had all the energy and enthusiasm of a new hand, and, as I looked at his fair face, deep chest, and bold blue eyes, I asked myself, sadly enough, how long it would be before, like many others, he would have become a dispirited failure or a reckless mining desperado.

I was in the first batch myself, not through any lack of industry or honesty: perhaps because of the presence of the latter quality, the 'cute ones might have told you.

It was not the prospect of an El Dorado that had lured me to the colonies. I had been settled there, and prospering, before the world-famed shepherd saw nuggets in the creek; but, bitten by the mania that turned peaceable citizens into ravening beasts, and left once happy homesteads desolate, I got rid of my stock and impedimenta at ruinous prices, and decamped for the mining districts.

Of course, I had the usual gleams of luck that make the race for wealth a passion here; but they were so few and brief, and the long nights of despondency that lay between were so toil-filled and bitter! It was the navy's existence without the navy's recompense. But, naturally, we sent home good accounts of the big nuggets as one and another turned them up, and, Briton-like, we kept our disasters to ourselves, and so the new recruits kept pouring in, and extortion, and rapacity, and dishonesty spread like a plague. I do not deny that noble things were done and cruel things borne, now and again, heroically. Even in its lowest depths, humanity retains some stamp of the divine; but I must reluctantly confess that these stirring memories are matter of tradition, and not of personal experience with me.

Anyone who has ever thought about mining must understand that it cannot be carried on single-handed; that for the processes of digging and washing alone, not to speak of protecting, cooking for, and serving each other, at least four partners are almost a necessity, and, could so many work together harmoniously, each claim could run a gang of double that number. But these partnerships are the main difficulty of the miner's life, the scope for his choice of a kindred spirit being so limited, and the strong probability that the first gleam of prosperity will turn his mate into a swindler or a drunkard, so very disheartening.

For some time past we had been working in a gang of three; two old miners, far more experienced in the life than I was, having picked me up; but, our late washings having been more profitable than usual after the rainy season, I knew Rogers and Smith were on the look-out for a fourth hand. Not guessing that any but a man of their own selection would be unfavourably received by them, and feeling much drawn towards my young companion on the stage-coach, and friendships being rapidly cemented here, I made him acquainted with our circumstances as we bowled along over the uneven, dirty highway.

"I have nothing to offer you but the chance of gold, and the certainty of hard work," I concluded; "but such as it is you are welcome to it, for the present, at any rate."

"I'm your man, and thank you heartily," he said, grasping my hand with British warmth; and then as we neared Castlemaine, and the sun, like a red ball, dipped towards the east, I enumerated to him the tools he would require, and narrated, as closely as I could, what our life would be together.

The more I talked to Ramsey the more I liked him. His spirits were so good they seemed to rouse my own, and the drawbacks to our claim, that I rather suggested than described, were pooh-poohed in the cheeriest way.

"We were far from the creek." "Well, he was strong enough to carry the clay any distance." "When we had found any dust we had to watch it armed all night." "Well, he could do with as little sleep as any man." "On the whole, I had not very much confidence in Rogers and Smith." "In that case how fortunate that we were now two and two!"

So, encouraged in spite of myself, we advanced to the claim together. But the surly reception my new acquaintance met with, soon intimated to me that I had been considered over-bold in my arrangement, and the discomfort of the first evening did not diminish as days passed. Instinctively our little gang of four fell into two companies, Rogers and Smith keeping entirely to themselves, and leaving Ramsey and me to support each other.

We had been about a month together, and it was the autumn of 1852, in the rainy season, so that the manner of life I had bestowed on Ramsey would have been no boon in any eyes but those of a miner. Our clothes dried on our backs or remained wet, as the case might be, and our claim was generally flooded, while he and I worked on the night-shift, keeping the shaft constantly baled, and digging as we could; and it would have required eight men to be of any service, for the ground was so heavy and the digging so deep. But the prospector's claim was not far off, and so we toiled like slaves, knowing that if we struck gold at all it would likely be in large quantities. But, in spite of hope and energy, Ramsey and I were dead beat on Saturday night, and so, for the first time, we urged our hitherto unthought-of right to a change of hours. Why should not we rest at night and labour by day? Why should the others have this advantage exclusively? We made our proposal good-temperedly, but it was rejected in such surly fashion that I lost patience, and thinking to reduce our opponents to terms, offered to sell our interest.

"For what price?" Smith asked quickly.

"A hundred pounds each," I answered, feeling sure so much coin was not in the whole firm.

Without a word Rogers opened a canvas bag and counted out the gold, and then I knew that we had been literally bought and sold.

"They have bottomed," Ramsey said, as we walked off with our few belongings.

"Of course they have, the infernal rascals!" I answered viciously; "that is why they wished us to keep on digging while they washed."

On the following morning the rain had ceased, the day was fine, and the creeks were well filled with water, but I could not see beauty or promise in anything, because the scoundrels who had cheated me had netted two thousand pounds. And then we were the beaten men, and the rude laugh that greets failure was ringing over us.

For a couple of weeks we remained idle, chewing the cud of bitter discontent, even Ramsey's hopefulness having been damped by this lesson on men and things. And then our chances of making a fresh start were poor, the ground being occupied for miles, and any abandoned claim that we might have taken possession of requiring at least eight men to work it. But we were sick of partnerships, and coldly rejected any outside advances towards comradeship. As a kind of forlorn hope we at last decided to move up the hillside to some unclaimed shallow ground, which on inspection held out a vague kind of promise; but we were not rushing to it very hopefully now, having encountered facts, and the facts having conquered us. But action of any kind was likely to be less unprofitable than inaction, and so we were on our way to remove our tent and swag to the new settlement, when on the way we ran across two old Ballarat acquaintances, who were packing up their belongings for a start to a new rush in the Gympie Ranges. The claim they were forsaking had not been wholly unpromising, but better luck, like an ignis fatuus lured them ahead, and so their forty-foot shaft was about to be abandoned.

"These brilliant things never turn out of much value," I said warningly, from the depths of my past experience; "better stay where you are;" but they shrugged their shoulders, declared they would risk the exchange, and so left us.

"Suppose we settle down here?" I suggested, thinking the deep shaft more promising than the shallow ground.

"I dare say it's much the same here or there," Ramsey acquiesced dismally, and so, before sundown, our tent stood on the spot so recently vacated by our friends.

For five days we worked, and such work! One with pick and shovel at the bottom, the other with windlass-rope and bucket, hauling the earth to the surface, and still not a trace of the precious metal had met our hungry eyes, while every fellow-labourer who passed us thoughtlessly tantalised us with the success of our old chums, or told us how some new arrivals had struck gold on the very piece of shallow ground we had meant to peg out on the hillside.

"You had better leave me, Ramsey, bad luck sticks to me," I told him despondently on the sixth morning.

"Just as likely I have brought it with me," he answered with a dash of his old cheeriness; "at any rate we'll have one other fling into the old hole on this last day of the week."

"Well, it must be the very last," I answered, taking up my pick listlessly and descending.

There is a certain comfort in the thought that you are doing a hopeless thing for the very last time; there is a certain satisfaction in the knowledge that there are still other corners of the world open to you. Perhaps it was this that lent me new energy, at any rate I pounded away for a couple of hours with a will, and none the less energetically as I discovered that the character of the ground was changing. It was gravel I had laid bare, gravel which before many hours must prove to us of what value our labours had been.

"Now then, that decides it one way or another," I said as I sent the first bucketful to the surface. "If there is no gold there I shake the mud of this claim off my feet for ever."

So determined was I in this resolution that I intimated my ascent after the bucket, and taking my pick and shovel with me, cast what I expected to be a last look into the depths as I mounted. And yet in spite of myself excitement and a vague half hope were stirring at my heart.

"If there is nothing here, we'll shake hands and part," I told Ramsey, as, with our burden between us, we started for the creek. He nodded without answering, and then in silence we bent over the gravel, washing it as for dear life. Two—three—ten minutes passed, and then we stood erect and looked at each other. A thimbleful of a yellowish substance lay at the bottom of the pannikin.

"What is it?" Ramsey asked huskily.

"It's gold!" I answered with white lips. I don't know what we did then. We dared not embrace each other, for there were neighbours close enough to observe any unusual demonstration. I think we stood gazing at our treasure, and interjecting brief comments hoarsely.

Then we gathered up our tools and returned to the claim, feeling all at once strong as Samson, and young with an eternal kind of youth. After all, these brief moments do compensate for many a month of toil and privation!

Past experience had taught us the wisdom of keeping our own counsel now, but, in spite of our best efforts, it was soon understood along the line that we had bottomed, and were washing off sand. A certain esprit de corps among miners necessitates the comparative value of a yield being made known, nevertheless we managed to secure most of the big nuggets from the bottom of the cradle before the final washing off.

Possession has its own pains and penalties. For a month, while toiling by day, we scarcely ventured to sleep at night, lest someone should descend our shaft and despoil us of our treasure; but after a time the vigilant watch on us abated. Some of our neighbours in adjoining claims had bottomed, and their proceeds scarcely giving them wages, the value of our find was gravely questioned and finally forgotten.

Before we left that shaft we had sold eight thousand pounds worth of gold, while in no other claim on the creek had the treasure amounted to as many hundreds. The explanation was not far to seek. All the gold was large, and across our claim lay a ledge of rock that, in past ages, had formed a barrier to the descent of the nuggets as the current washed them from the reef above, and here, sought for to right and left, to front and rear, they had lain for centuries to enrich Ramsey and me just when our worst moment had come, and when we were nearest to despair.

Of course I know people would laugh if we asserted that that gold had been left there that we might find it then, but I know that miners, and sailors, and men whose lives and fortunes are not exactly in their own hands, grow to believe more in luck, or chance—call it what you will—than others do, and somehow it affords us a kind of consolation even when things are dead against us, to think that there is a plan in them somehow, and that they will right themselves for us sooner or later, here, or somewhere.

The Editor's Note Book.

THE Government seem to have entered upon quite a new policy in regard to such bodies as the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Gas Companies. Probably the course which they have adopted, although undoubtedly judicious in the second case, will strike most people as being vexatious and obstructive in the first.

THAT the Board of Trade should have issued circulars to the various governing bodies of the metropolis inviting the expression of their opinion as to the proposed absorption by the Gas Light and Coke Company of the only other Gas Company now in London, is quite right and proper. Such a scheme should not be carried out till after the fullest examination and discussion. It is not, however, easy to see why the Treasury should have refused to allow the Board of Works to continue the corn dues, which have helped to pay for many great improvements and could pay for many more, and the burden of which, on any individual, is so small as to be unappreciable. If the dues are to be given up, and metropolitan improvements are to go on, the rates must be raised, and that would certainly not be a popular measure.

As the two explosions on the Underground Railway occurred almost, if not quite, simultaneously, there can be little doubt that they were the work of the dynamite gang. Indeed, they resemble other outrages of a similar nature in almost every particular, for, like the explosion in "A Sailor and His Lass" at Drury Lane Theatre, there does not appear to have been any particular reason for them, nor do they seem to have led to any particular result.

It is true that the loss of life at Praed Street might have been most serious, but, so long as the conspirators keep more than half their minds fixed on taking care of their own skins, there is always reasonable hope that the damage caused by their cowardly attempts will be comparatively small. It is only where the would-be murderer is prepared, like another Samson, to sacrifice his own life if only he can ensure the destruction of his victims, that real danger is to be apprehended. Fortunately, such cases are rare, and the cowardly ruffians who are supported by money subscribed in America, and are only repudiated in a half-and-half sort of way by the heads of the Irish Land League party, have not as yet shown any particular desire to run any very serious risks.

It would be too much, perhaps, to expect that the members of the Clerkenwell Vestry should display much of the dignity and judicial calmness which ought to mark a typical governing body, but the disgraceful manner in which they behaved during the discussion on the great refreshment question was surprising, and indeed almost unprecedented even in the natural history of Bumbledom.

MR. KELLY, the vestryman who brought the accusation of extravagant feeding at the parochial expense against some of his fellows, had an extremely bad time of it. Indeed, so much smoke was raised that it is impossible to suppose that there was not a good deal of fire. One of the opposition boasted that he knew that Mr. Kelly wanted to know something and that he accordingly "stuffed" him—in other words this representative of the ratepayers of Clerkenwell vaunted himself exceedingly for having told a colleague, who was anxious to do his duty, a parcel of lies. Constitutions differ, I suppose, but I cannot myself see what cause the stuffing gentleman had for self-gratulation.

THE great Irving "boom," as such things are called in the United States, has begun in New York, and the actor's first appearance seems to have been, on the whole, very successful. Some of his tricks and manners evidently puzzled the audience, and still more the critics, not a little, and the utterances of most of the newspapers are somewhat uncertain and hesitating. The principal exception is the New York World, which formulates its objections to the English actor in a vast number of words. As, however, the article begins by talking of his "superb acting," the meaning of what follows is not altogether intelligible.

MISS MARY ANDERSON did not altogether do herself justice when she elected to make her first appearance before a London audience in so formal and uninteresting a part as Parthenia in "Ingomar." The mannerisms and faults of Mrs. Lovell's play were accentuated by the mannerisms and faults of Miss Anderson's acting, and the general effect was to convey to the mind of the critical spectator the idea that Miss Anderson was an actress of method, of formula, and of education only.

THIS impression is effectually dissipated by her performance of Pauline in "The Lady of Lyons." It is true that a considerable amount of affectation, and of what one may call, for want of a better word, stageiness, attends Lord Lytton's play, and that these are emphatically the defects which mar Miss Anderson's histrionic efforts.

BUT, underlying the high-flown romance of the story and the terrible inflation of much of the dialogue of "The Lady of Lyons," there is much real and even touching human interest. And so it is with Miss Anderson. Under the conventionalities of her style and certain tricks of manner and expression, which probably come from a self-consciousness which may be forgiven in so charming a young lady, there are real dramatic instinct and a sympathetic power for which her Parthenia had by no means prepared me. Indeed, Miss Anderson's Pauline deserves the most cordial recognition, and I do not know that I have ever seen the third act of "The Lady of Lyons" so well played.

MR. J. H. BARNES'S Claude Melnotte is also a very interesting piece of acting, carefully studied and boldly executed. With plenty of fire and vigour Mr. Barnes has also the necessary delicacy and ease, and manages to make Lord Lytton's singular hero as probable as could be hoped for.

THE rest of the cast, which comprises several well-known names, is, oddly enough, better on paper than in fact. Mr. Frank Archer altogether misses the mark as Beauseant, and the other parts are played in strict accordance with the most stagey conventionalities. The piece is carefully and handsomely mounted, the new scenery being a reproduction of that used by Mr. Irving when he and Miss Terry played Claude and Pauline, and a fair run may safely be predicted for it.

THE recent publication in America of some of my father's letters shows how great is the demand for even the most trivial details of the private lives of public men, and in what a cynically unscrupulous spirit every opportunity is taken to gratify it, and at the same time to turn a possibly honest, but certainly dirty, penny.

IT was obvious on the face of this correspondence that the majority of the letters were private communications from my father to his solicitor, which could never have been intended for publication; which had come quite accidentally into the market; and which most people with any claim to respectability would have refrained from publishing. The American publisher, however, acted after the manner of his kind on the other side of the Atlantic, and evidently looked at nothing but the dollars which might be made.

THE story of my father's early life, and of the troubles and struggles of my grandfather's family, has already been told, both in

Mr. Forster's Life and in my father's published letters. It surely could not have been necessary that further details should be hawked about, and I feel certain that, in the days when the Times was ruled by the clear brain and sound judgment of John Delane, the article which appeared the other day would never have been given to the world.

FINALLY, as the leader-writer of the Daily Telegraph paid me and my brothers and sisters the bad compliment of assuming that the book of which I complain could not have been published without our sanction, and as the letter of a writer to the Times, signed "An Admirer of Dickens," hesitates to give due weight to my aunt's repudiation of responsibility in the matter, I take this opportunity of saying in the most emphatic and unequivocal manner that not one of us had any knowledge of, or gave any consent to, the publication of the correspondence in question; and that my aunt, as executrix under my father's will, and Messrs. Chapman and Hall, as the proprietors of the copyrights in his works, will take every legal step that is open to them to prevent the circulation or re-publication of the correspondence in this country.

AMONGST the curiosities of the modern Times may be noted the fact that in its issue of the 30th of October, forty-three lines were devoted to a letter from a correspondent who found something altogether extraordinary and even startling in the circumstance that two customers of a certain bank had amounts of £22 0s. 7d. paid into their respective accounts on the same day!

Pincher Astray.

HE was not handsome, at least in the common acceptance of the term. He had a speckly muzzle and a hanging jawl, rather watery eyes, and short crop ears. His legs were horribly bowed, and his tail curled over his back like the end of a figure of nine. He was a morose brute and of most uncertain temper. He would rush out to a stranger with every demonstration of welcome, would leap up and bark round him, and then would get behind and bite him in the calves. He was the terror of the tradespeople; he loathed the butcher; he had a deadly hatred for the fishmonger's boy; and when I complained to the post-office of the non-arrival in due course of a letter from my aunt's legal adviser, advising me to repair at once to the old lady's death-bed (owing to which non-arrival I was cut out of her will), I was informed that the savage character of my dog—a circumstance with which the department could not interfere—prevented the letter-carrier from the due performance of his functions after nightfall. Still I loved Pincher—still I love him! What though my trousers-ends were frayed to strips by his teeth; what though he towzled all the corners of the manuscript of my great work on Logarithms—shall I reproach him now that he is lost to me! Never!

I saw him last three mornings ago, leisurely straying round the garden with the strap of the baby's shoe hanging out of his mouth, and wagging his tail as much as to show me how he was enjoying himself. I remonstrated with him on the shoe question; for a moment he seemed somewhat touched; but suddenly catching sight of a predatory cat on the wall, he galloped off without further parley. I watched the cat scuttle up a tree; I heard Pincher growling angrily at its base; when the noise of the milkman's boots crunching the gravel attracted his attention, he darted off and was lost to me for ever. There was a fiendish grin on the housemaid's face when she announced to me that Pincher wasn't nowhere to be found. Visions of unworried stocking-heels, and unsnapped at ankles rose before that damsel's mind as she broke the news; and she smiled as she said they'd looked everywhere, they had, and nothing wasn't to be seen. I was not crushed by the intelligence. I knew my dog's extensive visiting list, and thought that finding he had outstayed his time, he had, perhaps, accepted the friendly offer of half a kennel, and was then engaged in making night hideous, and conducting to the sleeplessness of some neighbourhood unaccustomed to his vocal powers. But as I lay in bed next morning I missed the various little dramas—the principal character always performed by Pincher—of which I had so often been the silent audience. The butcher's boy—a fierce and beefy youth, who used openly to defy the dog, and beat him off with hurlings of his basket and threatenings with his feet—now entered silently; the baker's last apprentice, a mild and farinaceous lad—who proffered Pincher the raspings of black loaves, and who endeavoured to propitiate his enemy by addressing him as "Poor fellow!"—now entered silently; while the fishmonger's boy—who generally made one wild scuttle from the garden-gate to the kitchen entrance, and upon whose back Pincher usually hung, as the wolves hung upon Mazeppa—now walked slowly up the path, and whistled. Then I knew that he was gone indeed!

I engaged the services of an unintelligible crier, and had the dog's description bellowed round the neighbourhood. I brought the printing art into play, and all the palings and posts within a circle of two miles burst out with an eruption of placards, of which the words "Lost," and "Dog," were, without the aid of a powerful microscope, the only legible portion. I concocted an advertisement for the Times, and then waited patiently for the result of my various schemes.

They had results, I allow. I received at least twenty letters from sympathisers, who told me that in the event of my not recovering my lost favourite, they were happily able to provide another in its place. I suppose that on the evening of the day the advertisement appeared, at least five-and-twenty pairs of boots had printed themselves off on my dining-room druggot, which, being red in colour and fluffy in texture, is singularly capable of retaining a clear impression. In every instance, the boots belonged to short-haired stable gentlemen in large white coats, from the inner pockets of which they produced specimens of dogs—ugly and morose indeed, but not Pincher.

I need not say that my intimate friends came out nobly under the circumstances. Jephson, who wore checked trousers of a vivid pattern, which had always aroused Pincher's ire, thanked fortune that "the infernal beast was got rid of somehow." Podley, who, labouring under the delusion that all dogs were intended for swimmers, had once tried to throw Pincher into the Hampstead ponds, and had his hand bitten to the bone for his pains, hoped that "the brute had been made into sausages." Blinkhorn, who was of a facetious turn, was sure that Pincher had been sewn up in the skin of some deceased dog of fabulous beauty, and sold to some old dowager by a man in Regent Street. The only one who gave me the least consolation was Hallmarke, who said that perhaps he had been picked up by some benevolent person, and had been sent to the Home for Lost Dogs. But my hopes were short-lived. I went in hot haste to that excellent institution; but, alas! Pincher was not among its numerous happy inmates.

Pincher did return, however; not from the Home, for he knew better than so far to jeopardise his social standing. He returned with a ruffled coat, a torn ear, and a fierceness of eye, which bespoke recent trouble. I afterwards learned that he had been a principal in a combat held in the adjoining parish, where he acquitted himself with honour, and was in the act of pinning his adversary, when a rustic person from a farm broke into the ring, and kicked both combatants out of it. This ignominy was more than Pincher could bear. He flung himself upon the rustic leg, bit it through, and brought him to the ground; then fled for his life, and remained hidden until hunger compelled him to return to his home. We have exchanged no communication since, but regard each other with sulky dignity, and I clearly perceive he intends to remain obdurate until I make the first advances to reconciliation.

Cookery.

PLAIN DINNERS.

A LEG of mutton with trimmings and a pudding was still in the early days of Queen Victoria's reign the housewife's idea of a good, plain, wholesome dinner. "There is nothing cheaper than a leg of mutton;" "There is nothing better than a cut of mutton for the children," were the opinions stoutly maintained against all suggestions of other fare. There is a survival of these opinions to this day, in spite of the great cost of the joint and the difficulty of procuring fine mutton at all.

Many sacrifices have to be made in other directions to enable housekeepers of moderate means to provide this plain wholesome fare for their families, and no little anxiety is often felt by those who have a fixed idea that the growing boys and girls will not thrive on less costly material.

There are, no doubt, some of our readers who can remember how, when mutton or beef was boiled, the broth was served first, then the dumpling, and that it was an axiom that those who could not eat the two first did not need the last. Until about forty years ago, even at the table of well-to-do farmers and tradesmen, it was the custom to serve pudding first, with the avowed intention of diminishing the appetite for meat. Gradually the idea that this was mean, that it was vulgar to allow anything less delicate than soup or fish to precede the joint, gained the ascendancy. Nowadays, as it is clear that, with meat at its present price, there are comparatively few persons who can afford to satisfy the appetites of their children with such expensive food, it is worth while to consider how far it would be well to return to the ancient order of "pudding first."

There are so many people, both young and old, who have such a marked aversion to suet-puddings, or who so soon tire of batter, that the question what to provide is difficult, unless some little pains are taken in cooking. Of course, any dish which precedes the joint with the object of saving meat, is pretty sure to be received with suspicion or contempt, if not by the girls and boys, by the kitchen party. It is, therefore, highly desirable that the first dish should be of a tempting character, as good as possible of its kind, and thoroughly well prepared. There is, for instance, nothing better than haricot beans and lentils. But these are, as a rule, plainly boiled and sent to table without any seasoning; then, of course, they are disliked. From their earliest years children should be accustomed to food of this kind, oatmeal, macaroni, etc.; then they grow up with a taste for it, greatly to their advantage.

Bread, fried and served with gravy, or stewed vegetables of any kind, are good. Small dumplings in any sort of sauce which is found to suit the family taste, and savoury rice, are most useful, and the same may be said of the savoury oatmeal-pudding given in the first bill of fare. In short, there is a large number of good, cheap, and nourishing dishes which are suitable as a first dish, the only difficulty being that they require care in the preparation.

It is unnecessary to repeat what has been said in this Journal on the dietetic value of soup, and we will only now say that it is much to be regretted that soup is not more popular as an article of family fare, the more so as it can be made of materials which are too often wasted.

From month to month, it is proposed to give in HOUSEHOLD WORDS hints and directions for serving plain dinners well and economically, and to show how every scrap of material may be utilised. In the present paper the case of a dinner of beef, and how to make the joint go farthest, will be considered.

Decidedly the most profitable piece of beef to have for a family dinner is that known as "top-side," and is without bone and has little fat. If the meat is fine, this is an excellent cut, but if it is not of the first quality, it is hard and flavourless, and is not fit for roasting. After the top-side, in point of economy, come three or four of the ribs of the cut called "wing-rib"—that is, the shortest of the ribs. The longer ribs are more profitable when rolled, and make a dish fit for any table or any occasion.

There is no difference of opinion as to which, both in respect of appearance and quality, is the best joint of beef. Sirloin has always carried the palm, and in consequence commands a high price. Of the three cuts into which sirloin is usually divided, the middle is the best and most economical. The first cut, which butchers sometimes call "wing of the sirloin," is apt to shrink, particularly at the thin end, and, having an undue quantity of bone, is extravagant.

The chump end of the sirloin, if bought at a price less than the middle cut and used with management, is not unreasonably expensive. The end of this roasted is often wasteful, yet makes an excellent stew, and is best lightly salted and used within three or four days. The undercut can be removed without damage to the upper side of the joint, and from ten to twelve pounds of the chump should make, with some such dish as we have suggested, a sufficient meat dinner for a family of six or eight persons for four or five days. On the first day this undercut can be used, on the second the joint itself be roasted, on the third this will be served cold, on the fourth the end of the joint be stewed.

The order of serving, then, will be something as follows:

FIRST DAY.

Savoury Batter Pudding.
Fillet of Beef. Potatoes à la Maitre d'Hôtel.
Stewed Carrots.
Baked Apple Pudding.

SECOND DAY.

Dumplings with Gravy.
Roasted Sirloin. Browned Potatoes.
Greens.
Batter Pudding with Fruit Sauce.

THIRD DAY.

Stewed Haricot Beans.
Cold Beef. Fried Potatoes.
Treacle Pudding.

FOURTH DAY.

Savoury Rice.
Stewed Beef with Onions, Carrots, and Dumplings.
Boiled Oatmeal Pudding.

FIFTH DAY.

Soup of the Beef Bones with Lentils.
Rissoles. Curried Rice.
Apple Pie.

Recipes for the dishes will be given in future papers.

American Engine Drivers.

AN American newspaper gives the following graphic account of an engine-driver's troubles:

"Oh yes, engineers do lose their nerve," said Old Throttle, "especially one who has a night-run all the time. You see, in the night-time an engineer's eyes, thoughts, and all are confined to a very small space; it's nearly or quite dark inside the cab, and if his engine is workin' all right, carryin' her water, good lots of steam, and the fireman wide-awake and lively, that engineer don't have much to do with his eyes, only to look out ahead over the little space made bright by the head-light, and his thoughts are naturally confined to what his eyes take in. In the daytime it's different; he can look around and see lots goin' on. He notices that this field of 'taters looks good, and wonders if his little patch at home will turn out as well; he sees a feller fishin', and remembers the last mess of trout he caught in the Shohola; he sees a woman and a baby in the little white house near the big curve, and his thoughts fly back to his home and his wife and children, and he wonders what they are doing just now.

"And this he can take in, and be 'tendin' to business strictly; but

In the night-time all is changed, and his vision and thoughts, as I said, are confined to the small spot made visible and distinct by the head-light, and his ideas naturally follow the rails. He remembers that the culvert just ahead is the very spot that was washed out last spring, and nothing left under the ties and rails for ten or fifteen feet; true, his engine jumped the chasm, and only five cars loaded with express matter and baggage went down and were smashed and piled on top of each other, but it might have been the ten cars of emigrants that were coupled in the rear, and it isn't pleasant to think of what might have been.

"Just around the curve is the place where his engine struck a draw-head some careless brakeman had left lying on the track; his engine only turned over on her side, and fortunately the air-brakes had so stopped the train that no further damage was done; but he shudders as he recalls the sensations he experienced while the engine was turning over and crushing its mad way through the ties, and 'tisn't pleasant to think of. He flies over a huge embankment at a pace of forty miles an hour, and thinks of the feelings that were his on a certain trip last winter when a side-rod came crashing through the side of the cab, while passing over the same embankment.

"In the cut just ahead is where, on the last trip, a watchman, intent on watching a train on the opposite track, had forgotten the express was due, and the horror and agony depicted on his face as the pilot threw him high in the air, will never be forgotten, neither will his mangled and stained body, picked up and cared for as soon as the train could be stopped. And so on every mile of the road something of this kind is brought to mind, as his thoughts follow the circle of light ahead, which flashes and changes constantly, now shining on a bridge, now showing an embankment, flashing its rays now on a house, and now through trees and foliage, and if the man is easily worried or bothered he gets very nervous indeed, and wishes he was at the end of the trip—anywhere off the rail.

"Why, I've known men to give up the best trains on the road and big pay because they had to run in the night-time, and take trains that were much harder to run and poorer pay, simply because the latter run in daylight. Yes, engineers do sometimes get frightened and lose nerve, and it is not to be wondered at when we think of his standing one hand on the throttle and the other on the reverse lever, with his thoughts going back to incident and accident of his busy and hazardous life on each curve and straight line of the road, as revealed by the head-light of his engine."

The Entrance Examination to our Public Departments.

PART II.

It will have been seen from the list of subjects given that the exam. should be easily within the compass of every public school boy. Indeed, were it only "qualifying," instead of "competitive," there is little doubt that nearly three-fourths of the entire number of candidates would pass. The simple character of the subjects in reality constitutes the severity of the exam. This may be readily seen by glancing down a list of the successful candidates' marks, when it will be observed that groups of names often occur separated from each other by a single mark only.

WE think it is to be regretted that the Civil Service Commissioners have not seen their way to providing a more liberal menu. A Latin paper, and one in French or German, at the candidate's option, would give a greater chance to many who are at present severely handicapped by this rigid adherence to English subjects. We should here remark that there is a preliminary examination of a very simple character, merely imposed with the view of weeding out those candidates who possess no chance whatever of passing the competitive examination, a certain number of obviously incompetent men invariably presenting themselves upon each occasion.

WE shall now endeavour to indicate briefly the nature and extent of the various examination papers.

DICTATION.—Two rather lengthy extracts from Standard English authors, such as Lord Macaulay or Sir Walter Scott, are given, and ten marks are deducted for each mistake in spelling from the total of 400 awarded for orthography. A similar number of marks is also deducted for each mistake occurring in the other papers set during the examination.

COPYING.—This is purely a test of handwriting, and must not be confounded with "Copying Manuscript," of which more anon. A tabulated statement of some kind is usually provided, with a corresponding blank form, into which as much of the printed form must be copied as can be got through in half an hour. By exercising great care and considerable ingenuity, the printed form can be reproduced in the blank one, and the "test" consists in doing so without giving the latter a cramped or unsightly appearance.

ARITHMETIC.—This paper usually contains fifteen questions of a distinctly difficult character, and has been known to give considerable trouble to those candidates whose attention has been principally confined to the higher branches of mathematics. For instance, no credit whatever is given for problems solved by the aid of algebraic formula.

COMPOUND ADDITION (half an hour allowed).—In the first fifteen minutes six very long compound addition sums have to be added up. There are usually twenty rows of figures, with about six figures in the pounds column, to each sum. In the second fifteen minutes, sets of figures, known as "cross tots," and arranged in twenty horizontal lines and ten vertical columns, have to be added up from left to right, the total of each horizontal line being placed on its extreme right.

This subject, for which one hundred marks are allowed out of the total of four hundred given for arithmetic, decidedly pays, since a large number of the competitors utterly fail in it; whereas, if only sufficient practice be devoted to it, absolute accuracy, and consequently the maximum number of marks, can be obtained.

ENGLISH COMPOSITION.—Three subjects are given, and the candidate is at liberty to choose the one best suited to him. They generally comprise: (1) A well-known proverb; (2) the life of a given celebrity; or (3) some topic engrossing public attention at the moment. Candidates would do well to bear in mind that the examiners visit very severely any attempt at "fine writing" or high-flown diction. The matter should be carefully weighed before being committed to paper, and should be expressed in simple narrative form—grammatical accuracy and correct spelling being, of course, of the utmost importance.

BOOKKEEPING.—The paper set is of the character usually found in any treatise on the subject, with this exception, that it is sometimes framed in accordance with the special requirements of one of the large financial departments, such as the Exchequer and Audit Office.

PRÉCIS WRITING in the Foreign Office, INDEXING in the Legacy and Succession Duty Office, and DOCKETING in the Customs Department, are practically one and the same thing, the elegance of the synonym declining from west to east in accordance with the topographical position of the office using it.

This exercise consists in tearing the heart out of a set of lengthy official documents, and of expressing it in short and concise language. This subject well repays any amount of careful study devoted to it.

DIGESTING AND TABULATING ACCOUNTS AND RETURNS.—A confused mass of statistical matter is placed before the candidate, together with a specimen, on a small scale, of a form into which it can all be packed. A similar form must be spaced out and ruled, each item must be entered under its appropriate head, or sub-head, all totals must be cast, and, in short, the candidate is expected to evolve perfect order from this chaotic medley of facts and figures.

GEOGRAPHY AND HISTORY. The questions in each of these papers approximate very nearly in style and scope to those set in the senior Oxford and Cambridge local examinations. These two papers should give the boys from the modern side of our schools a great advantage over their co-competitors from the classical side.

COPYING MS.—The late Horace Greeley stood admittedly an easy first amongst illegible writers. He once wrote a letter dispensing with the services of one of his staff. The journalist, when next applying for a situation, with the utmost coolness produced this letter from the well-known editor of the New York Tribune as one of personal recommendation, and was immediately elected on the strength of the signature, no other portion of the letter being decipherable. It would almost seem as if the examiners had secured a large quantity of the late talented editor's "copy." The candidate is required to transcribe (sic) and transcribe as much of these caligraphic hieroglyphics as he can in the given time. Complete sets of these examination papers can be obtained through any bookseller, and they are always kept in stock at Stanford's, Charing Cross, and Longman's, Paternoster Row.

If there are any points connected with this subject on which any of our readers would like further information we shall be very pleased to answer their queries through the medium of our correspondence column.

The Beefsteak Society.

ONE of the most famous convivial associations of the last and present century is the Beefsteak Society. We read of a Steak Club in the Spectator, in April, 1712, Steele speaking in terms of the greatest affection of Dick Eastcourt, the provider of the club, and who also so eloquently records his death in a very touching manner. This club, however, was not the same as the famous society, established a few years later, though it may, perhaps, have been in some measure suggested by the former. The "Society" (for the members disdained to be considered a club), originated, as is well known, in Rich, the manager of Covent Garden Theatre, cooking and eating his beefsteak in the presence of a distinguished visitor, Lord Peterborough, who was so charmed with the odour of the simple fare that he begged to be allowed to join; a further supply of steak was sent for, and a few bottles of wine from a neighbouring tavern gave a zest to the feast. On going away at a rather late hour, the old earl proposed to renew the meeting, and on the following Saturday, Peterborough returned with three or four friends, "men of wit and pleasure about town"; and so jovial was the meeting that it was agreed to form a Saturday Club, to assemble in Rich's room, the fare to be restricted to beefsteaks, port wine, and punch. The "Steaks" soon became fashionable, and the greatest lords, as well as the most intellectual men, were ambitious of belonging to such an illustrious association. The meetings were at first held in a room over Covent Garden Theatre; but when the house was burnt down in 1808, the members met for a time at the Bedford, and then in apartments over the English Opera House, now the Lyceum Theatre. Here again they were burnt out; but, strange to say, the original gridiron of the society (according to some, Rich's own gridiron) was saved from both fires. Churchill and Wilkes, in the last century, were members of the Steak Society; but the former made himself so disagreeable, that he resigned to avoid expulsion, and the latter also fell into disgrace on account of his Essay on Women. George IV. was a member when Prince of Wales, having been elected in 1785; and various dukes, royal and not royal, have felt proud of presiding in the chair. Very naturally, considering its origin, the "Sublime Society," as it was sometimes called, enrolled many actors in its lists, and in the club-books occurs the entry: "J. Kemble, expelled for his mode of conduct." He had probably been giving himself pompous airs. His predecessor, Garrick, a more genial man, was very much liked, and one night when he had to play Ranger at Drury Lane, of which he was the manager, he stayed so late with his brother Steaks that he kept the stage waiting. He was sent for, and arrived hot and breathless. "I think, David," said Ford, one of the patentees, "considering the stake you and I have in this house, you might pay more attention to the business." "True, my good friend," replied Garrick, "but I was thinking of my steak in the other house." Another good thing was said by Garrick at one of the club dinners. He had made the remark that, in order to prevent irregularities at the theatre, he always made a point of ticketing and labelling every play that was to be returned, so that it might be found in a moment. "A fig for your hypocrisy," exclaimed Murphy across the table. "You know, David, you mislaid my tragedy two months ago, and I make no doubt you have lost it." "Yes," replied Garrick; "but you forget, you ungrateful dog, that I offered you more than its value, for you might have had two manuscript farces in its stead." We cannot dismiss the Steaks without mentioning old Captain Charles Morris, the bard of the club, who wrote indifferent poetry (called by courtesy Anacreontic), browed the finest of punch, made himself universally beloved for his good-nature and joyous spirits, and who died in 1838, at the patriarchal age of ninety-two.

The old room of the Beefsteak Club, at the back of the Lyceum Theatre, has been recently fitted up as a dining-room by Mr. Henry Irving, and no doubt in days to come the history of the present room will add much interesting matter, and many brilliant anecdotes to the dramatic and literary history of to-day.

The present Beefsteak Club in King William Street is only a namesake and not a lineal descendant of the old institution.

Cheap Home-Made Christmas Boxes.

PART I. SIXPENCE EACH.

THE relationship between Old Father Christmas and Santa Claus is very near and dear. Take away from us our Christmas gifts, the blessing of bestowing, and the pleasure of receiving, and the annual festival would be stripped of half its joyousness. The holidays would be very dreary, and even plum-pudding would lose half its richness if Christmas-boxes were to be abolished by some suddenly enacted Act of Parliament.

THE importation of toys, dear and cheap, in such large quantities from Germany makes the choice of gifts by those who live in towns very simple. But for young people away in the country, with no shops near, and very little money in their purses to send to town for what they want, it is quite a different case. Time and deft fingers may be theirs, and, perhaps, a great deal of sweet self-denial and loving thoughtfulness is called into exercise for many weeks previous to the 25th of December. It is a serious thing to provide gifts for a father and mother, and several brothers and sisters, perhaps one or two servants, with only eightpence; there may be even half-a-crown, or as much as five shillings available, but the outlaying of sums like these calls for a great deal of thought, and an amount of calculation which would do credit to a Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE great variety of working materials now in use, some of them very cheap, simplifies the question of home-made Christmas-boxes no little. All that is required are nimble fingers, guided by a little artistic taste.

POCKET-HANDKERCHIEFS with fancy borders are exceedingly cheap. In their original form they look scarcely good enough for a present, but made up into a tie, bow, or morning-cap, they become quite transformed. Border the handkerchief with lace, being liberal at turning the corners so as to leave the lace a little full. If the edging be narrow, two yards and a half will be enough. If wider, three yards. Divide the lace in four, tack it at the corners before beginning to sew, in order to keep the quantity for each side distinct. Fold two of the corners inwards, so that they meet in the middle of the square. Pin them in their places, and run some gatherings straight across from edge to edge, passing exactly through these corners, and draw up closely. The two corners left free should hang down gracefully in natural soft folds; turn one over the other, keeping the turned-in corners outside. If the handkerchief be large enough, it may be tucked up into a bow; if small, or only made of a square of muslin, crepe, silk, or lace, the ends can remain flowing. This bow looks pretty when worn in front of a dress, tucked under the corner of a turned-down collar, having also the superlative advantage that its materials can be bought for sixpence.

ANOTHER, which comes to about the same price, for it requires a better lace, is made of a strip of Indian muslin, about three inches wide, and half a yard long, and joining the two ends together. Sew one row or two rows of lace on the two sides of the muslin—one row if the lace be wide, two if it be narrow. Run three threads up the centre and draw them as tightly as possible and fasten the ends. If the middle looks too plain, a knot of ribbon, a little more lace, or at Christmas-time a branch of holly and berries redeems the bare look. Surah, or Indian silk, or coloured gauze, may be substituted for muslin.

FRILLS and collars of lace may be made in a variety of patterns. If the lace be narrow, a foundation of stiff net is required to sew it on; but a quarter of a yard, at a cost of twopence, will make several collars. Cut the foundation, if circular, exactly to fit the wearer, taking in little seams at the shoulders if necessary. If the work is to be kept secret, the dress-bodies of the person for whom it is intended will give the proper measurements. Sew a row of lace round the edge of the foundation; another above it, just overlapping the upper edge of the first row; and so on up to the throat, when the final row is to be reversed, so as to stand up. A row of ribbon or black velvet where the last two edges meet makes a neat finish. This is an extravagant pattern, as it uses up a great deal of lace.

A COLLAR made of one row of deeper lace is more economical. Make a narrow band of a cutting from the foundation net. Mark the middle and two sides. Take a yard of lace—a yard and a half if be very deep; pleat it, having regard to the pattern, and press the folds with a warm iron. Run a thread along the top, fastening each pleat in its place, but taking no back-stitch. Tack it on the band in such a way that, when sewed inside the dress, it will fall loosely over. It requires no standing-up row. Ruffles to match may be added. All imitation laces for fichus, dress-trimmings, etc., should be pleated with an iron.

ANY little odds and ends of lace, scraps remaining over from other occasions, can be used for the ends of muslin ties. All muslin ties must have the hems folded and pressed. Ties for mourning are made of strips of muslin, with hems and little tucks to finish the ends. These require no lace, so are exceedingly cheap. A plain deep frill, box-pleated, with a hem at the edge, is a neat finish for a mourning tie.

IN these travelling days a railway time-table is always in requisition. Whether it be Bradshaw, or some less bewildering guide which is to be consulted, it is quite necessary to have one always at hand. But the untidy covers often cause the banishment of time-tables from the drawing-room, the very place where they are most frequently required. A pretty, loose case with pieces of elastic down the centre inside to hold in the book makes a very acceptable Christmas-box, and it need not cost more than sixpence, ribbon strings, and all.

FOR the sides, two pieces of pasteboard, or one folded so as to leave a centre part for the back. The cover, if money is no object, may be of silk, satin, plush, velvet, and it may even be embroidered in silks, gold thread, and seed-pearls. But such decoration would swallow up a year's pocket-money. A piece of unbleached linen, one with a rough surface to be preferred. Stretch it over the pasteboard frame, turning over the edges, as books for a parish library are provided with saving covers, and fastened with a needle and thread. If the worker can draw she has only to etch with a pen and ink a neat design—a floral outline looks best on the cover—adding a monogram. The less elaborate the pattern, the more in keeping with the groundwork, the coarse linen.

IF the young lady is not artist enough to draw the pattern, she can transfer one, in the same way as embroidery patterns are put on cloth or velvet, and then go over it with a pen afterwards to give it the outline effect of having been sketched. The inside of the cover is finished by pasting down fly-leaves to hide the sewing. Elastic bands down the back inside, and ribbon-strings sewed on the back outside, complete this gift.

SINCE the parcel-post constituted itself our benefactor, everything that weighs lightly can be had from town. For instance, those rush hats, which came from Japan in such quantities that they can be bought for two or three pence each—this ought to cover postage—can be turned into cheap Christmas-boxes.

To make a work-bag, or useful hand-bag, take a rush hat or bonnet. Ornament the outside by working stars, leaves, or flowers in crewels. Prepare a lining by making a bag exactly the width of the hat-leaf at the outside edge, but rather deeper than from the edge to the bottom of the crown. For the bag—sateen, chintz, serge, flannel, silk, linen, or any cheap material that will come within the price. Cut a round piece the size of the crown. Sew the bottom of the bag to it, so as to make a neat lining. Put it into the hat, seams downwards. Tack it down at the bottom; then at the place where leaf and crown join, finally round the edge. Upon the surplus make a hem for string case, put in double strings, and a neat bag is the result. It makes a good luncheon-basket for a short journey. To cut off the leaf of the hat altogether, and use the crown as the bottom of a bag, with some bright material for lining and bag-top is pretty, but the top must be carefully bound as the first step, or it will ravel out. This is a cheap bag, as so little material is required to make the top.

ANOTHER use for the rush hat is to line the leaf with some bright colour, tack one side back to the crown, and hang it up as a wall-basket. A good deal of the effect of this pattern depends on the lining and decoration. An ordinary straw, or a man's chip-hat can be made into a pretty flower-pot stand by tacking back the sides, and for Christmas by sewing evergreens and moss all over the leaf so as to conceal it.

SINCE Miss Ellen Terry inaugurated the Portia fan, which hangs at the side, is circular, and does not fold up, all sorts of pendent screen-fans are worn. The palm-leaves, which cost about a penny each, can be made to look seasonable by sewing on coloured everlastings, red berries, and ivy leaves, and tying some little bows of ribbon round the handles. If something better is required, the frame of the palm-leaf can be retained, a piece of foundation-net sewed over it, a few rows of lace run round, and the centre filled with flowers. The lace for this fan will be the chief expense, and it ought to be pleated and pressed before being sewed on.

Some Curious Judgments.

A CURIOUS escape from a judicial difficulty was that resorted to by the Areopagus, to which renowned tribunal Dolabella, when pro-consul of Asia, referred a case he found himself unable to decide. A Smyrniish woman was accused before him of the murder of her husband, in revenge for the latter's having slain her son by a former marriage. Here was a dilemma. He could not acquit a convicted murderess, and yet shrink from condemning a mother whom love for her offspring had betrayed into crime. The law allowed no mitigated penalty. He sent the case to the Areopagus, who, equally perplexed, tided over the difficulty by directing the criminal to come up for sentence in—one hundred years!

The Emperor Claudius, who was certainly no Solomon, nevertheless pronounced a judgment which might bear a parallel with that of the wise king. A mother who disavowed her son was cited by the latter before the imperial seat. The evidence proving conflicting, Claudius cut the Gordian-knot by ordering the woman to marry the young complainant. This unexpected decree awoke the inner witness, and the mother acknowledged her son.

Pedro the Cruel's judgment in the case of a tiler, is deserving of record. While pursuing his calling on the roof of a lofty mansion, the man lost his balance, and after clinging some agonised moments to a slight projection, let go his hold, and fell into the street. As fate would have it, he dropped plump upon an individual unluckier even than himself, who was passing at that inopportune moment, and killed on the spot, the tiler himself sustaining no serious injury. The son of the man who was killed commenced a process against him who had fallen, and the case being heard by the king, he decreed that the tiler should be absolved from all demands. Leave, however, was reserved for the plaintiff to jump from an elevation equal to that from which the defendant had fallen, the latter being first placed below in a convenient position to break the other's fall. The plaintiff, however, declined to avail himself of his legal right. Charles V., on one occasion, appealed successfully to the inner testimony in the case of two ladies of quality, who, after much disputing, applied to the king as to which should take precedence of the other. "The sillier," decided his majesty.

The records of French law present us with the following remarkable case. A worker in tapestry sought to recover from a lady a certain sum for goods supplied. He was his own lawyer, and availed himself of the opportunity to make a speech of such unnecessary length, that the fair defendant, out of all patience, broke in: "Gentlemen, permit me to explain the matter in two words. This person undertook, for the sum named, to supply me with a piece of Flemish tapestry, comprising several figures well designed—one, especially, being as handsome—as engaging—as—whom shall I say?—as M. le President! Instead of that, he delivers me a work displaying a group of creatures of almost diabolical hideousness—the principal an exact portrait of himself!" A decision adverse to the plaintiff was recorded.

Bertrand Solas, a wealthy Spaniard, a resident at Naples, was accustomed to "take his walks abroad," clad in gorgeous apparel. On one of these excursions he was run into by a porter carrying a huge bundle of firewood, a portion of which caught and tore his silken robe. In a furious rage he carried his complaint to the viceroy himself. The latter knew it was the invariable custom with porters to call out to anyone approaching, "Gare!" (Anglice, "Take care!") and enquired if he had given the usual warning, Solas replying in the negative. "Then I will punish him severely," said the viceroy. The porter was apprehended, but was cautioned by the viceroy's orders, that whatever questions might be addressed to him, he was to remain perfectly mute. The case was then heard—the prisoner only responding by signs. "What penalty," asked the judge, turning to Solas, "can I possibly inflict on this wretched dumb fellow?" "He is trifling with your excellency," said the hot Spaniard. "He is no more dumb than I am. I heard him shout out 'Gare!'" "Ah, you did? Then why didn't you take his warning? You will pay him ten crowns for his loss of time."

Household Gardening.

FEW persons are, perhaps, so completely satisfied with their gardens that they desire no alteration whatever, either in their design, arrangement, or planting. Still, there are such individuals, but they are those, as a rule, who take little or no interest in the surroundings of their homes. These, however, are in a minority; the vastly overpowering majority taking pride in the attractiveness of their home-plots, whether they are large or small; and such persons, however well they succeed, are always seeking to do something better, and are never more happy than when engaged in making improvements. A walk may need making or altering, a lawn forming, a rockery building, a fern-dell excavating, a mound raising, borders trenching, or trees and shrubs planting. Something of the nature indicated is certainly required by nine persons out of ten who delight in their gardens, for to delight in them is to strive to make them more enjoyable than before; and this leads us to a consideration of the important subject of

MAKING ALTERATIONS.

All alterations, it may be remarked, are not improvements. A great amount of money is expended yearly, much labour involved, and discomfort endured for the time being in changing the character of a garden, under the delusion that it is necessarily being improved. So far from improvements following as a matter of course, we have known on many occasions a totally opposite result. Hasty, ill-considered action in the remodelling of home-enclosures usually ends in disappointment; but on the contrary, when a full grasp of the natural resources of a garden is obtained, and the obstacles to its satisfactory management are clearly realised, then, by thoughtful action, improvements of a very marked kind may be made; and the present is the time for effecting them.

REMOVING TREES.

When walks, lawns, and borders are littered with the leaves of some familiar tree, so familiar, perhaps, that its full value is not appreciated, it is not unusual for a sudden determination to be arrived at to have it removed. It may be the reverse of attractive now, and it is remembered that "nothing will grow under it," hence it is doomed. In the case of moderate-sized gardens, near towns especially, always consider long and well before cutting down a tree. First look beyond that tree, and ascertain if it does not mask something more objectionable than itself. Reflect, too, that the work of twenty years may be undone in twenty minutes; and if a mistake should be made it can, perhaps, never be rectified, for the tree that has been cut down probably established itself before the atmosphere was polluted with smoke, whereas, to rear another better than itself, or even as good, now, might be an extremely difficult matter. All this should be thought about before condemning established trees in suburban gardens. There are, of course, instances where the removal of a tree may be advantageous; but if any doubt exists on the point, it will always be safe to decide in favour of the retention of the tree.

VEGETATION UNDER TREES.

While it is undoubtedly true that many plants and crops will refuse to grow under trees, it is nevertheless a popular fallacy to suppose that nothing will grow there. Enter the wild woodland, and traverse the unbraveous forest for miles in spring and early summer, and see if the earth is destitute of beauty. So far from this being the case, a step can scarcely be taken without crushing some pretty flower or graceful fern. If "nothing will grow under trees," how has come that great expanse of Bluebells there, a rich corerulean carpet, extending, as we have seen, for miles? Is that nothing? On the contrary, it is something with which the flower-bed on the lawn is puny in comparison. Again, observe that where nothing is supposed to grow, we find acres of Lilies—the sweet May-flower, with its waxy bells, and ever-welcome fragrance. These lovely flowers grow under trees, from thence being gathered by cart-loads, and the spikes are often the finest where the shade is the densest.

Then let us not forget that pretty favourite flower, the pale Primrose. Whence come those countless numbers of bunches that meet the townsman at every step on a certain day in April, on the date of which a not-forgotten statesman died? Did these shoals of flowers come from sunny gardens? No; they were gathered in shady banks and copses, from the roots of hedges, and clustering round the stems of trees. And where do wood Anemones grow? Their very name supplies the answer. They clothe the shaded earth with their starry flowers, seldom or never being found in any marked numbers in the sun; and then for a green setting, if we want more than the soft delicacy of the Fern-fronds, we have it in the deeper, firmer, ever-constant green of the Ivy, and yet the cry is heard that the ground under trees is barren. The alarm is false, and the utterers of it blind to the wealth and beauty of the floral world.

A LESSON FROM NATURE.

We have not noticed a tithe of the plants and flowers that grow under trees in woods, but have indicated sufficient to show that we may derive a useful lesson from Nature in rendering certain positions in our gardens more enjoyable. For instance, we may have a good-sized round-headed tree on the lawn, it may be a Hawthorn or a Lime-tree, and pretty enough when in flower, while its shade is welcome in the sultry days of summer. But the ground is bare beneath it, nothing is growing there, not even grass. We like the tree, but the dirty barren earth under it is unendurable, and the tree must therefore give place to a flower-bed set in a new smooth lawn. If the tree is in itself an ornament make no such mistake. Dig well and carefully the ground around the tree, and if poor, as it probably may be, add manure liberally. Then plant it all over with Ivy, either the large or the small leaved sort, pegging the runners down, and amongst the Ivy plant the golden nodding Daffodils, and the chaste Poet's and Pheasant-eyed Narcissuses. Towards the margin insert some roots of Primroses or Polyanthus, with here and there a clump of Lily of the Valley, also wood or garden Anemones, and await the result. Instead of barren earth an evergreen carpet will be provided that will in itself be pleasing, while from it will spring in their season the flowers that have been planted, and the spot once despised will be amongst the most agreeable in the garden. That is what Nature teaches if man would but learn; some, however, have learned, for what we have advised has been carried out with great success.

SHADED BORDERS.

Along the margin of the long narrow enclosures arranged side by side, and attached to suburban dwellings, rows of trees were planted, it may be some years ago. They were admired at the time, and flowers of all sorts grew well between them; but now their roots have impoverished the soil, and their branches cover the entire space. The flowers that were once so bright will no longer thrive, and it is almost resolved to remove the trees, or at least some of them. Well, perhaps a few of them may be spared, but hesitate to destroy even these. Remember the trees over the fence. Their roots will still impoverish your soil, and their branches shade your garden, while you may still remain practically flowerless, and treeless too. Something may be grown in even such a border. Ivy will flourish, and Ferns, also Periwinkles, with their glossy leaves and pale-blue flowers. The St. John's Wort, (Hypericum calycinum) sometimes called the Rose of Sharon, will grow there, and never be unsightly, while for weeks in the summer it will produce its large, golden, many-stamened blooms. The German or Flag Irises will answer well, and their richly-coloured and chastely-pencilled flowers cannot fail being admired. Funkias, which are not sufficiently known and cultivated, beautiful in foliage and flower, succeed in such positions, and are highly attractive, as will Lilies, and Primroses, and Hepaticas, while all kinds of hardy bulbous plants that can be mentioned will be quite at home in that troublesome border, in which "nothing will grow." Let the ground be well dug and fresh soil and manure added, the planting be carefully done as soon as possible, and in the summer let the border be deluged with water frequently, and it will no longer be unsightly, but agreeable.

FRUIT STORES.

Examine fruit that has been gathered and stored away, removing every decaying specimen promptly, or the evil will spread through the entire bulk. Do not keep either Pears or Apples too warm or too dry, or they will shrivel prematurely. A cool, rather damp and dark place is the best for the preservation of the fruit, but it must be safe from frost.

VEGETABLE GARDEN.

Finally earth up Celery, covering every part of the stems with soil, leaving only just the tops of the plants visible above the ridges; also draw soil to the stems of Cabbage-plants, covering them quite up to the leaves, and they will be protected from severe weather which is often so destructive to this indispensable crop.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

BERLIN.—You do not say if the readings are to be in German or English. If German, there are the plays of Goethe, Schiller, etc. If English, Shakespeare, and other standard works too numerous to mention.

CAROLUS.—If you only belonged to what is commonly called the "inferior sex," the one word "knitting" would answer your requirements. As it is, we are almost at a loss what to suggest to you, except you could study elocution and give lessons in it.

CARRIE.—Is not the first of your two songs, "Thou art passing hence, my brother," written by Arthur Sullivan, and sung by Mr. Santley? You will find the song, "I once had a sweet little doll, dear" (both words and music), in a book called, "A Day in a Child's Life."

DIETITIAN.—Horseradish powder is prepared from the roots gathered in November or December, and dried by a gentle heat or exposure to a current of dry air. It is true that horseradish resembles the root of aconite, or wolfsbane, in appearance, and has occasionally been mistaken for it, with fatal results. The two are, however, readily distinguished from each other, as the taste of horseradish is warm and pungent, approaching that of mustard, whilst aconite is bitter, and its odour is earthy and disagreeable, and after a few minutes' contact with the lips, tongue, and fauces, produces a sensation of numbness and tingling.

ECONOMY, No. 4.—The following is a well-tried recipe, which we think is what you require: "Rolled Herrings.—Choose the herrings with soft roes. Having scraped and washed them, cut off the heads, split open and cleanse the fish and take out the roes. Hold one in the left hand, and with thumb and finger of the right press the backbone to loosen it, then lay flat on the board and draw out the bone; it will come out whole, leaving none behind. Dissolve a little fresh butter, pass the inner side of the fish through it, sprinkle pepper and salt lightly over, then roll it up tightly with the fin and tail outwards, roll it in flour and sprinkle a little pepper and salt, then put a small game skewer to keep the herring in shape. Have ready a good quantity of boiling fat, it is best to do the herrings in a wire basket, and fry them quickly for ten minutes. Take them up and set them on a plate before the fire, in order that all the fat may drain from them. Pass the roes through flour mixed with a sufficient quantity of pepper and salt, fry them brown, and garnish the fish with them, and crisped parsley. A difficulty is often felt in introducing herrings at dinner on account of the number of small bones in them, but this is obviated by the above method of dressing, as with care not one bone should be left in."

EYE.—1. The best place to go to is V. Marcot's, fan manufacturer, 18, Newman Street, Oxford Street, W. It is rather expensive to have a fan mounted in real ivory; it costs 45s. for a 12-inch fan, in best ivory, and 35s. in the second quality. Bone is what is generally used, and you can get that at V. Marcot's for 12s. 6d. in the best quality, and 9s. 6d. in the second. 2. The song about Lillibullero was sung at the siege of Londonderry. You will find an account of it in "Macaulay's History of England," Chapter II.

HELEN.—1. Making browning in an iron spoon every time it is wanted to colour gravy is certainly a method of some antiquity, but, for all that, it is slovenly. An easy way to make gravy browning to keep in store is as follows: "Put one pound of raw, or crushed lump sugar into an old frying-pan, set it over a slow fire, and stir it until dissolved and a deep brown colour. Care must be taken at this point that it does not boil over. Pour in gently a pint and a half of water, stir until mixed, let it boil up, remove from the fire, and, when cold, bottle it. A few drops will colour gravy, sauces, or liquors. 2. You will find full and valuable information on "Staining Floors" in a paper entitled "From an Old House to a New One," HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 125. 3. Glucinum is a totally different thing from glycerine. In 1798, Vauquelin discovered the earth glucina (so termed from the sweet taste of its salts). It is found in the beryl and other crystals. From glucina, Wöhler and Bussy obtained the rare metal glucinum in 1828.

JOHN R. W. (Philadelphia).—

THE NAUTILUS AND THE AMMONITE.

The Nautilus and the Ammonite
Were launched in friendly strife,
Each sent to float, in its tiny boat,
On the wide, wild sea of life.

For each could swim on the ocean's brim,
And when wearied its sail could furl,
And sink to sleep in the great sea deep,
In its palace all of pearl.

And theirs was a bliss, more fair than this
Which we taste in our colder clime,
For they were rife in a tropic life,
A brighter and better clime.

They swam 'mid isles, whose summer smiles
Were dimmed by no alloy;
Whose groves were palm, whose air was balm,
And life, one only joy.

They sailed all day through creek and bay,
And traversed the ocean deep;
And at night they sank on a coral bank
In its fairy bowers to sleep!

And the monsters vast of ages past,
They beheld in their ocean-caves;
They saw them ride in their power and pride,
And sink in their deep sea graves.

And hand in hand, from strand to strand,
They sailed in mirth and glee,
These fairy shells, with their crystal cells,
Twin sisters of the sea.

And they came at last to a sea long past,
But as they reached the shore
The Almighty's breath spoke out in death,
And the Ammonite lived no more.

So the Nautilus now in its shelly prow,
As over the deep it strays,
Still seems to seek, in bay and creek,
Its companion of other days.

And alike do we, on life's stormy sea,
As we roam from shore to shore,
Thus tempest toss'd, seek the loved, the lost,
But find them on earth no more.

LILLIE M.—1. Yawning is a natural action when one is tired; but it may occur as a symptom in several diseases. It is probable that in your case it is due to what may be called, generally, "nervousness." Therefore, you should be careful to avoid tea, coffee, or stimulants, and to guard against undue excitement of any kind. And lead as bracing and active a life as possible. Should the yawning continue, then a medical man who can see you ought to be consulted. 2. Indigestion might cause great pain and swelling on the left side; but this may not be due to indigestion. However, be careful what you eat, and choose those articles of diet that experience has taught you suit you best. And follow the advice given for yawning. Here again we must urge you to see a doctor should the trouble continue. 3. Your handwriting is neat and legible, but since you wish for our candid opinion, we cannot say we think it pretty.

MARY D.—The lines you ask for are very well known, and are by Robert, Lord Lytton:

There is a pleasure which is born of pain,
The grave of all things hath its violet.
Else why, thro' days which never come again,
Roams Hope with that strange longing, like Regret?
Why put the poey in the cold dead hand?
Why plant the rose above the lonely grave?
Why bring the corpse across the salt sea-wave?
Why deem the dead more near in native land?

ME MONK.—By all means go on with "Principia Latina, No. II." You cannot do better.

PATER.—1. It is not a large allowance, but might be enough with very great care and cleanliness, provided the goats had a run elsewhere. The usual allowance for six hens and a cock is fifteen feet by nine feet. 2. We should recommend two kinds of fowls, say Brahma and Dorking, as the cross is good. 3. Goats require little more than standing-room for night-quarters, provided they are at liberty in the day. 4. If you wish to keep the breeds distinct, you must have two separate houses, and runs fifteen feet by nine feet, the smallest size.

PERPLEXED.—1. If you refer to the article you mention, you will see that the writer says, "Almost any kind of varnish can be used." Try white spirit varnish or copal; you can buy them at any shop where artist's colours are kept. 2. All the twelve varieties of pheasants mentioned by you are quite distinct. You will find a full account and description of most of them in the "Bird World." 3. a, to rhyme with Holland; b, as in French; c, the French is correct; d, the name is pronounced "Lewis." 4. It is always best to use fish knives and forks for fish of any kind; steel knives give fish an unpleasant taste.

ROSA DARTLE.—1. An "inch of rain" means a gallon of water spread over a surface of nearly two square feet, or 3,630 cubic feet—100 tons upon an acre. 2. We are not prepared to say that you can live on sixpence a day, and maintain the standard of health for any length of time. Dr. Thomas King Chambers says: "A person brought to bare existence diet can undergo no toil, mental or bodily, under the penalty of breaking down." And this writer goes on to say that "the love of purposeless destruction exhibited by the Parisian Communists in our own day, may fairly be credited to deficient food. No well-fed people could have wrecked the Vendôme Column, or burnt the Town Hall and Tuileries, of which they were so proud. They were like hungry children smashing their dolls." 3. Of course you have toothache if you do not live well. Put yourself on a good and sufficient diet, and most likely this trouble will vanish.

ROSEITA.—The lines are from "Thalaba," by Robert Southey, and are correctly given as follows:

How beautiful is night!
A dewy freshness fills the silent air;
No mist obscures, nor cloud, nor speck, nor stain,
Breaks the serene of heaven;
In full-orbed glory, yonder moon divine
Rolls through the dark-blue depths.
Beneath her steady ray
The desert circle spreads
Like the round ocean, girdled with the sky,
How beautiful is night!

WORRIED.—You may probably avoid the trouble of taking up the carpet in order to get rid of the moths, if you wring a coarse towel out of clean cold water, spread it smoothly on the carpet, and iron it dry with a good hot iron, wherever the moths appear. There is no need to press hard, and the colour of the carpet will not be injured, as the moths are destroyed by the heat and the steam.

Puzzles for Prizes.

RULES.

1. Answers should be written on one side of the paper only, and should be posted so as to reach the office, 24, Great New Street, Fetter Lane, E.C., by the first delivery on the Tuesday after date of publication. Envelopes must be addressed, "The Puzzle Editor," and each answer must bear the nom de plume of the writer legibly written on the top of the first sheet.
2. A First Prize of TEN SHILLINGS and a Second Prize of FIVE SHILLINGS will be awarded each week to the best and second-best answers respectively to the two Puzzles set. The Puzzle Editor reserves, however, the right of withholding either the First or Second Prize, or both, if, in his opinion, the answers received should not come up to the required standard of merit.
3. No winner of a First Prize will be eligible for another Prize during the same quarter. A winner of a Second Prize will be eligible for another Second Prize in the same quarter, but not for a First Prize.
4. Every Prize-winner must consent to send his or her name and address for publication.
5. The Puzzle Editor's decision is to be taken as final.

PUZZLES.

1. A Single-Rhymed Alphabet.

Some years ago a writer sent to Notes and Queries a single-rhymed alphabet, and challenged the English-speaking world to produce another. The challenge was accepted by several, among whom was Mr. Mortimer Collins, whose verses began as follows:

"A is my Amy, so slender of waist;
B's little Bet, who my button replaced;
C is good Charlotte, good maker of paste;
D is Diana, the forest who traced;
E is plump Ellen, by Edward embraced;
F is poor Fanny, by freckles defaced."

We ask our readers to write an alphabet on the above model. The lines must consist of ten syllables, and the rhyme is left to the choice of the writer.

2. An Arithmetical Charade.

My 21, 20, 3, 13, 7, 11, is a plant; My 18, 30, 17, is fiery; My 9, 16, 24, is at a distance; My 25, 23, 27, 19, is a useful plant; My 28, 4, 6, 8, is trial; My 22, 14, 1, is a bog; My 5, 10, 12, is to rest; My 15, 2, is a pronoun; My 31, 26, is part of the French negation; My 29 is a vowel; My whole is a proverb consisting of 31 letters.

Prize-Winners in No. 130.

1st Prize, 10s., "The Arabs."
2nd Prize, 5s., "Alice."

Both Prize-Winners are requested to send their names and addresses.

There is not much to be said in favour of the Macaronic Verses, most of our readers having evidently felt their energies unequal to the task. "Alice" has already gained a Second Prize during the present quarter. The verses sent by "Warwickshire Lass" failed in point of metre, but are otherwise good, and would probably have gained a Prize had it not been for this drawback. "Mary" is also ineligible for a Prize, as she has not attempted the Hidden Verse Puzzle.

The Verse hidden by "Manhattan" is as follows:

"We look before and after,
And pine for what is not;
Our sincerest laughter
With some pain is fraught;
Our sweetest songs are those
That tell of saddest thought."—Shelley.

The Verse hidden by "Maiblume" is as follows:

"And the Spring arose on the garden fair,
And the Spirit of Love fell everywhere;
And each flower and herb on earth's dark breast,
Rose from the dreams of its wintry rest."—Shelley.

OUT OF THE RUNNING.—The following Prize-Winners come under the conditions of Rule 3, for thirteen weeks from the date of the Number in which they gained a Prize: No. 119.—1st Prize, "Ekalsek"; 2nd Prize, "Ina." No. 120.—1st Prize, "Dranssem"; 2nd Prize, "Alice." No. 121.—1st Prize, "Achilles"; 2nd Prize, "Comus." No. 122.—1st Prize, "Midnight Oil"; 2nd Prize, "Stella." No. 123.—1st Prize, "Zyx"; 2nd Prize, "Comus." No. 124.—1st Prize, "Ferdinando"; 2nd Prize, "Ambrosia." No. 125.—Equal Prizes, "Frensham," "Ryland," "Maiblume." No. 126.—1st Prize, "Hookwood"; 2nd Prize, "L. C. L." No. 127.—1st Prize, "Manhattan"; 2nd Prize, "Maiblume." No. 128.—1st Prize, "Irish Exile"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 129.—Equal Prizes, "Abracadabra," "Acacia," "Ethel May." No. 130.—1st Prize, "The Arabs"; 2nd Prize, "Alice."

Answers have also been received from—Emma Jane, Incognito, Mary, Oats, and Warwickshire Lass.

Answers to Puzzles in No. 129 received too late from Carrot, Cackle, and Cropped Un.

Odds and Ends.

ON one occasion, an English gentleman, who possessed a keen wit, was at a brilliant assembly of the élite of Vienna, where a distinguished lady of that city frequently amused herself and immediate circle of friends by saying smart and rather uncourteous things, evidently for the purpose of annoyance. "By the way," enquired his fair interrogator, "how is it your countrymen speak French so imperfectly? We Austrians use it with the same freedom as if it were our native tongue." "Madame," retorted the Englishman in the blandest manner, "I really cannot say, unless it be that the French army has not been twice in our capital to teach it, as it has been in yours."

A CUSTOMER, with wrath in his tones and fire in his eye, entered a ready-made clothing establishment in one of our towns the other day. Throwing down the bundle he had bought the day before, he exclaimed: "Here, take back this suit, and give me my money. You warranted it all wool, when it is half-cotton." "Well, I declare!" exclaimed the tailor, throwing his hands into the air. "Well, I declare! Now, that is surprising. I suppose the wool that cloth was made from came from a sheep bred in the south that had been allowed to run through the cotton-fields. That's the only way we could possibly get any cotton in the clothing we sell here."

"I REMEMBER," said a boy to his Sunday-school teacher, "you told me to always stop and count fifty when angry." "Yes? Well, I'm glad to hear it. It cooled your anger, didn't it?" "You see, a boy came into our alley and made faces at me and dared me to fight. I was going for him. He was bigger'n me, and I'd have got punished. I remembered what you said and began to count." "And you didn't fight?" "No, ma'am. Just as I got to forty-two, my big brother came along, and the way he licked that boy would have made your mouth water."

A NEWLY-ARRIVED emigrant in America, in soliciting work, stated that he wanted the money he hoped to earn to send home to Ireland, "where," he added, "I've a wife and seven children, and never saw one of them." This seemed such a bald and stupid lie that the person to whom he was making application for work angrily exclaimed, "How dare you tell me such stuff? How could you have a wife and seven children in Ireland without ever having seen one of them?" "Because, your honour, the one I never saw was born after I sailed for Ameriky."

"It is not calumny nor treachery," says Ruskin, "that does the largest share of mischief in the world; they are continually crushed and are only felt in being conquered. But it is the glistening and softly-spoken lie; the amiable fallacy; the patriotic lie of the historian, the provident lie of the politician, the zealous lie of the partisan, the merciful lie of the friend, and the careless lie of each man to himself, that casts the black mystery over humanity through which every man who pierces we thank, as we would thank one who dug through a well in a desert."

A WITTY old judge, who had spent an evening with a young lawyer in the country, whose office was on the second story, on taking his departure stumbled on the stairs and fell to the bottom. The young lawyer, hearing the noise, rushed out, and seeing the judge lying on his back at the bottom of the stairs, hastened down, and with great anxiety asked, "Is your honour hurt?" "No," said the judge, scrambling to his feet, "but my legs are."

DEAN SWIFT was once dining with a family in which the matron boasted of the number of centuries in which the magical prefix "de" had been the rightful property of her ancestors. The dean heard the tedious and oft-told tale to the end, and then delivered his opinion of all that sort of nonsense by saying, "Madam, will you kindly help me to another piece of de-umpling?"

A NERVOUS man whose life was made miserable by the clattering of two blacksmiths, prevailed upon each of them to remove by the offer of a liberal compensation. When the money was paid down, he kindly enquired what neighbourhood they intended to remove to. "Why, sir," replied Jack, with a grin, "Tom Smith moves to my shop, and I move to his."

A POLITICAL discussion at a club in Paris, which grew warm and threatening, was happily pleasantly stopped by a bon mot of a peacemaker, who exclaimed: "I am opposed to the Bonapartists for this reason, which I hold to be financially profound—the Bonapartists gave us but three Napoleons, while the Monarchists gave us eighteen Louis."

An author was reading some bad verses in his poem to a friend, in an apartment without a fire. The critic cried out, in a shaking fit: "My dear friend, either put fire into your verses, or your verses into a fire, or I shall not be able to stand here any longer."

NORTHCOTE, the painter, being asked by Sir William Knighton what he thought of the Prince Regent, answered, "I don't know him." "Oh, but his Royal Highness says he is acquainted with you." "Does he? Ah, that's only his brag."

IN modern Egypt a young man is not permitted to see his wife's face before marriage. As a consequence, not infrequently soon after marriage he makes up his mind that he never wants to see it again.

FOOTE, being once annoyed by a poor fiddler straining harsh discords under his window, sent him a shilling, with a request "that he would play elsewhere, as one scraper at the door was sufficient."

THE best toast of the season was, we think, given by a printer, viz.: "Woman—the fairest work in all creation. The edition is large, and no man should be without a copy."

"I THOUGHT you told me Mr. Brown's fever had gone off," said a gentleman. "So I did," said his companion; "but I forgot to mention he went off with it."

"You say your brother is younger than you, yet he looks much older." "Yes, he has seen a great deal of trouble; but I never married."

A CORN-DODGER—A man who avoids wearing tight boots.

THE worst of collisions—Running into debt.

SUBLIME Porte—The crusted article.

At a French provincial theatre recently, in a military play, an actor, who was performing the part of a general, slipped on the stage, and fell ignominiously at the very moment when he was supposed to be conducting his troops to battle. With ready wit, however, he saved himself from ridicule by exclaiming, "Soldiers, I am mortally wounded, but do not stay to aid me. Pass over my prostrate body to victory."

THE Irish are naturally witty. As we rode home in a jaunting-car, one of our party, a disciple of Mr. Bergh, reproved the driver for belabouring his horse so constantly with the lash. "Pat was good-natured about the matter. 'Why,' said the gentleman, 'we do not employ whips at all, nowadays, in America.' 'So I have heard,' replied the driver quietly. 'You use revolvers.'"

It is not every one who possesses the coolness of the ambassador whose imperturbable sang-froid so piqued Louis XIV. The monarch vainly attempted to impress him with the glories of his Court, and then thought to embarrass him by interrupting his first speech by calling to him to speak louder. The ambassador merely bowed low, raised his voice, and went on unmoved.

A PHYSICIAN, examining a student as to his progress, asked him: "Should a man fall into a well forty feet deep, and strike his head against one of the tools with which he had been digging, what would be your course if called in as a surgeon?" The student replied: "I should advise them to let the man lie, and fill up the well."

SINCE Mr. Bucolic has learned that there are but four pecks to a bushel, he has come to the conclusion that he cannot afford to feed his hens on corn. "Why," he says, "I have seen them take twenty pecks in as many seconds."

A PAINTER, who had turned physician, was asked why he had quitted his profession. "Because," replied he, "my former exhibited my mistakes in too glaring a manner, therefore I have chosen one in which they will be buried."

AN ingenious French writer observes that those who depend on the merits of their ancestors may be said to search in the root of the tree for those fruits which the branches ought to produce.

THE difference between a "country" and a "city" greenhorn is, that the one would like to know everything, and the other thinks he can tell him.

"It's a grand spoot," remarked a native of Fifeshire to Dr. Hamilton, at Niagara, as he surveyed the grandeur of that stupendous cataract.

BROWN told a friend that he had a great project on foot. The counsel of his friend was that he should go at once to a chiropodist.

WHEN a poor fellow begins going to the dogs, it is only his dog who continues to sympathise with him.

PARADOXICAL.—Tea comes from China, and yet it is poured into it.

"Into Port Greatly."

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

In the discoveries which have revolutionised society, Mr. Harmer had run neck and neck with the scientists of the day, always contriving somehow, however, to get tripped up at the goal.

He was a profound and original thinker, yet his system of philosophy, admirable though it was, gained ground but slowly. His views, in fact, were so advanced that in a busy world, where it is as much as most of us can do to keep pace with the present, few were to be found with sufficient leisure to anticipate the misty future. He tried poetry: his verses bore the impress of genius; nevertheless, on the first appearance of the little volume every critic's pen was against it, and in due course it became stock-in-trade for the waste-paper dealers.

Notwithstanding these repeated failures, Mr. Harmer's abilities were undoubtedly of a high order, and various causes were assigned for his non-success. He himself held a modest opinion that he had come to the birth a decade or two too soon, in which case he might naturally be expected to reap the reward of his temerity. But a poacher on all domains of knowledge, whom no profession could claim, no clique dared patronise, and with ever so many irons to heat, both impatient and impartial—obviously immortality was not for such as he. And thus it happened again and again that, even when his schemes prospered at the outset, none arrived at maturity.

"It maddens me," once said a disappointed friend, alluding to a recent venture, "when fellows with not a spark of native talent carry off the prizes from under your very nose. If your perseverance were equal to your promises, what might you not achieve?"

Mr. Harmer, who accepted the buffets of Dame Fortune with the equanimity of conscious superiority, laughed good-humouredly.

"Pooh! anyone to hear you would suppose I was snuffed out altogether," he said. "That was a small affair. I have a torpedo in hand that will bring me to the front at a bound, as it were."

The reply was characteristic. And the torpedo condemned by a Government committee on account of a slight defect, which would have escaped no man less hasty, he forsook the thorny path of the inventor for the fascinating study of Egyptian hieroglyphics. But presently led to consider the educational question, and perceiving the urgency of reform, he elaborated an enlightened programme, of which his motherless children were the earliest victims, and, abandoning the Pharoahs, henceforth applied himself to the intellectual development of the British masses.

"He discards the primer, does he, and begins with Darwin? Heaven pity his boy and girl!" ejaculated Mr. Heriot, the friend already mentioned, when a mutual acquaintance reported Mr. Harmer's latest craze. "He's incorrigible. And the torpedo should have been the making of him," he groaned.

"Oh, he can take it up at any time," rejoined Mr. Simmons.

But any time is no time, and while the big torpedo, with a model of the wonderful locomotive which was to supersede all others whatsoever, and sundry trifles of a similar description, lay useless in the workshop, biding the master's pleasure, Death, who dallies for naught, and defers to none, hurled his unerring dart. And struck down without warning, Mr. Harmer left little behind to console the young people, with whom our story deals, for the loss of an indulgent and affectionate parent, save these unsatisfactory relics of his versatile genius and the remnant of a once noble fortune.

Happily, however, the orphans were not entirely friendless. Mr. Heriot, a Samaritan of a rare type, quickly appeared on the scene, and, having installed them beneath his own roof, he propitiated the legions of creditors, settled just demands, and otherwise wrought miracles on their behalf.

But not until his demise, which event occurred when his wards were of the age of nineteen and sixteen respectively, did Frank and Jessie Harmer learn that the sum rescued from the general wreck, albeit untouched, would barely suffice for the University career on which the former had set his mind. And realising the situation further, it became evident that either Jessie must accept the offer of a home from a distant relative, for whom her brother entertained an ineradicable aversion, or that he must bid farewell to his long-cherished hopes.

With many pangs—which, to do him justice, he did his best to conceal—Frank chose the latter alternative, and his decision, prompted as much by prejudice as self-denial, was communicated to his sister, as, discussing future plans, they sat side by side in a favourite retreat, the big bow window of the room dedicated to their privacy from the hour they had entered the house they were so soon to quit.

"I'm so sorry, dear," Jessie burst in; "Mr. Heriot always said that you would be senior wrangler one day, and that afterwards you might—"

"Don't turn Job's comforter," he interposed with an uncontrollable ring of pain in his voice. "Pshaw!" bitterly, "you're a girl. How can you understand that a man's ambition dies hard?"

"I think I do," she rejoined quietly. "I had elected to go to Merewether. Why not let me stay with Mrs. Storey?"

"You can't go to her," he said obstinately. "A prim household where they laugh—when they do laugh—by the clock. You'd flash out before a week, and be sent back in disgrace. Besides, if I obtain that appointment in Calcutta, there is nothing to prevent your living with Nan until you can come out to me."

Nan was a superannuated retainer, deaf as a post, residing in a village remote from the haunts of civilisation; the prospect, therefore, apart from a separation wide as the ocean, was not inspiring, and poor Jessie murmured an indignant protest.

"She's not a cheerful companion," Frank granted sympathetically, considering the magnitude of his sacrifice and his sister's lack of appreciation. "But defend me from Cousin Storey. I have a vivid recollection of my early visit to Merewether. The house was the cleanest I had ever been in, and the moral atmosphere was so frigid that I felt frozen up."

"Poor Frank! After unlicensed liberty and Nan's untidy ways I imagine your sufferings. But you were only a little chap."

"You may laugh. If you went you'd freeze up too. Cousin Storey isn't a woman; she's a snow-image. I don't exaggerate. I can't recall her stony dignity and glittering black eyes without a shudder."

"Your picture is irresistible; you stimulate my curiosity," Jessie said with animation. "Be a good boy," linking her arm lovingly within her brother's, "and write and tell her to prepare for my reception."

"Do you mean it?" he asked abruptly, his resolution wavering. "You really want to go to Merewether?"

"I do," she answered firmly. "Be reasonable, Frank dear; father intended you for a great scholar. And—who knows?—by-and-by you may clamber into a professorial chair. Anyhow," she added, "Nan's cottage is no fitting asylum for me. Submit to my guidance for once."

A wild gleam lighted up the young fellow's handsome face. What wonder that, possessing hereditary talent, indomitable perseverance, and the future lavish of its promises, he at last perceived the wisdom of Jessie's counsel?

"I've warned you," he said, but as if the words were forced out of him, and with a tinge of remorse, as he conjured up his visionary Mrs. Storey, "and if you are bent on tempting fate—"

"You forget," interrupted Jessie demurely, "in an emergency I shall have 'son Cuthbert' to fall back on."

"Your audacity aspires to him?"

Whereupon came a merry peal of laughter, and brother and sister, bright, hopeful spirits whom the past, fraught with tender regrets alone, had no power to daunt, wandered forth into the enchanted land where youth supremely reigns—the sunny land where all things are possible, and no wish is nipped by chilling wintry winds, and weaving golden spells—sweet the privilege, if brief!—built fairy palaces anew.

The saddening autumn twilight deepened, familiar shadows stole along the floor into the dim arched recesses by the fire-place, crept up the quaintly carved mantel, and played on the dingy walls as they had played night after night times out of mind. A spectre of a different humour, a horrid form with wings outspread, begrudging the dead a place among the quick, perchance, brooded solitary above the sideboard, veiling the portrait of their late benefactor. A like-minded curious phantom intercepted his accustomed chair. And Jessie, recognising each, shivered somewhat as she, for the first time, noticed the absence of the brooding magian profile on the door, which had been wont to inspire their childish mirth. Gloom sped on to darkness, the household goblins vanished. Still the two talked on, or rather Frank, who, in the plenitude of his eloquence, pacing the thick soft carpet, had come to a stand on the hearthrug, his face irradiated by the red lamp at the corner of the street opposite, talked, and Jessie, proud, patient little woman, listened abstractedly.

"For power to lead right the erring, to reclaim the lost, to awaken the divine within us, that none should be a coward in presence of a wrong, that right might be upheld in no half-hearted way, who would not barter the fairest years of life and never reck the cost?"

At last, "Who is she?" Jessie asked, as her ignorance of nearly everything concerning Mrs. Storey occurred to her.

"Who is she?" Frank iterated gruffly, pausing in his lofty flight. "Say at once that you're languishing to know all about the woman. She's Silas Storey's widow, and he was our mother's second cousin. Mr. Heriot," he continued, "confirmed my boyish impressions. "In her prime, and of a majestic figure, no regal robes," he said, "could add to the stateliness of her mien." He also informed me, that with an ample income, she's inclined to personal austerity, and that her prudence borders on parsimony, that, not generous, she's charitable on principle, and that her periodical disbursements may be freely counted upon. In other respects, depend upon it, Jess, she's no better if no worse than her neighbours. Mr. Heriot sent your photograph to her," he ended, "and as the one passion, the sole romance of her life, was her love for her husband, I have no doubt that we're indebted for her invitation to your resemblance to our faraway kinsman."

"And lucky for us she detected it," Jessie thought. "How foolish it would have been to have refused her offer!"

Her brother's consent obtained, and Mrs. Storey communicated with, in high glee at the easy solution of their difficulties, Jessie's arrangements were soon complete.

"Don't blame me hereafter if you grow tired of Merewether," Frank reiterated at parting, when his sister was about to start on her journey.

The carriage-door banged to, a laughing reply was cut short, the lovely face, framed in rippling brown hair, clouded and in a mist of tears, Jessie nodded a final adieu from the window.

The down-train had been signalled. The officials at Manning Mead, where passengers change for Merewether, roused up from their habitual torpor, bestirred themselves, and the gate opened. Cuthbert Storey brushed past the porter on duty, mounted the steps, and traversed the bridge.

A tall, personable young fellow, freshly coloured, his well-knit frame hardened with much out-door exercise and manly sports, he stalked up and down the platform with a masterful air that was habitual to him until the train glided in, when eagerly scanning the occupants of the carriages, his piercing black eyes suddenly encountered another pair, softly grey, which from under long, dark, curling lashes returned his gaze with grave steadfast seriousness. And the owner—what a pretty dainty little creature she was! Out-and-out prettier than her photograph—was the object of his quest.

His honest face glowing with pleasurable emotion, his pulses quickening, without more ado he strode forward; a mite of a hand was held out trustfully, then came a warm clasp, and an introduction was effected. And the murmured words of kindly welcome, transparently sincere, dispelling the nervousness which had been fast taking possession of Jessie, when they had driven a mile or so, she recovered her gaiety and they were excellent friends.

The country around was gently undulating, and following the course of the river, the road wound in many a sweeping curve, so that they were upon the Granite House, lying in a sequestered hollow on the outskirts of the town, before she was aware of its proximity. A square, solid-looking block of masonry, its exterior was not prepossessing. Ruthless autumn, too, had painted out the gorgeous tints of summer, and stripped the trees; dank decaying leaves, their faint, earthy odour subtly suggestive of mortality, strewed the ground. The fields were bare and brown; the afternoon was waning; no twittering birds hopped blithely in the hedges; not a breath stirred as they drove up the avenue, and a lonely rook, flapping his wings overhead, cawed hoarsely, a strange uncanny silence seized upon the girl.

The disturbing sense of an all-pervading stillness cleaving to her, dumbly she crossed the threshold of her new home. Mrs. Storey's kiss was not chillier than her own. Cuthbert also, she noted, was apparently succumbing to the same mesmeric influence. The domestics, the very dogs, seemed tongue-tied, and even poor puss's mew sounded low and dolorous.

How thankful she was when ten o'clock struck and the Bible and Prayer Book were taken from their baize bags and the servants filed in and out, and the day ended and she could go to bed.

But Jessie was a healthy little maiden, not wont to indulge in morbid fancies. Petted and spoiled by her father and Mr. Heriot, and everybody with whom she had hitherto been brought into contact and having ministered to her pleasure, the world to her was a garden of thornless flowers, to be plucked without let or hindrance by whomsoever would.

And at breakfast, with the morning glory resting on the sloping hills, the river meandering through the meadows shimmering like burnished silver, and the room a blaze of cheerful light, her natural vivacity reasserted itself. The confidential maid who waited behind Mrs. Storey's chair, smiled grimly at each fresh sally. Within her knowledge, no such fearless and freespoken young lady had set foot in the house, and foreseeing a bad time for Miss Harmer, she good-naturedly resolved to caution her.

"We're a bit stiff and formal," she said, diplomatically insinuating advice with the hair-pins as she essayed to smooth Jessie's tangled locks after her scamper with the dogs when out with Cuthbert.

"But then we're dependable. Neither gay nor gloomy is our temper, and meals to a minute, and things in their places"—a glance at the hat on the floor—"and the maids set their tasks of a morning after 'Holy living and dying,' which is our regular reading, miss; we're spared the moil and toil and worry of London ways. And any young lady as 'd settle down and not run counter, the mistress 'd make much of."

"Am I running 'counter,' as you call it?" Jessie asked in astonishment. "There doesn't appear to be anything to run counter to," she said mournfully. "Please be more explicit. Merewether must be very dull."

"Dull! Bless you, miss, if you belong to the ladies' sewing club, and can sew nicely, you may go out to tea every night of the week."

"But I can't sew. And I sha'n't join the club. A sewing club—good gracious!"

"The mistress'll expect it; she's cutting out for you."

"But I've been cutting out for myself, Ursula. I'm going to read hard."

"I'd think twice, miss, before I ran counter to Merewether ways," slowly. "Mr. Cuthbert tried it on, but the tide was too strong for him. My! the dinner-bell."

"Frank is at his best pulling against the stream," thought Jessie contemptuously, shrewdly interpreting Ursula's figurative speech, but with no immediate intention of allowing the hint so plainly conveyed to regulate her conduct, as may be inferred from a short passage in a letter to her brother which she dispatched the same evening.

"If there is room for only one mind and one will at the Granite House, as Ursula says, a collision is inevitable. But at present, dear, to reassure you, I have nothing much to complain of. And although I don't profess to be as respectful as Cuthbert, nor shall I attempt to imitate him, I am, I believe, notwithstanding the maid's scepticism on the point, in his mother's good graces. And if everything, including the kennels, hadn't such a newly-washed, newly-polished aspect, and the furniture—it's of the style auctioneers describe as 'handsome'—didn't seem quite so much as if it were nailed to the floor, and a portion of the latent fire smouldering in the depths of cousin's eyes could be transferred to the grates these cold mornings—we have frost already down here—I don't know but that I might be grateful that my lines had been cast in a pleasant place. Yet I—No, I won't commit myself."

As the months rolled on, Ursula's incredulity was clearly justified. Unaccustomed to the yoke in a punctilious household, the girl, with her outspoken frankness and independence of control, was not unlike the firebrand to which she was frequently compared. And as the girl contrived daily to offend, Mrs. Storey, grown indifferent to the casual likeness which had ensured her temporary indulgence, and repenting of her leniency, deemed it a moral and religious duty to crush so rebellious a spirit, and addressed herself to the task with an ardour that threatened a fulfilment of Frank's prognostications.

"You have been shamefully neglected, my dear," she said, in a horrified tone, beginning the good work; "don't let me hear you quote your father's heterodox sentiments again."

"Why not, Cousin Storey?" innocently. "But I didn't tell you of the visit we once received from a foreign prince whom Nan showed straight into the family sanctum. We were in a state of hopeless confusion as usual. Every chair and table was littered with diagrams, magazines, and newspapers. But it was the proudest day of my life," Jessie asserted rapturously. "Dear father was born orator. His words ran through one's veins like quicksilver, and our illustrious guest, enthroned on a pile of cobwebby folios, was so fascinated with his conversation, that he sat and sat as if he were never going. No wonder," she wound up, "I hated the girlish gossip at the college."

"Most girls would be ashamed, and properly so, of the wretched muddle you depict so very graphically," commented Mrs. Storey dryly.

"Yes. Isn't it a curious feature in girls, cousin, that they're only ashamed when shame is ridiculous? Ours was a charming house," with marked distinctness. "Everybody who ever entered it was at home directly."

"You're not an admirer of your own sex?"

"Oh dear no. I often wish I were a boy. Boys are freer. They may bang doors, climb trees—what may they not do?"

"You must curb your tongue, Jessie," sharply, "or you will shock the majority—people with old-fashioned notions of womanly propriety—and likely enough die an old maid."

"Majorities don't govern us yet. But I'll bear that in mind, Cousin Storey," gravely. "If Frank should tire of me, as you cruelly suggested yesterday, I ought to think of marrying a rich husband provided—"

Mrs. Storey, significantly arching her brows, exchanged glances with her son.

"You shouldn't talk so, Jessie," he interposed, reddening. "A woman marrying for money—faugh!"

"You put the worst possible construction on all I do and say," she laughed, unabashed. "You two never can understand."

"You spoke plainly," he muttered.

"Out of evil cometh good," reflected Mrs. Storey complacently as he strode out of the room, shutting the door with a jarring violence that ought to have diminished Jessie's envy of masculine prerogatives. "He will think no more of her."

And in her elation waxing confidential, while dressing she poured into the ear of her trusted maid the haunting fears that had of late beset her, and their removal, adding:

"Miss Harmer's training has been against her, and I have overlooked much. But a rich husband, forsooth! Her mind is warped. She glories in wrong-doing, and contrition is unknown to her. As my son's wife she would have been intolerable to me."

"Who can read a young soul aright, ma'am?" asked Ursula, prepared with the warmth of humble friendship to advocate her favourite's cause. "For all her high spirits, Miss Jessie has the tenderest heart. And she's rarely affectionate. The other night when she'd ate no dinner, being in her tantrums, I made bold to take her up a bit o' supper, and the woeful little face she turned to me was the master's own when you lost your second, ma'am. A bonnie boy he was!"

"The likeness is not so striking as we fancied at first," Mrs. Storey observed coldly, but not unmoved.

"Maybe not, ma'am. She had been writing to Nan," continued Ursula, "tear-blots were on the paper. And she asked me could I read the letter? 'I want old nurse to be pleased with it,' she says. It was the sweetest letter. A make-believe from end to end, 'tis true—how that she was getting on finely, and was as happy as a bird. And—"

"An artful composition. If Mr. Cuthbert's eyes had not been already opened I should not have hesitated to—"

"Pardon me, ma'am, but he has a spice of your own temper. And it's not to a young lady's detriment that she should remember a faithful servant."

"You forget your place," haughtily.

"Mr. Cuthbert's a dutiful son. But best not to interfere," the privileged maid rejoined with blunt directness. "And time 'll tame her; with patience she'll do us credit yet."

"If, indeed, I were not altogether mistaken, Mr. Cuthbert is disgusted with her, I tell you."

Ursula cocked her smooth grey head knowingly.

"There's a glamour about a pretty face that none of 'em, high or low, is insensible to, ma'am. And the winsome—and where will you find a winsome young lady than Miss Jessie?—the longer they are sickening of 'em, as stands to reason. And some is never sickened. If Mr. Cuthbert follows in his father's steps, who's to say him 'nay'?"

"Have done, Ursula. Since the girl is here, I'll do my duty by her. But if I thought my son would stoop to a mercenary jade—"

"Seems to me, ma'am, saving your presence, that he'd be a fool to open his mind to her, at any rate at present. She'd laugh at him," the provoking Ursula put in. "Mr. Cuthbert's an altered man since she came. But she—"

"Don't talk nonsense," said Mrs. Storey impatiently.

"A bad job if she could never be brought to see him as we see him," the maid finished lugubriously.

And guiltily conscious that she had exhibited a vexatious subject under novel and exasperating conditions, and thereby contributed to her mistress's chagrin, she discreetly withdrew.

"Your mother aggravated me to that degree that I didn't care what I said," Jessie declared, replying to Cuthbert, who in a cousinly sort of way had ventured to remonstrate with her. "One can't run or do anything without being gimleted by a pair of eyes—and such eyes, too! Oh, life at Merewether is a hateful business! I shall die if I remain much longer."

"You grieve me. We speak to you for your good."

"People always say that when they're particularly disagreeable," Jessie scoffed. "You appear to take a positive pleasure in tormenting me. Once you used not to be so unkind, Cuthbert."

"Unkind!" with agitation. "What have I done? Don't spare my feelings."

"Why should I?" aggressively. "You never spare mine."

"If you would endeavour to be more like other girls, and try to please my mother in little things, we might get on so—so much more comfortably. You regret your unlucky speech," glancing at her furtively, "don't you?" asked Cuthbert, with a shade of anxiety in his tones.

"No, I don't!" wilful Jessie answered shortly. "And it was not so dreadful that I need regret it. Under some circumstances it would be almost heroic to marry a rich man. Suppose a millionaire, not at all loveable, that no woman in her senses could be fond of were to ask me to be his wife, in that case mightn't it be a virtue to marry him, and be good to him?"

"What a girl you are! The American humourist expressed himself in similar terms of the Mormon elders," Cuthbert remarked sarcastically. "Perhaps you're not aware that in this country it is a masculine article of faith that all men are loveable to their wives."

Jessie laughed scornfully.

"You'll affirm next that Mr. Pengelly was married out of love. A fat, blink-eyed, hoarse-voiced monster."

"Mrs. Pengelly's tastes may be peculiar. But that it was a love-match—"

Jessie shook her head dissentingly.

"My father was married for love, if you like. He was a splendid man. There was an immense distance between him and most people. But he was so kind and genial that even the oddest creatures were at ease with him. And Frank is just like him, so unselfish and so clever. He doesn't live for the daily consumption of so much beef and mutton—not he. And when he leaves college he's going in for social reform."

"Awful uphill work before him," Cuthbert said lazily, amused with her earnestness.

"Frank won't mind hard work. What do you think of a League of Truth? I proposed it. In a Christian land it's horrible. But Frank agreed with me that it's as much required as a Temperance League or any other league."

"Did he?" murmured Cuthbert. "It's a grand idea. Only truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, would lead to such rows. Fancy a heap of firebrands scattered broadcast!"

"Now you're laughing. Oh, I do miss Frank! He was so sympathetic and nice. Here you either ridicule everything I say that doesn't conform to your own narrow views, or you misconstrue everything, which is worse," with a quiver in her voice.

"It seems to follow," gently, returning to the starting-point, "that when a girl admits that she's on the look-out for a rich husband, that—"

"You're coarse. Didn't I tell you that I was goaded into it? But now you're about it," resignedly, "rake up everything against me."

"I wish you could be friends. My mother is the best woman in the world, if you know her. You must get to love her in time."

"That shows your ignorance. People can't 'get to love.' They love each other because—they must. And a loveless life," breaking into a sob, "is the dreariest, the wretchedest, the most miserable—"

"Don't cry, dear—pray don't. If you've been wretched so have I. You've looked so sad at times. And longing to comfort you, I've wished I—I had the right."

And not being gifted with Ursula's discernment, and being, besides, unacquainted as yet with the mysterious depths and intricacies of the female heart, Cuthbert there and then disclosed a secret that startled, alarmed, and finally angered Jessie.

"I've loved you from the first—from the hour we met at the station. I'm certain of it. Don't you believe me?" An ominous silence. "Say something, darling," entreatingly. "Would you marry me?"

"Say something!" she repeated, her cheeks flaming. "After what I've said, you're insulting to speak to me so. You've betrayed my confidence. And if I loved you to distraction—and I don't," emphatically, "I wouldn't marry you."

"There is no necessity to get into a rage," he said unsteadily. "I shan't insult you again, Miss Harmer."

"Your mother would be mad. What possessed you? It was so—so silly."

"I incline to that opinion myself," with a grating laugh.

"How could you?" she asked, in a reproachful, injured tone.

"Now I must go to Nan."

"It would lessen the pain of your refusal, Jessie, if you'd let things be as they are," he faltered. "Will you oblige me in this?"

"Since you wish it," irresolutely. "Still, I'd rather not stay."

At the door he halted abruptly.

"I don't think you've been candid with me. I see how it is. A girl likes to be proud of her husband, and you couldn't be proud of me," he said humbly. "I am an ignoramus. But if I had any incentive I'd make up for lost time. I'd read with a vengeance. I'd go at it as I went at that stiff bit of fence dividing—"

Jessie shuddered. "And risked your neck. Please don't, Cuthbert."

"My brains are nothing to boast of, but I have a wonderful memory. With the least encouragement I'd take the shine out of Frank and the lot of them."

A pitying smile.

"You think they've lain fallow too long? Well, brought under proper cultivation, fallow ground produces splendid crops."

Frank had returned to college. Cuthbert cast his books aside, and hoping to undo the work of which it needed not the maid's caustic tongue to assure him none who had contributed had reason to be proud, devoted himself to Jessie. But, Heaven forgive them! for the time being too surely the best part of her was dead. Plodding wearily on, swerving neither to the right nor to the left, she imitated as closely as possible that model of all womanly virtues, Miss Thornhill. And, as the weeks flitted by and the transformation seemed complete, loving her with the passion of a sluggish nature stirred for once to its depths, and gathering in intensity until fired to fever-point, his misery might well have revenged her martyrdom.

But this state of things could not long continue. A crisis approached. Retired to rest as usual, the household, Cuthbert excepted, were wrapped in slumber, when in the profound stillness that precedes the early morning, a smell of burning, accompanied at intervals by unaccountable hissing sounds, attracted his attention. Rising, he partially dressed, and, directed by the stifling smoke ascending densely from below, bent on investigation went downstairs. A lurid glow, a sullen roar, increasing in volume, discovered that fire of a serious character raged in the basement, and retracing his steps, after rousing the other inmates, he sped through the grounds to the nearest cottages for assistance.

Meanwhile a frightened group, from which, however, the gaunt upright form of Mrs. Storey's maid was absent, had assembled in the hall.

"Where's Ursula?" Jessie gasped, her rapid glance questioning the shrinking servants.

"Ursula?" they repeated stupidly, their tones hushed. Could it be that they had forgotten her, and that she was sleeping on? Even so.

Snatching at cook's heavy shawl, Jessie folded it tightly around her, and escaping from Mrs. Storey's detaining grasp, with swift feet flew past them.

But the fire was not confined to the lower storey, it had broken out in the rooms above. At the stair-head, as if in mockery, a tongue of flame darted out, and, unprepared for the scorching heat, she paused.

Just at that moment Cuthbert returned, a crowd of willing labourers at his heels, and his mother, speechless, clutched his arm, pointing to the slender figure on the landing, its every graceful curve outlined on the fiery background.

"Miss Jessie, Miss Jessie!" the servants screamed. "Come back, come back; you'll be burnt alive!"

But the opportunity she had sighed for had come at last.

"It may not be too late to save her," she thought. And there was no blenching in the dauntless little heart. For an instant only she faced them, and sweet and clear the girlish voice rang out: "Into port greatly!" and, waving her hand, she vanished from view.

Breaking from the men, Cuthbert bounded upstairs; he too disappeared in the blinding smoke. And not to dwell upon the mother's agony, so fearful was the tension of the long-drawn minutes that elapsed until his re-appearance with Jessie a limp fainting burden in his arms, and Ursula, swathed in blankets, unscathed, by his side, that the shout of joy which greeted them was echoed far and wide.

But now, staggering towards them, they saw that Ursula led him, that, scorched and blackened, he was blind.

"Into port greatly!" he murmured with a feeble smile, as they took Jessie from him. And they bore him senseless to the friendly shelter of the first cottage.

Unconscious of all else around him, Ursula would have it that Jessie's presence afforded him relief, that her voice had power to still the piteous moaning that, night or day, scarcely ceased. And when the girl—who was badly burnt, but whose injuries were slight in comparison with his—heard this, she managed to crawl daily to the sick-room.

After weeks of torturing suspense Mrs. Storey's prayers were granted. Dear life was spared, and there was a hope that sight might be restored. But a year and more came and went before Cuthbert, his face haggard and pallid, but otherwise little marred, was able to walk about unattended.

The glorious summer was at its height. Sitting under the trees out of sight of the house, Jessie's hand in his, while a choir of birds sang overhead rejoicingly, he repeated the story, ever new yet old as Eden, and so sure was he of her answer, that he interpreted her shy silence as he wished and she intended. For little Jessie was a woman all at once. She knew now that she loved him, guessed that she must have done so long ago. And though she had learnt that no life is exempt from duties proper to it, no shadow of doubt had she of coming into port greatly. And what less could be expected than that she was proud, happy beyond expression, to be his wife?

"Only at first," as she naively confessed, "it seemed almost too good to be true."

Nor was the past fierce suffering thrown away on Mrs. Storey. Prudence is an admirable quality, but she now cultivated the more active virtues. Charity leavened her life and conversation, and was not dispensed merely at calculated periods.

As to Frank, with a strong head and a determined will, he wrestled with and overcame all obstacles, obtaining eventually the worldly success he craved. But on his occasional flying visits to the Granite House, rebuilt in accordance with Jessie's tastes, he was heard to lament the early fading of his youthful dreams, "for then was it better with him than now."

And Ursula, standing behind her mistress's chair as of yore, smiled the vengeful smile of the domestic prophet:

"I told 'em there'd be an awakening."

Gorse Blossoms.

I PUT my fortune to the touch
That morning long ago in spring,
When she and I went wand'ring through
Pale woods, where birds began to sing
Wee twittering notes, in quavering quests
For sheltered spots to hold their nests.
Oh, yellow glowed the golden gorse!
The scent filled all the clear bright air;
The growing leaves just peeping forth
Seemed opening as we watched them there.
The river washed its silver strand,
And sang, "See! spring holds out her hand."
Oh, yellow gorse, you caught her dress!
I dare not touch her garment's hem,
Until I stooped, half-awed, half-shamed,
To loose her twined around your stem.
Your blossoms whispered sweetest sighs,
I gazed within my sweetheart's eyes.
Oh, I was young, and she was fair,
And, like your radiance, bright and sweet
Glowed the luxuriance of her hair;
And o'er the heath her little feet
Danced, as the daylight, fading slow
Told us, alas! 'twas time to go.
I caught her hand and held it fast;
She turned away, yet let me keep
Its tender touch, so soft, so fine.
Dear love, 'tis only when I sleep
I feel again those fingers' hold,
I see once more those locks of gold!
Oh, yellow gorse, oh, yellow gorse!
She left me in that fair spring-time;
I could not, dare not pray to keep,
A love that faded e'er its prime.
Yet still about your scented place
Hangs fair remembrance of her face.

His Own Guest.

(A SERIAL STORY.)

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE little dinner passed off very pleasantly—at least the earlier part of it did. Lady Meredith had noticed the lack of cordiality existing between Colonel Skooter and the friend of the family—as she now considered Gordon—and with womanly tact had managed to keep them as far apart as the size of her small party would admit of, although to effect this she had to place the American, whom she disliked as much as Gordon himself did, next to herself.

Happily the colonel was not wanting in 'cuteness, and by this time had realised the fact that his compliments to the lady of the house were productive only of hauteur, hence he confined himself to such observations as "that although Britishers bred elegant roast beef, and their women were all there for beauty, yet that they couldn't fix a salad, and that their liquors were nowhere," to all of which Lady Meredith bowed a gracious and smiling acquiescence.

Rubina, who was seated on the other side of Colonel Skooter, was quite contented to be left out of the conversation, assuming, on the strength of the supposititious help she had lent Lady Meredith, an air of genteel lassitude.

When the servants had left the party to their dessert, Lady Meredith seized the opportunity of Edith's asking Mary to go over and spend a day at the cottage, to introduce the subject of Mary's proposed trip to London on the next day.

She was going on a visit of some weeks to the Harkers, explained her ladyship, and they wished her to join them in London, where they were then staying, preparatory to their return to Eastcote Hall.

This announcement made, Lady Meredith glanced surreptitiously and with some anxiety at her son; to her amazement the frowning face she expected to see was all smiles.

"That will be delightful!" Sir Charles exclaimed.

"Polite, upon my word, Sir Charles," commented Edith.

Rubina cast aside her air of lassitude and looked interested. She had already woven a little romance anent the separation of the lovers and their consequent deaths by broken hearts, and had planned a satisfactorily mournful visit to her dressmaker in search of such sable garments as she had not worn since the death of Dr. Morgan. She was so attached to Mary and so admired Charles that, if anything did happen to them, she was not the one to begrudge a few yards of crape or an extra black bonnet.

Lady Meredith was so taken aback by her son's receipt of her news that for the moment she set it down as the result of her maternal warning against an impecunious marriage; but Mary was so pained that she could scarcely keep the tears from welling up into her pretty blue eyes.

Both of the women were speedily undeceived by Sir Charles saying: "I too am going to town to-morrow, and shall be glad to act as Mary's escort."

Lady Meredith almost bounded from the chair.

Had her son announced that his wedding with his cousin was about to take place on the morrow, and that bridesmaids had been invited and wedding-cake ordered, she could not have been more horrified.

"You are going to London to-morrow!" she gasped, doubting for a moment if the whole business were not an arranged affair between the pair.

The doubt did not, however, remain long in her mind, for she knew the truthfulness of Mary's nature, and felt that she could trust her to keep a promise, come what might.

"What is taking you to town so suddenly?" she asked of her son, as soon as she could force herself to speak calmly.

"I have had a telegram from my old schoolfellow, Willie Bourne, who is seriously ill, and wants me to go and cheer him up a bit, poor old chap!"

"It's very inconsiderate of him at such a moment."

"To be seriously ill, mother?"

"Charles, I wish you would be more serious on serious subjects. I mean, of course, his taking you away from your electioneering business at such a critical moment. I suppose he's got some one to look after him."

"Well, mother, you see he lives in chambers, where there are seven other lodgers, I believe, to be cleaned for, cooked for, and looked generally after by a staff of two."

"I do hope, Charles, you are not going to stop in such a crowded hole," observed Lady Meredith.

"And whooping-cough and measles so prevalent in London just now, and both so catching," chimed in Rubina, who, on the strength of the late Dr. Morgan's avocation, thought it her bounden duty to read the Registrar-General's reports, and so keep up a sort of standing acquaintance with the ills to which flesh is heir.

"No, there is no room for me; I shall put up at the Langham, it is close to Bourne's diggings."

"Diggings! What does he dig?" asked Rubina innocently.

With one of her silvery laughs, Edith explained that "diggings" was the short for bachelor lodgings.

Rubina was nettled at the laugh, and bridling up, thanked Providence she had not yet descended to the unladylike depth of studying a slang dictionary.

"Talking of diggings," said Colonel Skooter, turning to Mr. Pennington, who was his other neighbour at table, and lowering his voice, "I've had it on my mind for days past to bring to your notice a splendid investment."

"Better have it on your mind than on your conscience, colonel," observed Mr. Pennington.

Colonel Skooter looked up from the pheasant wing he was engaged upon, to see if he was being chaffed, but the old gentleman's face was as serious as a J.P.'s should be.

"The truth is that in this played-out old country," he continued, "no end of capital is locked up for good investments. You Britishers are so darned afraid of anything but your Three per Cents. In America, when a man has a dollar, he invests it in something that will bring him in a V-piece; over here you wrap it up in the toe of an old stocking for fear of putting your foot in it, and placing it under your pillow at night, go to sleep to your interest. Now I know that you've money, judge, and I know that you have good commercial sense."

"Perhaps the latter has brought me the former, colonel."

"It ought to have brought you double, treble, what it has then," observed Colonel Skooter enthusiastically.

Mr. Pennington bowed his acknowledgment of the compliment, and a queer little amused smile twitched the corners of his mouth.

"I heard yesterday—quite by chance, sir—that you were hankering after Grassmere Farm, which has just been advertised."

"I am sure you are very kind to take so much interest in my affairs."

"Oh, don't mention it. I've taken a kind o' fancy to you," observed the colonel in perfect good faith, "and so I'm going to give you a bit of advice, and say that, were I in your place, I'd chuck the farm plan over."

"Would you, really?"

"Yes; keeping a farm in this bit of a country really means keeping it nowadays—it won't keep you. Now there's the Cortez Mine; you've heard of the Cortez Mine, I suppose?"

No, Mr. Pennington had not heard of it.

"I wonder at that, now. The Cortez Mine, sir, will pay you, sir, not a paltry five or ten per cent."

"No?"

"But five times ten, sir, I guess. It's paying fifty per cent."

"Paying you fifty per cent?"

"Well, everybody up to now."

"You answer for its soundness as an investment?"

"Sound as a nut. You would not find me in it if it wasn't. You see, I'm not going to work it myself, only to let it, so as to bring me in the modest interest of four or five per cent., which you, sir, despise."

But, of course, such a splendid opportunity will be seized upon by those who are of a more speculative turn of mind than I am."

"That is so," acquiesced the colonel, still uncertain whether Mr. Pennington was speaking ironically or in earnest. The doubt was, however, soon solved.

"Colonel," resumed Mr. Pennington, "it's been excessively good of you to take so much trouble for my interest, and in case it should be an advantage to you to part with a few of those shares, let me advise your offering them to—"

"Yes, to whom?" queried the colonel eagerly.

"To Captain Gordon."

There was a pause, and an angry look, such as he had given on more than one previous occasion, passed across the colonel's face.

"Look here, judge," he said, "an American has one advantage over a Britisher—he knows when he's licked. Guess I am. Gordon's been talking to you about me. Don't deny it."

"I haven't the least intention of doing so, colonel."

"Well, I don't bear malice against you, sir, but I'll pay him out as sure as my name's Skooter. Splitting on an old friend!"

The colonel relapsed into sulky silence.

"Curse him! I'll spoil his little game and yours too. You are playing something together; exactly what, I don't know yet, but I shall before I have done," he thought.

Lady Meredith had not heeded the conversation between the colonel and Mr. Pennington. It was enough for her that it had withdrawn the former's attention from herself, and given her an opportunity of mentally reviewing the situation.

Nothing could possibly have been more unfortunate than this sudden summons of her son to London; not only would he depart on the same day as, and probably in the company of, Mary, but, what was worse, the Harkers were staying at the Langham.

Had she only known of this summons a few minutes earlier, it would have mattered less; she could then have arranged with Mary for the postponement of her visit for a few days, and dispatched a telegram with an excuse to Lady Harker, but now she had announced Mary's departure for the next day, as it were, in public.

Gordon, too, had a plan in his head which tended townwards, and Charley's going would make the journey a pleasant one. At least such was his thought for the moment, but after a while the good old adage of two being company and three none occurred to him, and he resolved to leave by a later train.

The ladies made a very dull quartette in the drawing-room waiting for the gentlemen to leave their wine and join them.

Lady Meredith, under cover of a novel, was debating whether she must try, or rather whether she must succeed, in stopping her son's or her niece's departure the next day. Under no circumstances must they stay beneath the same roof without her watchful eye being there to prevent the mischief she most dreaded. As she had noted of late that Charles was not so amenable to her will as formerly, she for the moment saw no way out of the dilemma but that of keeping Mary on some pretence at home. Doubtless Lady Harker would be offended at having her plans upset at the eleventh hour, but to ensure what she considered her son's welfare, Lady Meredith would have sacrificed the friendship of every woman she knew.

Rubina was reposing in a lounge-chair. She had fallen asleep after her early rising, and although she had laid herself out to the best advantage, looked angular and uncomfortable.

Mary was listlessly turning over the leaves of a portfolio in any thing but a happy frame of mind. The little gleam of sunshine which had fallen athwart her path when she heard that Charles was going to town, and to stay at the very hotel as herself, was but a very transient one. It would but increase her misery to have him near her, she reflected. Fate was too cruel to plan against her the additional torture.

Edith was the only bright one amongst them. For her everything was couleur de rose. It was true that Tom (she could not think of him as Captain Gordon, her thoughts carried her back too far for that, and almost from the first she had seen through the alias) had declared he would right himself with the world before claiming her as his wife. Well, she had no objection to wait, but should he fail to put forward that claim when she considered a sufficiently long time had elapsed, why then she would claim him as her husband. Her father was with her in the matter, and what cared she for the world's opinion?

She was making no pretence of any more exhaustive or improving employment than that of playing with a magnificent Angora cat which had jumped upon the seat beside her.

Tiring of her occupation, she took the animal in her arms, and depositing it in the lap of the sleeping Rubina, she went over to Mary, and said:

"My goodness, child, don't look so miserable! One would think Lady Meredith had said, 'Get thee to a nunnery' instead of sending you to town. It isn't the season, I know, but London is awfully jolly at the end of October, provided November fogs keep to date. The theatres are all in full swing, and one isn't parboiled in them, and, oh, the boon of the 'Saturday and Monday Pops' not having started, and saving one the necessity of joining the army of Sapphiras, who pretend to understand the Andante con moto from Wagner's 'Fifth Symphony,' or to adore the 'Rondo in G minor Concerto' of Mozart."

"But, Edith, you like music?"

"As a pleasure, dear, yes—as a study, no. I like your music, Mary, though," Edith went rattling on, "you never seem to soar above my comprehension. Come play me something now, that old-fashioned 'Réverie' of Rosellin's, or better still, the March from the 'Prophète,' that will reach the ears of the men, and bring back to their minds the fact of our existence."

Anything seemed better to poor Mary than having to talk and make herself agreeable to the woman whom she could look upon in no other light than that of a rival. She rose and went to the piano, but it was no stormy march that her supple fingers evoked from the instrument, only a simple pianoforte arrangement of the well-known "Auld Robin Gray."

There was nothing particularly applicable to her own love-story in that of the Scotch ballad, but somehow the music seemed to touch her heart, and before she had got through half of the piece she burst into tears, got up, and left the room.

Edith was terribly surprised and grieved; she was exceedingly attached to Mary, and fain would have done her best to comfort her. She was about to follow her friend, but Lady Meredith, who had noted the whole proceeding, prevented her.

"Let her be alone a while, Edith," she advised. "Mary has not been quite well for some time, and I have noticed that any attempt at petting her only makes her worse. It is this depression of spirits that determined me to advise her accepting the Harkers' invitation, although," added her wily ladyship, "she seems so poorly to-night that I am really doubting the wisdom of letting her leave home for a few days."

Poor little Mary! she did not seek the refuge of her own room, she feared too much that Edith or Lady Meredith would join her, and she wanted to be alone, where she could finish her cry and then summon back courage to the brave little heart that so plainly told her the idol of her girlish dreams had to be removed from the shrine at which she had worshipped, and placed upon that of another and wealthier devotee; further, that it was her duty to help, if necessary, in its removal. Ah, that was the hardest part of it!

For the first time, perhaps, in her life she regretted her lack of riches; she felt that Sir Charles did care for her, and that it was Edith's fortune which turned the scale in her rival's favour. Oh, why, why was it not in her power to take her husband a dowry that should restore the fortunes of Meredith Court?

Her old garden-shawl was hanging in the hall. She took it down, and wrapping it around her, opened the door, and passed out into the grounds.

CHAPTER XXVII.

WHEN the gardens of Meredith Court had been planned at the time of the building of the mansion, so large a space had been apportioned to them that on the decline of the fortunes of the owners, the cost of keeping them up was found to entail too grave an item of expenditure, hence some half an acre in extent had been allowed to run to waste, and formed one of the most picturesque portions of the estate.

Through a natural fertility of the soil, and its being surrounded by a belt of trees which shut out the rough winds and protected it from the full severity of winter frosts, the abandoned garden in the spring, summer, and autumn ran riot in a very luxuriance of foliage and wild flowers, and even when the blossoms were dead, and the trees denuded of their leaves, the spot had a certain weird charm about it peculiarly its own.

In one part of the Wilderness, as the place was called, adown some artificially arranged rock-work, a rivulet that had been diverted from the even tenor of its way across a neighbouring field, fell sparkling and dancing into a large shallow marble basin, from whence it was conveyed by pipes, which were still kept free from weeds and débria, into the river, which ran past at no great distance.

In this basin lay a stone naiad, life-sized, which had probably formed part of a fountain in the palmy days of Meredith Court.

The face of the figure, which lay gazing upwards, was raised above the level of the body, through the head reclining upon a boulder which also lay in the basin. It was, however, not sufficiently high to prevent the plashing water falling upon the upper portion of the face, and the action had worn the features down to an almost smooth surface. The mouth was, however, beneath the water and remained perfect, the constant ripple giving the appearance as of an eternal smile playing upon it. Lady Meredith had christened it "The Laughing Woman."

By the side of the basin grew a gigantic arbutus, whose glistening green leaves and tassels of white flowers helped, in conjunction with some shrubs of yew, box, and ivy, to form a delightful arbour, as green and fresh to look upon in mid-winter as in the heat of summer.

This was a favourite spot of Mary Ray's, where, even as a child, she had brought and wept out her troubles, thought out her plans, and rejoiced in joys which were not to be shared with others. Hers had not been a companionable life. Lady Meredith was always too occupied with schemes for her son's present and future welfare to trouble much about her niece. Miss Tuttle was kind but thoroughly unsympathetic to a girl of Mary's sensitive nature, and the only companions in whom she thoroughly confided were her cousin Charles and her neighbour Edith.

Now in her great and womanly sorrow, Mary, mechanically almost, sought her old refuge. She wanted to be alone, and were she missed, there was only one person likely to guess at her hiding-place, and that one, with Edith Pennington at his side, was not likely to trouble about her.

It was a delicious evening, and the moon at her full seemed to burnish the glossy leaves of the evergreens, to turn into silvery wands the branches of the trees, and to glistening gems the water-drops which clung to the clusters of rushes growing around the basin.

Mary gazed upon the worn features of the stone figure, and compared it to her own future. Was it not henceforth fallen, shattered, featureless? Must not she go through life with a smile upon her lips that was as mechanical and joyless as that which the water formed about the mouth of the statue; must not her heart be stone and her life cold and dreary?

And was it not the more cruel that all the while she believed—she knew—that happiness lay within her grasp, and that she had only to make the sign to Charles Meredith and he would leave Edith and riches to come to her.

But womanly pride, as well as gratitude and her promise to her aunt, forbade this. The hard thorny path of duty lay as clear before her as the white stones, which marked the pathway through the tangled brushwood and unclipped hedges, lay in the moonlight.

Suddenly she started. A hand was upon her shoulder, and a voice she had loved ever since she could recollect loving anything pronounced her name:

"Mary!"

"Yes, Charles."

She could scarcely believe that it was her voice that replied, so cold, so unemotional it sounded in her ears.

She seemed already turning to stone.

The next moment her lover was by her side, and, taking her hands in his, he looked anxiously down into her face.

"Mary," he said, "you have been crying. What's wrong? Come, confide in me, dear. You know there is nothing in the world I would not do to make you happy."

"I am going to leave Meredith Court to-morrow."

"Yes, for a few days or weeks. Surely that does not trouble you?"

"Perhaps, Charles, it may be for ever; and now that I have the opportunity, let me thank you for all your past kindness. You have indeed been a brother to me."

Gently but firmly she withdrew her hands from his clasp; they were by no means stone, but trembling, burning, human flesh and blood.

"You have been for a long time—and oh, Mary, surely you must know it!—more than a sister to me. Nay, do not put me from you, dear, till I have said in words how deeply, how fervently, I love you."

The manly young voice quivered with emotion as it spoke, and for a moment a delicious sense as of one who in the midst of storm and waves suddenly finds himself in a haven of rest, fell upon the girl.

But her promise to Lady Meredith was brought back vividly to her mind by the next words the son spoke:

"Say, Mary, that you will be my wife, and a daughter in name as you have always been in affection to my mother, who loves me too dearly to grudge me that without which I cannot be happy."

"Yes, if he asks me to marry him, I will refuse him; I too love him—I too will show him that I can sacrifice myself for his sake. I will not drag him down to poverty." That was the promise she had made, and was that promise at the very first test of its sincerity to prove but idle words?

She looked up into his earnest, pleading eyes, trying to keep the tears from her own.

"Spare me, spare yourself. What you ask can bring but misery to us both," she supplicated.

"Misery! Hear me, Mary. I should have confessed this before, but I have waited for better days. If you have courage to cast in your lot with mine, those brighter days have come, and you shall never have cause to repent your sacrifice. My darling, be my wife!"

"No, Charles, it can never be."

The tone of determination in which the reply came struck a chill to the heart of the pleader; still, he would not be shaken from his purpose without an explanation.

"What, Mary! What do you mean?" he cried. "Have I been deceiving myself with the vain hope that you have loved me?"

"Charles, you have always had my love."

"Then at least you bid me hope."

"It is because of that love I am leaving Meredith Court. Charles, we are both poor, and it is necessary that you should marry a rich wife; were I to accept your hand, I should be standing between you and your welfare. How could I do that? It would be a base return to you for all your affection and for the home your mother gave me here."

The hardness—the almost business-like tone in which the tender words were hidden—served its purpose, and for the moment they misled their hearer.

"It is strange," he cried, "that you should have discovered this so recently. Have the attractions of a rich suitor taught you what is good for me? I now do not believe you love me! Ah, I see, you seek for wealth which I cannot offer you; you mean to sell yourself for gold; it may buy you homage or the world's esteem, but it can never buy you happiness."

"You are cruel; you do not know my heart," she said.

"Not know your heart! Is it not like those of all your sex—ready to sacrifice everyone and everything to its vanity? Mary, for the last time I ask you to be my wife."

"You have had my answer."

Her reply came cold and clear as a breath of frosty air.

"Then Heaven forgive you for the part you have played! You women look upon men's hearts as children do upon new toys—pleasant to play with until they break. Yes; Heaven forgive you and help me, Mary!"

And with downcast head the heir of Meredith Court rose and walked away, hoping against hope that above the murmur of the mimic cascade he should hear his name called.

And how the girl longed to utter it; but she felt that now was the hour of her temptation, and she must not relent.

"How bitter were his words!" she thought. "As bitter as my life must be. In years to come he may know me better and think kindly of me, perhaps thank me for the sacrifice. Alas, no! His anger shows his very love, and I—I whom he loves must endure even his contempt."

She could say no more, think no more, but in a passionate fit of weeping, sank back upon the seat from which she had, in the first impulse of his departure, risen with outstretched hands to tell him to remain.

• And the cascade tumbled and foamed merrily into the marble basin, and the eternal smile hovered about the lips of the naiad. What was a girl's heart-broken devotion and a man's destroyed belief in women's faithfulness to them?

"Dance and pass on your way, girl, as we do," cried the waters.

"Let your heart be of stone, like mine," smiled the naiad.

(A STORY IN FOUR WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER V.

A MONTH later we were married, and went to Edinburgh for our honeymoon. It seemed very soon, but it was most convenient for me to leave business just then—the third week in September—and there was no reason to wait.

My mother was delighted, though hardly surprised, as I thought she would have been. She told me that she had guessed how it would be before Dickie had been here a week; she knew that I loved her, and, of course, never doubted but that she would return my love. She was a partial mother, and I was her favourite son.

As for Miles, he was consulted by telegraph, though it was a mere form, for we both well knew that if there were any persons in the world who could lay claim to Miles Challenge's true affection, those were his wife's daughter and his brother, and that he could have no reason to disapprove of an arrangement which found the one an effectual protector, and the other an ever-present source of comfort and happiness.

He wired back his prompt consent, according to my urgent request, as Dickie would not be married without her step-father's blessing, but he wrote afterwards that he had been astonished beyond measure, and had not been able to get his accounts right for several days afterwards, for thinking of the astounding news that had reached him from England. It was the last thing he should ever have dreamt of, he said, that his little girl—it was difficult for him to remember that she was not really his own—should marry his brother, whom he had believed to have done with such nonsense as love long ago.

But I could not see anything so surprising, except that Dickie should have returned my love. It would have been a great deal more surprising, I considered, if any man under a hundred years old could have lived a month under the same roof with her, and not have been bewitched. All this I told him in my reply, and he summarily disposed of it in his next by informing me that "there was no fool like an old fool."

But, nevertheless, he was pleased with the marriage, when his amazement would allow of his experiencing any other sentiment.

After receiving his telegram the arrangements were soon completed, and a few days later we stood together in the English church, accompanied only by my mother and one or two of our most intimate friends, and plighted our lifelong troth.

But little change was required in our domestic arrangements. We were still to occupy our commodious flat in S— Street, and of course the dear old mother—her mother now as well as mine—would continue to live with us. I wanted to save my little wife all the care and anxiety that I could. I wanted to keep her bright and unshadowed as when she had first come into my life and had changed it, as if with the touch of a magician's wand, into a golden dream of love.

It was a fine autumn, unusually dry for Scotland. The clear bracing air of Edinburgh did us both good, and she was delighted with the place. I was anxious that she should see every point of interest in the proud, beautiful, historical city, and the weather allowed of daily excursions, not only to the places of note in the town and suburbs, but into the country and to various seaside spots.

We had apartments in Princes Street, and every day Dickie looked at the Castle on the rocks, and dreamt about the scenes that had taken place within it and around. Holyrood made her low-spirited. She sympathised so intensely with poor Mary Stuart coming over from the gay French Court to that dreary, desolate place; her nerves were so intensely strung as she visited each gloomy apartment fraught with such sad memories of the young, beautiful, blighted life, that I resolved never, if possible, to let her see the place again.

I saw how delicately she was constituted, how unfitted for sorrow or strife, and I dreaded anything which should cast a shadow over her perfect peace and happiness. That her early love-affair had not darkened her life for evermore I attributed to the evident fact that her heart had not been really touched.

Those six weeks in Edinburgh were to me a period of almost delirious happiness after so many years of disappointment and lonely sadness. My darling was so sweetly tender and loving; she feared not to show her love for me now that all her doubts were removed; and she was so evidently happy—a palpable fact which formed the chief ingredient in my own happiness. How I had won such love I could not imagine. I was content to wonder and be thankful.

How I looked back upon those six weeks in the dark days that followed!

It was the last week in October, and our stay in Edinburgh was drawing to a close, when one evening I came in alone from the gathering darkness of the streets, and was about to proceed up to our rooms, where I expected to find Dickie and dinner awaiting me. I had been out on business, to see an agent belonging to our firm, leaving Dickie at home to rest, as we had been out all the morning, and were going to the theatre in the evening. The close and stairs were lighted, and as I came slowly up, I saw that my wife was standing at the foot of the stairs, dressed in her outdoor things, and talking very earnestly to a stranger—or, at least, a stranger to me. She stood facing the stairs, and back to me—I could only see the outline of her form and recognise her garments—but of her companion I had a good view. The gas cast its flicker full upon the face of a young and handsome man, well dressed, and with an air of dash and fashion about him that I seemed dimly to recognise, though I knew I had never seen him before. I paused and stood where I was, trying to guess who he could be; that vague sense of recognition almost overpowering me meanwhile, as though we had met in some previous state of existence.

He was very dark, with a straight-featured, haughty face—though smiling pleasantly enough now as he looked at my wife—a full dark moustache, and fine, well-bred tones that fell distinctly upon my ear.

"Only two years ago!" he was saying. "It seems a century!" "So much sometimes happens in a very short time," replied the voice of my wife, moved in some slight degree from its wonted even sweetness; and was it my fancy, or the freshly-rising evening breeze, as it swept down the close, or did I really hear her sigh as she spoke?

There was a moment's silence. I stood where I had first paused at the entrance, and they had not heard my footsteps among the many others in the street. They did not seem aware of anyone's approach, though his face was turned full towards me; but his eyes were otherwise occupied, and his ears, too, it seemed.

"Ah, Arnold," began my wife again, and as that name passed her lips, I started and stared incredulously at the handsome, imperious face; but, as I looked, I was forced to believe the truth. He answered, feature for feature, to the description she had given me of that former lover of hers—that other "Arnold," of whom I had not thought it worth while to be jealous after she had once promised to be mine. And here he was—he had sought her out at last—just six weeks too late!

I lost the end of her speech—I lost his answer. I was deaf, blind, mad. When my senses came back after that terrible reel of my brain, I turned and went into the street again. There I walked for some time, wrestling with the fierce jealousy that had seized me in its clutches, sometimes bewailing the day on which I met her, sometimes assuring myself that there was no reason to assume that, because she had seen him again, the old love must necessarily be revived. But I remembered bitterly how different I was from him—what a contrast I must present when I returned to her. He, young, handsome, winning, with every grace that might enchain a young girl's fancy. How could I, old-fashioned and ugly, hope to hold my own against him—my place, that only his absence had enabled me to win?

And then I chid myself for the mere thought. How little trust I had in my darling's truth—in her tender love! How small a hope there would be of our future happiness if I were going to let every chance breath disturb it! Yet this seemed hardly chance—but more like a terrible coincidence.

I stayed out about half an hour, to give him time to say his farewell and be gone, for I had no wish to meet him again upon the threshold of our home. When I re-entered the close all was silence and solitude; there was nothing in the quiet gas-lit place to tell that two old lovers had met there not an hour since—met and parted—with an impassable barrier raised between them; it looked a most unromantic spot for such a meeting, though, doubtless, they had found it romantic enough.

The warm welcome and tender, wifely kiss with which I was met dispelled half my doubts and fears, and I thought to myself that after I had heard about the meeting from Dickie's own true lips I should feel, perhaps, even more secure than I had done before, knowing that she had seen her old lover again, and yet could return to me afterwards with such a look and such a kiss.

Dinner had been kept back on my account, and it was on the table almost before I was ready for it, so that there was no opportunity for confidences, and dinner is anything but a confidential meal, to my thinking. I should have expected to hear her news over our dessert, "across the walnuts and the wine," but we were late, and it was hurried over in order not to miss the commencement of the piece at the theatre—one which we had both been very anxious to hear. I say "had been," for neither of us seemed to care about it now. I could see that her thoughts continually strayed, and as for me, it mattered not where I was, what was before my eyes or what in my ears. I saw only a gas-lit close, and standing therein my wife with a man looking into her face. I heard only her low voice as she said, so softly:

"Ah, Arnold!"

"I was disappointed in it," Dickie said to me on our way home.

"I did not care about it," I replied moodily, and she looked up at me in surprise. It was so seldom that she heard me speak thus, for my tones had always softened to her.

We were late home, and a dainty little supper awaited us on our return. I sat down to it gladly and gratefully—not because I was hungry, but because the meal afforded just the opportunity that seemed as if it would never come, and to which I looked forward so eagerly. I should hear all about it now, in the quiet little chat over the chicken and champagne.

She sat down close by my side, and slipped her hand into mine, but she did not eat, though she pressed food upon me.

"I am glad to be home again; I am a little tired," she said, "and I think you are tired, too, are you not, dear?"

"No; why should you think that?" I replied, twisting the rings round upon her fair finger, where the wedding-ring sparkled, its lustre all undimmed as yet.

"I don't know—except that I thought you seemed a little listless."

"There, look what I have done!" I said, in some vexation, as a large pearl dropped out of one of the rings I had been twisting about and rolled upon the floor.

"Oh, never mind. We cannot fail to find it, on account of its size," she answered, and we both got down on the floor to search for it. "I am very glad it has come out now, as it is so unsafe," she continued; "I might easily have lost it without knowing. I shall tell them of it at the shop; I only had it back this afternoon."

It was the ring which I had given her on our engagement, the largest stone of which had dropped out about a week before, and had been left at a jeweller's for repair.

"This afternoon?" I repeated.

I had lit a match to look under the table, and by its flare I saw her delicate face suddenly flush.

She answered a little nervously, though perhaps I should not have noticed it if I had not known what I knew.

"Yes, I went out and fetched it myself. I have had no chance to say a word to you about anything. I was tired of waiting for it, and I couldn't bear to be without it. I did not think you would mind, Arnold?" half deprecatingly, half questioningly.

"Oh no, dear," I replied, trying to speak indifferently, "as long as you didn't get lost; and it was only a little way. You didn't go any farther?"

"No; but I stopped so long looking at the shops that I was out nearly an hour," she said laughingly, "and I saw some ribbon of exactly the blue I wanted, so I went in and got it."

"Here it is," I said, picking up the pearl and rising to my feet.

I had heard now that she had been out—I supposed I was going to hear the rest. It would be a great weight off my mind to hear it, but I did wish that she had not blushed. It made me feel uncomfortable.

"Suppose I had lost it," she chattered on, "it would have been all their fault. I shall scold them, and tell them that they must do their work better than that."

It was already past one o'clock, but I waited for another hour to hear my wife's anticipated confidence, which never came. She spoke no word of whom she had met that afternoon, though I could see her thoughts were distracted. And I, proud, sensitive to a degree, intensely reserved, would have scorned to ask her anything about it, and so the first shadow crept in between us, and dimmed the lustre of our married love.

CHAPTER VI.

I SAW no more of "Arnold." It galled me sorely now to think how carefully she had preserved from me the knowledge of his surname; and how tamely, how willingly, even, I had submitted to be left in ignorance. I did not for one moment imagine that my wife saw him either. My trust in her, in spite of the bitterness with which I dwelt upon her probable pain and disappointment in meeting her old love too late, was too full and perfect to allow me to think that she could meet him again intentionally. That first meeting of theirs was certainly pure accident, though her silence concerning it proved, in my jealous eyes, how much she had been disturbed by it, since she could not make up her mind to speak of it.

I was heartily glad when, a week later, we turned our faces homewards. Edinburgh had become distasteful to me, since I had seen that handsome face in it; I was always expecting and dreading to meet it again, and I welcomed black, smoky Glasgow with a feeling of intense relief. Here, too, I was not obliged to take holiday whether I would or not; here I could work hard, until I was too tired to muse, and brood, and imagine things. This I said to myself, and determined that I would put away the haunting doubt which had possessed my mind afresh since my wife had withheld from me that which she little thought I already knew.

She, too, was glad to go home, and the mother was wearying for us; and so, altogether, it was a happy reunion. My mother doted upon Dickie, and Dickie upon her; they were a great deal to one another. I thought that my darling—she was that still—would not miss me so much if I were sometimes a little silent or abstracted. But I was mistaken. She noticed the change in me, slight though it must have been, for she was used to my reserve, and questioned me concerning it.

"Is there anything wrong at the office, Arnold?" she enquired of me one day.

"No," I answered, in some surprise, not at first seeing what she meant.

"Then is it me?" she went on. "Have I offended you in any way? Are you disappointed in me?" she went on, so wistfully that my heart ached to hear her, and I hastened to reassure her.

"You, my dearest! how could that be? What is the matter? or rather, what do you think is the matter?"

"Something is the matter, I feel sure. You are quiet, and you look sad."

"My dear, I warned you before we were married that you were taking an old man—not a young one, who would be lively, and careless, and amusing. Even you cannot make me young again, Dickie."

"Nor do I wish to; I would rather you were as you are," she said with quick warmth. "But," laughing a little doubtfully, "there is another side to the question. Do you not sometimes wish, Arnold, that you had married some one more sensible?"

It was hard to speak at all; but I could answer this last question of hers with a decided negative, which seemed to please her, and she put her arm lovingly round my neck as she stood beside me—a caress which I could not resist, so that we spent the next quarter of an hour as foolishly as we had done many a quarter of an hour before I had seen Arnold in the close at Edinburgh.

But it was not the same; and even that did not last. The shadow was soon to grow deeper and far more black. The new year came in with bitter cold and heavy snow. It did not seem to hurt Dickie; she was a true English blossom, and could stand the buffeting of a cold wind, fragile though she looked. The frost raised her spirits and brought new brightness to her eyes; but, as for me, I felt pinched and old in the severe weather. English-born though I was, there was hot southern blood running in my veins, and, thoroughly injured to tropical heat, and no longer the strong man that I had been, the Scotch winters always tried me. But this year I hardly thought of my physical sufferings, so relieved was I to see that she was evidently not pining—that she seemed perfectly happy in her quiet home with me and my mother, who, though we loved her well enough to do anything for her sake, yet could not make ourselves young, or handsome, or gallant, even to please her.

One afternoon, early in January, I met Arnold on the platform of St. Enoch's railway-station, in the full blue-white glare of the electric light. I was turning the corner by the booking-office when I stumbled against him, or he against me. We both apologised, and I heard his voice again—that warm, pleasant, hated voice! He had little idea of who I was, or would he have spoken so pleasantly? I wondered.

He was looking handsomer than ever—I have always had an eye for beauty, and at that time it added in no inconsiderable measure to my misery. His dark cheek was cleared, not flushed, by the intense cold, and he was wrapped in a long furred great-coat, which, as far as mere cost went, I could have worn perhaps as well as he, but the style of which would ill have suited my slight, bent, insignificant form.

He looked noble, princely; in my jealous, miserable eyes the man above all others to win my Dickie's heart. I remembered how she had said that "there was nothing he could not do, and nothing he did not know," and I acknowledged that he looked like that, from the crown of his dark head to the sole of his well-shaped, well-clad foot. And then she had wept—for him!

How did he come to be here? that was the question I asked myself as I hastened along to keep the marrow from freezing in my bones, while my brain was like a scorching fire. Was it a planned thing? But no—no; I could not believe that yet of my Dickybird—how strange the once familiar pet name sounded upon my lips! How long had he been here? Was it the knowledge of his vicinity that had kept her so bright and happy during the dull winter days? Would it not rather have been a load upon her mind—a never-ceasing torture—to know that he was "so near and yet so far"? Had they met at all, and if so, how often?

These were only a few of the questions with which I vainly tormented myself, seeing that answers to them could be obtained only through her whom I would not ask. Yet, if he had not come to meet her, what strange coincidence had led his footsteps a second time in our direction? Such things happened in novels, but not in real life, I told myself bitterly, forgetting a lesson that I had had occasion to learn over and over again in the ups and downs of my many wanderings, that truth is stranger than fiction.

I went home, and when my Dickie came running out of the room to meet me, I offered her neither word or kiss, and when, astonished and half frightened at my darkened face, she laid her hand gently upon my sleeve, I shook it off, walked into my room, and locked the door. There I stayed, wrapped in gloomy musings, until she came to tell me that dinner was waiting. The new timidity in her manner might have been a reproach to me, but it was not in my then state of mind.

Dinner was little more than a form. Hardly a word was spoken. My gloomy silence and want of appetite seemed infectious, and the dishes were sent away almost untouched. I could not speak naturally; I could not discuss the events of the day as though I had not met Arnold an hour ago, looking so eager and happy, when I was compelled to think that he had come here only in the hope of seeing her again.

She must have told him that we lived in Glasgow, and why should she have done that if she had not expected to see him again? I could not tell that she was to blame, but it looked much like it, and with the innate jealousy of my disposition, nursed under Oriental suns into a yet fiercer heat, burning within my breast, I could not caress my wife—could not call her by loving names—could not even speak kindly to her. A cool, indifferent manner was the utmost forbearance that I could attain to, and to keep up that now became a never-ceasing struggle.

So the days went on, and she, too, changed. She stood upon her dignity, and though she had at first manifested both surprise and alarm at the alteration in me, she now spoke as coolly to me as I did to her. It struck me with a chill sense of discomfort, but I consoled myself with the thought that it was far preferable to having her clinging to me and begging so piteously to know what was the matter. I could not have borne that now.

So there was no more exchange of affection, and the shadow grew darker between us. My mother must have seen that something was wrong, but she asked no question, made no comment. She was reserved, also, to some extent, and moreover had the good sense not to attempt to interfere between husband and wife. At first I thought that she would surely tax me with indifference towards, or forgetfulness of, my newly-won treasure, and I lived in daily dread of what she might say; but as time passed on, and she made no remark, I understood her silence, and blessed her for it. It was the only consolation which she could have afforded me under the circumstances.

The only friends beside the Crichton family who had been present at our wedding lived at Langside. With them, since our marriage, my wife had become very intimate, and the Cross Hill cars forming a ready means of communication, visits were generally interchanged at least as often as once a week. A fortnight after meeting Arnold at the railway-station I saw him wish my wife good-bye, and assist her into the Cross Hill car. I was returning home in a hurry for some important papers that I had left locked up behind me in the morning; and so, while I was supposed to be a couple of miles away, they had met.

My blood reached the boiling point then, but yet I would not speak, or make any sign. It was all I could do to refrain from dashing through the crowd and springing upon him like a panther, but I refrained—as yet. The hour was not yet come. I delayed my vengeance a little longer. But I was sure now, and nothing should turn it aside—of that I was determined.

"I hope you enjoyed your visit?" I remarked to my wife after dinner that evening, speaking in the cold tone which I always used towards her now, but with an added touch of scorn.

"Yes, thanks," she replied in the indifferent voice which, on her part, she had learnt to assume with me. "Did mother tell you I went to Langside then?"

"Oh no," I answered. "That was not necessary. I came home early in the afternoon for those reports I had forgotten, and found you were out. Of course there was no doubt as to where you had gone," sarcastically.

"Do you mind my visiting so often at the Colquhouns?" she asked with a momentary return to her old earnest tone, which touched me until I saw that she had turned pale, and that hardened me afresh. Well might she turn pale!

"Mind? Of course not," I said. "What do you think a small matter like that can signify to me?"

My tone might have stung a saint to fury.

She half turned away, looking inexpressibly pained, and then, appearing to change her mind, she came back to me, laying her hand—oh, how gently, how timidly!—upon my sleeve.

"Arnold," she said, "whatever has come to you? Why did you ever pretend to love me? Did you, or I, think on our wedding-day, hardly four months ago, that you would speak to me like this?"

I neither could or would answer her, and I did not want to look at her false face, so I shook off that fair hand, that not five hours since had been clasped in that of the other—the truly-loved Arnold—and went out, closing the door violently after me.

After Work.

A SUDDEN clamour here and there,
A hum of voices all around,
Slow dying down the winding stair,
And silence follows sound.

Rest! aching eyes, whose idle looks
On long familiar objects fall,
On worn stained desks and dingy books,
In weariness of all.

It chimes at last! the hour that brings
Brief respite from the day's dull care,
And thought springs up on perfect wings
To purer space and air.

As travellers on some wide expanse,
Some arid waste of desert calm,
Pause where the sparkling fountains glance
Beneath the sheltering palm,

So we, when comes the close of day,
To weary heart and wearier mind,
May leave the dull, laborious way,
The thankless tasks behind.

May seek once more the verdant plains,
May roam by silent streams along,
Through that fair realm where Fancy reigns,
Where bloom the flowers of Song!

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

PRELUDE.

OSWALD CARBURY knew that he was committing what nine sane men out of every ten would consider a piece of egregious folly. His own notions of worldly wisdom sternly rebuked him. But how was he to help it? Alice Graham's soft blue-grey eyes were meeting his in a glance of shy appeal, the tremulous accents of her voice were echoing in his ears like music. Her dainty figure was by his side, her hand in his strong grasp, and the pair were alone in a careless London crowd. How could any young man, with a heart more susceptible than the nether millstone, fail to be tender and self-oblivious?

"I am afraid, Mr. Carbury, that I have taken a wrong turning, and have missed my way. How ridiculous of me!"

"Not at all, Miss Graham; that, I fancy, must be a pretty frequent inconvenience of life in a great city. Perhaps you will permit me to go back with you. It is not very far to Eildon Road, if you proceed direct. You have no calls to make, I presume?"

"No; I have just been executing a few commissions for Mrs. Eccles, and am returning. But it is giving you too much trouble. I do not think I can consent."

"Indeed, you must, please," he said; "I want to have a chat with you, released from the presence of Mrs. Eccles."

"And of her daughter Margaret?"

"And of her daughter Margaret."

And with the echoing of those words Oswald forgot his prospects, the difference in position—everything; except only that Alice Graham was with him, and that fate had put into his hands the chance of an avowal.

"Alice," he went on, in a voice low and deep, and vibrating with intense emotion; "Alice, will you give me the right—the privilege—to walk by your side through life? It is a singular place, perhaps, in which to ask you this, and you may think me abrupt also. But you know that my opportunities of private conference are very, very limited. You have won my heart. You have it in your power—you and no other girl on earth—to make me either very happy or very miserable. Which must it be?"

"There will be—trouble—to you," she murmured.

"As if I cared for the chances of that! I am old enough at five-and-twenty both to know my own mind and to fight my own battles. Certainly I am big enough to do the latter," and a harassed laugh escaped him.

The beams of a faint smile shone in Alice's eyes also, she ventured a shy upward glance of admiration and of trust. Her lover was a stalwart, manly fellow, and looked able to defy successfully any onset of evil fortune. Is not victory usually to the sanguine and the brave?

"But it will be my fault if I say yes," she replied; "and—and—and you might reproach me afterwards. That would be terrible!"

No earnest resolute suitor was likely to be held at bay by such a line of argument, assuredly not Oswald Carbury.

"I scarcely think that you have any real fears on that score, Alice," he said; "may we not, at least, leave it for the future to decide?"

The question of this morning is, to me, infinitely more important. Can you care for me sufficiently to promise to be my wife?"

He could imprison her unresisting fingers without cavil now. They had reached the corner of Eildon Road, and must quickly part.

"Yes, Oswald," she answered. A moment later, with burning cheeks, and fluttering, doubting, triumphant heart, she had escaped.

Oswald turned away, and reviewed on his homeward path both his past life and his present position. At the age of fifteen he had been formally adopted by the one rich man of his family. It was tacitly agreed that the lad's will should in every matter, grave or trivial, be subordinated to Luke Carbury's. And up to this date no serious breach had occurred. Now one appeared inevitable. Oswald was certain his uncle would not approve of his engagement to Alice Graham. He was to marry Miss Eccles.

They must be patient and wait. That Alice would be true, he was as sure as that the sun was shining behind these February clouds. He abandoned himself to the successful lover's dreams of bliss. Most of us have had similar ones. To most of us the building of castles in the air is a pleasant if not a profitable occupation.

CHAPTER I.

IN the days of his vigour Luke Carbury had been rather over than under the medium height. But the years had bent and, to all outward seeming, grievously contracted him, as they had likewise shrivelled his skin, and furrowed his brow, and hardened his heart, and increased his riches. He was now a thin, decrepit, morose old miser. He resided in Dorrington Crescent, not half a mile from Eildon Road and the home of Margaret Eccles. But he had an office in the City, and still called himself a broker and commission agent. His legitimate business was at this date trifling, both in its bulk and its value. He had deliberately allowed it to drift from him. But in loans to needy clients, to young merchants, or to hard-pressed speculators, he did much. Every man on 'Change knew that in Luke Carbury's dingy room it was possible, by the offer of fair security and high interest, to obtain advances of many thousands at almost momentary notice. Every man knew also that no mercy would be shown him should he in any sense prove a defaulter.

Luke had neither clerk nor confidant. Oswald was the nearest approach to both, and Oswald was invariably spoken of as "my nephew," and invariably snubbed if he asked any undue question.

"Time enough for you to seize the reins when I resign them," Luke would say.

The old man took no holidays beyond those which law and custom indicated, and at these he was suspected of inwardly chafing, even as he yielded. Every ordinary working morning, for close upon forty years, had found him in his office at precisely the same hour. He was as good as a clock to the porter beneath. In a very real sense, money-making had come to be Luke Carbury's meat and drink.

The day was damp and foggy. A thick yellow vapour, to which even the hackneyed comparison of pea-soup was inadequate, had swept down upon the groaning metropolis. All but the most absolutely necessary street business was perforce suspended. Gas was blazing in thousands of workshops and counting-houses. The telegraph-boy was a phantom even at the office-window. The few drivers of crawling cabs hailed each other in speech grimly humorous, or savagely irate, or philosophically resigned, as was their varying mood.

"Only Blitterwick is likely to call to-day, I suppose," said Luke Carbury testily. "It will be awkward for him if he fails. The excuse of weather won't be accepted in lieu of redemption. Beastly climate, though! Might almost carve this fog like a Cheshire cheese, and a little of it's a deal more satisfying, too."

He chuckled sardonically at this sudden inspiration of wit, and shifted in his seat.

Oswald had fancied his uncle absorbed for a good half-hour, at any rate, in his Gazette, and at his own distant desk was carefully sealing up a private packet. This unexpected utterance and change of attitude discomposed him. He stumbled in his reply.

"Yes, it's miserable. Blitterwick may very likely stay away," he said.

"I remarked, on the contrary, that he is bound to come. I fully expect him," the autocrat answered.

Oswald's confusion and heightened colour were visible even to Luke's failing eyesight, and the observer was not slow to link these traits with the occupation of the young man's fingers. A calendar immediately before him gave the date as the 13th of February. He shuffled suspiciously to his feet and crossed the room.

"Packing up a valentine for Miss Maggie—eh?" he queried.

Oswald felt that a dangerous crisis was at hand. Why had he not been more cautious? Had his luck, so huge and undeserved in the opinion of a large army of needy relatives, turned against him?

"No—not exactly," he gasped.

Luke Carbury did not hesitate to put on his glasses and scan the scarcely dry direction for himself.

"Alice Graham," he read aloud with slow peculiar emphasis. "That is the companion Mrs. Eccles has employed for some months, I believe?"

"For nearly a year," Oswald stammered.

"And pray what may be your relations with this," he gave a dry short cough, "young lady?"

The intentional insult in the delay sent the hot blood back into Oswald's cheeks, from which, in the first shock of discovery, it had fled. Courage came to him. He would assert the right of his manhood to a free choice.

"She has promised one day to be my wife, uncle," he answered.

It was the turn of the older actor in the drama to grow pale now, or rather yellow, as if an attack of jaundice were impending.

"Your wife—she has promised—brave words, my lad!" he hissed; "but I may have something to say to that. No doubt you would prefer to keep me in the dark. But you see I am just a trifle inquisitive. What of Miss Margaret Eccles?"

"She is a nice girl. But I could never have loved her, as—as I can and do love Alice."

"Love—pshaw! Poetic rubbish! I gave you credit for infinitely more sense, or you wouldn't have been here so long, I can tell you."

"I am sorry if you are disappointed, uncle. I rather feared it would be so, and so did Alice. She is a splendid girl; I am sure if you knew her you would like her. I could not help deciding as I have decided."

He was speaking very quietly, but very firmly, and his glance met the other's sneer without quailing.

Luke Carbury almost screamed in the fury of his resentment.

"She shall never marry you—the impudent hussy! or if she does, she'll speedily repent it, for her husband will need to advertise, 'Wanted, an Income,'" he quavered. "Do you imagine I am going to allow you to make ducks and drakes of my money in any madcap fashion you please? If you do think it, you never were more mistaken in your life. I'll leave every penny to an hospital first."

"That must be as you choose, uncle," Oswald replied bravely. His own temper was rising also, though as yet he had managed to keep a politic curb upon it. He took up his packet, and prepared for an excursion into the fog.

Oswald inherited the family obstinacy.

The aged broker's mood changed. By a mighty effort he temporarily dissembled his anger, and tried what coaxing and an appeal to the standard of common-sense would do. So much as in these later days he could care for any human being he cared for Oswald. Long association had involuntarily drawn forth tendrils of affection even from his cankered heart. If to his pride and imperious self-will there was the shadow of an alternative, he had no desire to sever the last acknowledged bond between himself and his kind. But he would not be thwarted with impunity. He was resolute on that point.

"Don't be a fool, lad," he said huskily; "I've given you harsh measure, no doubt, now and then; but don't let us quarrel over any girl beneath the sun. I don't believe there is one worth it—not even Margaret Eccles. Just you sit down again, and let us talk the affair calmly over. We haven't much risk of interruption."

It was difficult to refuse the invitation; the post could wait an hour or two yet. And it was not so easy for Oswald to defend his position against this more insidious form of attack. Passion is such a convenient buttress for weak argument.

"You see this Miss Graham is poor and practically a nobody. I do not wish to offend your susceptibilities, but perhaps you will admit that that is true? Her present occupation proves it, I fancy."

"She is a mine of wealth in herself."

The lines of the hard mouth curved for a second with bitter satire, but no outburst came.

"And you are looked upon—with reason, if you are wise—as my heir?"

He paused, and the listener felt bound to fill the blank.

"I suppose so, sir."

"Then has it never struck you that Miss Graham—" he nearly stumbled over the name—"may not be greatly blamed in the world if she tries a game of fortune-hunting. She has everything to gain by success and nothing to lose by failure. But I would prefer that my nephew should not be the victim."

The adroit suggestion that Alice was seeking what society termed "a good establishment," that money rather than love had influenced her consent to his proposals, for a moment weighed upon the young man's heart like lead. Was it possible that even maidenly innocence and beauty had set up a golden idol! The dismay and earnest meditation pictured upon his countenance raised Luke Carbury's hopes. Skilful diplomacy once again seemed likely to pay.

But the cloud passed. Oswald recollected how invariably Alice had elected to remain in the background in Mrs. Eccles's drawing-room, how quiet and reserved she had always been, the difficulty he had had in beating down the barriers of respectful distance. And the warning she had given him on the occasion of his actual suit came anew to his ears. There was no suspicion of subterfuge in it; and scarcely was it the language of a feminine schemer in sight of her goal. Alice was pure and loyal, frank as the day-dawn, and worthy of any sacrifice of position or prospects.

"I am certain you misjudge her, sir," he answered. "There has been no plan on either side of our negotiations; I would disclaim such a meanness, and Alice too."

This was an unexpected raid into the enemy's country. It dissipated the dream of easy conquest, and aroused fresh wrath. It impeached, by implication, Luke Carbury's designs on the brewer's fortune; though of Margaret Eccles Oswald had entertained no thought at the moment of his speech.

"A lawful plan is both proper and prudent," said the old man haughtily; "you may have one opinion as to the matter, and I quite another. But the question lies in a nutshell. I consider that you have acted already very foolishly indeed. If this comes to the knowledge of Miss Eccles much prejudice may be done you. However, there is still a chance of repentance. If you will promise to drop this folly, I will do what I can to formally back up a more sensible suit. You may be comfortably settled in a few months, and have a future before you that dozens of better men will envy. If you refuse, you must just 'gang your own gait,' as the Scotch say."

It was a lengthy utterance and a formidable one.

Oswald knew from his uncle's slowness of enunciation, and from the emphasis laid upon the final sentence, that it was an ultimatum to which he had listened. Alice Graham and poverty; Margaret Eccles and wealth. That was the choice set before him. He paled, and for a second the temptation to be dishonourable obtained a hearing. But only for a second.

"It is impossible that I should obey you, uncle, greatly as I should like to," he answered; "any worldly ease must be dearly bought at the sacrifice you suggest. I cannot agree."

Luke Carbury's passion at length over-mastered him. To be balked thus was maddening. His thin, hawk-like face grew livid, his hands worked convulsively. He was not a pleasant object to look upon in this abandonment of wrath.

"Dolt! Fool! Then be a pauper and marry your pauper wife!" he hissed.

At this juncture it was a decided relief to Oswald to hear Mr. Blitterwick announced. The nephew seized the opportunity to escape.

That afternoon Luke Carbury lingered in his City office for at least half an hour beyond his usual time of retirement. The porter fancied that he must be afraid to face the fog. In reality he was absorbed in thought and quite oblivious to the advance of evening.

At intervals he broke into soliloquy.

"I'll not be defied for nothing, not I," he murmured; "and if he thinks I shall ever come round he's mistaken. But I'm sorry—sorry. He's been with me ten years, and I've got to like him. What a blockhead his father will think him! I was very different in my young days, though I had my dreams too. Janet Shairp was a pretty girl—worth a thousand of this cunning gannet, or whatever she may call herself, I'll warrant. Yet I gave Janet up because I could make money faster without being hampered. 'Get a family, get cares,' 'tis a true word all the world over. Still—I wonder what became of Janet? Some Scotch clerk's wife, very likely. I'd like to see her—but I never shall. Maybe she's dead. I shall be lonely now, without the boy—he'll have to go. I can cling to the gold—that is faithful, fortunately! Blitterwick's was a fine stroke of business!"

CHAPTER II.

It was a year and a day later. In the interval much had necessarily happened to the hero and the heroine of our story. To put the most momentous event in the foreground, they had committed what Luke Carbury styled, when he heard of it, "the abominable folly" of getting married. They were living now in a tiny box-like cottage on the outskirts of Bradford. Oswald had obtained an appointment as clerk and cashier in a large manufactory there.

The breach between his uncle and himself had become an open and an awkward fact in a very few days after the conversation that has been chronicled. The broker had no notion of relenting, and Oswald as little of suing for grace by surrender. At Oswald's home, a quiet Kentish vicarage, not over-abundantly favoured with tithes, the news caused terrible consternation. After the perils of an exuberant boyhood had been safely surmounted, it was thought that a very level, prosperous path lay before the fortunate son. If he insisted upon destroying his chances with his own hands, it was not likely that he would obtain much sympathy there, and tangible assistance was totally out of the question.

The disappointed clergyman came up to London, to learn particulars and exercise his influence. It was in vain. Oswald treated his parent with due respect, but was immovable. The brother was bitterly satirical, and professed to be glad to escape the burden of an idle scapegrace dependent.

"I'll have no more nephews, or nieces either, about my house," he said. "My kinsmen never did anything for me, and I'm not called upon to waste the fruit of hard work and pinching upon them."

The insolence of his manner was perhaps aggravated by the unmentioned circumstance that already he had fervent epistles in his desk from three out of the five other Carbury brothers. In some occult way they had received intelligence of the rupture, and they were sure that their own lads, of whom an assortment was at the broker's disposal, would be infinitely wiser and more obedient.

That there should be no possibility of mistake concerning his meaning, he continued :

"I'll leave my savings to a total stranger, or else to charitable purposes," he growled. "You needn't trouble to call here again, unless it's just for the pleasure of an interview, Brother Henry."

Brother Henry smiled weakly and wistfully, but exhibited no outward resentment. He was a meek man, and his cloth forbade quarrelling. But, in his gentle way, he tried the recipe of coals of fire. "We shall at any time be pleased to welcome you at Chorlton Bank, Luke," he said.

The other wished him good-bye with a cynical shrug of the shoulders, and no syllable of thanks.

Oswald was tossed upon his own resources, and found these scanty in the extreme. His uncle's sneer rankled in his breast with its near approach to realisation. If any good had been likely to come of it he might with literal truth have advertised, "Wanted, an Income."

It is always a pitiful predicament when Fortune of a sudden deserts her protégé. The gentleman, brought face to face with the rough winds of adversity, with no training, and no adequate armour of self-denial, in one sense is of all creatures the most miserable. Unused to work, and ashamed to beg, he is a waif upon the tide of ruthless circumstance. His hopes are high-pitched and illusionary, his expedients are vain, his sensitiveness is intense.

It was not quite as bad as all this with Oswald Carbury. But the cup of bitterness was the same, although he escaped the dregs. He had no capital; he had no special fitness for any commercial or professional post; he had expensive habits.

First, he thought of obtaining a tutor's place. But his classics had grown sadly rusty, and his stock of patience was small. The educational fancy was quickly exploded. Iron-gates of patronage shut out the Civil Service. There was left trade. And after a weary search he was engaged by Messrs. Hotchkin and Croft.

Alice Graham in her turn had suffered persecution. A complaint had been lodged against her to which Mrs. Eccles, if not her daughter, lent credence. She received a quarter's notice, and was exceedingly uncomfortable during the term.

At the end of those wretched months she yielded to her lover's solicitations, and became his wife.

"We have suffered much for each other, let us henceforth live and struggle together," Oswald had pleaded. How could she resist, if wisdom did advise delay? Oswald vowed that with Alice by his side he should have tenfold more nerve and energy for his battle. So they were very quietly married, on a soft June morning, and neither as yet regretted the bargain.

But the horizon was still sombre. The setting up of a household by two inexperienced young people is a severe test of management and caution. With the thrifty Scottish custom Alice had saved a few pounds yearly out of her earnings in Eildon Street. But these melted like snow before the sun. Oswald's income was small, and so much cheap labour was in the market that he feared to ask an advance, although he was sure that his services gave satisfaction.

The wolf was not actually at the door of their modest home; but to strained ears his distant howl was unpleasantly distinct.

It was evening, and Oswald's daily task was over. He had changed his boots and his coat, and while tea was preparing stood at the recessed window. He appeared to be watching the few passers-by, but in reality was moodily trying to pierce the veil of the future. A biting north-east wind was causing people in the street to wrap themselves more tightly in coats and cloaks, and to shiver withal. The influence of the weather seemed to have penetrated into Oswald Carbury's soul. He was in unison with its bitterest humour.

"I shouldn't wonder, Oswald, if we had a snowstorm before morning; the clouds are coming up very thickly. When the wind sinks the fall may commence," said his wife, as she uncovered the steaming urn.

He neither changed his attitude, nor made any reply. This was singular, and gave the little woman a sharp pang of dismay. Something must surely be amiss. She left the table and came to his side. The gloom on her husband's face was manifest.

"Is it anything fresh—anything worse, dear?" she queried.

"Not that I am aware of," he answered; "it is the familiar difficulty from which, I suppose, at least three-quarters of the world chronically suffers—the difficulty of making both ends meet. We are not alone in our trouble, if that is any consolation."

Oswald's tone was that of a pessimist, if his words were the words of intended solace. A shimmer of repressed tears was in Alice's eyes.

"It is a hard struggle, I know," she said, "and it may be harder yet, when—"

He understood her meaning, though no conclusion came to her sentence.

"That is what I fear," he replied. "If God gives us a family how are we to rear them? It is a problem. But let us not cross bridges until we come to them—the proverb is a wise one. Away with sadness and up with the toast."

His assumed jauntiness was a failure. His voice travelled back into its old groove of doubt and despondency.

"If only Uncle Luke had had an atom of humanity in his composition," he added.

"Say rather if you had married Miss Eccles, Oswald."

"Never. Do not imagine that for one moment, Alice; I would sooner face any trials than lose you. But Uncle Luke might have put a legacy of a thousand or so for me in his will, if only for the sake of old times."

"How do you know that he has not?"

"Very well. We should have heard of it by this time if it had occurred; no such luck!"

"Poor old man! He went off very suddenly at last. His must have been a lonely life."

"Exceedingly so. But he seldom felt it, I fancy. Gold was his idol."

"I wonder was he ever—in love?"

"Can't say. I heard him mumbling some strange stuff to himself when he was unwell once. There seemed to be a girl in the yarn, and he appeared to have given her up for the sake of his money-making. But there was no coherence about it, and that is a slight clue to build upon."

"Very; and you've not heard yet to whom his property has been left?"

"No; I haven't troubled to enquire. It's nothing to me. I expect some infirmary or blind asylum, or deaf and dumb institution, is the better for his screwing and scraping."

"And able to do more good in consequence."

"Pleasant alleviating thought for our misery," then, as if ashamed of his gloomy satire, Oswald turned, put his arm round his wife's waist, and kissed her.

"Now let us draw down the blind, light the gas, and be comfortable in defiance of care," he said.

But as he proceeded to carry the first part of his recommendation into effect, his attention was arrested by a familiar rap at the door.

"A valentine, perhaps," suggested Alice mirthfully; "it is the 14th of February, you know."

"If so it is for you, madam," he replied a minute later, and he gravely handed a letter across the table.

Alice took it and turned it over and over with puzzled surprise. It was directed in a round, clerly hand to Mrs. Alice Carbury. There could be no doubt about that. Who was the correspondent? She had few communications of any kind; and about the exterior of this one there was something mysteriously firm and formal. The postmark was London, and supplied no explanation.

"What can it be, Oswald?" she asked.

"Open it and see. That is the surest way to discover."

She obeyed the hint. And, as she read, a wild, luminous glow suffused her countenance. Her hands shook so much with her excitement that she could scarcely pass the sheet to Oswald.

"How strange!" she gasped.

It was some time before either of them could fully arrive at a comprehension of this last turn of Fortune's wheel. When they did there was scarcely any limit to the exuberance of their joy.

The epistle was a curt one, from a firm of City solicitors.

"DEAR MADAM,

"By the terms of the late Mr. Luke Carbury's will the great bulk of his estate passes to Miss Janet Shairp, some time of Glasgow; or, in the event of her decease, to any child or children of the said Janet Shairp, or to her heir-at-law. As the result of careful enquiry we find that you are, apparently, the said nearest-of-kin, and, therefore, Mr. Carbury's heir, we shall be glad to hear from you with reference to the proof of your claim.

"We have the honour to remain, dear madam,

"Obediently yours,
Digitized by Google
"FULLER AND FITCH."

"Miss Janet Shairst was——?"

"That was my mother's maiden-name. Mother died when I was three years old."

"Then she must have been my uncle's lost love; and, to be revenged on me he left his money unwittingly to my wife! Poor old Uncle Luke! Hoist after all with his own petard."

The Editor's Note Book.

THE question of the housing of the poor in London is assuming such proportions that it may be hoped that something will speedily be done in the matter; but, at the same time, it is very desirable that the attention of the public should not be diverted to false issues, or to any points which are not absolutely to the purpose.

AN example of the sort of mistake I mean is to be found in the cartoon in last week's Punch, which, although excellent in intention and drawn with all Mr. Tenniel's dramatic power, deals nevertheless with the question almost entirely from a sentimental and altogether unpractical point of view.

IT is, for example, useless and misleading to dwell on the fact that owners of small house-property charge high rents for their wretched shanties, or that they evict non-paying tenants. So long as the supply of lodgings for the very poor is less than the demand, so long prices must be high, and it is impossible to suppose that we shall ever come, or that it is desirable that we ever should come, to the point of providing an immense system of outdoor-relief in the shape of rent-free lodging.

THESE things are as far outside the range of possible politics as are the pitiable facts that a vast number of the poorest class have, like the unhappy creatures in Mr. Tenniel's cartoon, a great many more children than they can ever hope to provide for, and can barely keep body and soul together on the starvation wages which are paid to match-box makers and the like.

THERE is this much truth in political economy, at all events. But it would be undoubtedly possible to do for the lodgers in small private houses what Lord Shaftesbury's Act did for the occupants of common lodging-houses in the way of provision of cleanliness, light, water, and drainage, while competition by the State or by the municipality would be an effectual check on the exactions of the present race of small proprietors.

ONE of the terrible facts about these poor people is that there are too many of them, and how that difficulty is to be got over is really the most serious problem which thoughtful consideration of the case presents to us. Increased and improved house accommodation it is possible, and even comparatively easy, to provide, but what permanent improvement can be hoped for when a hundred workers have to share among them wages that could only fairly support fifty? To this pass has an energetic and inventive civilisation brought us. The very improvements in the way of sanitation which make people's lives easier, and consequently longer, complicate the question by rapidly increasing the population, while the work by which most of them have to live increases slowly, if at all.

SOME day, no doubt, a statesman will arise, capable of throwing aside the traditions, the prejudices, and the trammels of party, and of dealing with the difficulty as something which, for the credit of a Christian country, must be settled. But I am afraid that if I live to see him I shall have to live to be a very old man indeed.

IN the meantime, it is to be hoped that while the condition of the very poor is made a burning question, the condition of the class immediately above them will not be overlooked. These are the people who, although poor and hard-worked enough, have still some time and inclination for amusement, and who are thoroughly grateful for any brightness which can be thrown upon their not very cheerful lives. On behalf of these, the People's Entertainment Society has been doing good work for the last five years, and Lord Folkestone, its chairman, is amply justified in asking for further public support for the good work. Subscriptions and offers of personal assistance may be sent to him at 8, Ennismore Gardens, S.W.

I HAVE received from a gentleman signing himself "Railton," after the fashion of the Town Clerk of London and members of the House of Peers, a book published at the Salvation Army Book Stores and containing last year's balance sheets of the Salvation Army, audited by a firm of chartered accountants. These gentlemen certify that General and Mrs. Booth do not draw any money for their own personal income, but omit to state whether they have any share, for services rendered, of the very considerable amounts which are charged for salaries in the various departments.

AFTER all there is no particular reason why Mr. Booth should not be paid for his work, as is the case with ministers of all other denominations, and I am perfectly willing to believe that all the members of the Booth family earn and deserve any moneys which they may be paid from the military chest of the Salvation Army. But I still think with the editor of Truth that the publication of a plain and simple statement of all such amounts would be useful in dispelling a good deal of prejudice, and in silencing the possibly unfair innuendoes of many scoundrels.

THE Peterborough Cathedral Restoration Committee would appear to have more faith than is usual in public bodies and individuals in this degenerate age. Their architect has discovered that the defects in the foundation of the great tower are even more serious than was at first supposed, and recommends a series of additional works at a cost of some five thousand pounds in addition to the fifty-five thousand to which the Committee already stands committed. The Committee has decided to incur this responsibility, although the total amount of subscriptions raised or promised has not by a long way reached one-third of the total amount required. The end justifies the means, I suppose, and it would therefore be rude to suggest that the Committee appears to be running into debt in rather a dashing and reckless manner.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS is so thorough a man of the world as well as so shrewd a judge, that it is a little difficult to understand some remarks which he is reported to have made in the course of a perjury case at the Manchester Assizes. The prisoner—who was convicted and sentenced to six months imprisonment—had committed his act of perjury in a case in the Bolton County Court, and had subsequently fallen into a neat and ingenious trap devised by the prosecutor and a friend, which brought him before Mr. Justice Hawkins.

His lordship, however, did not approve of the trick, although it undoubtedly furthered the ends of justice, and declared that "the matter would have been better investigated by the Bolton detectives than by amateur policemen, and certainly with as much fairness, and probably more." As conviction and sentence followed, the trap could not have been an unfair one, and why the prosecutor should not have done what he honestly could to help his own case, I cannot see.

IT must be obvious to everybody that the practice of wearing spectacles or eye-glasses is very largely on the increase, and many doctors assure us that the over-working of children in Board schools is sure still further to multiply the number of cases of defective sight. In this connection it is curious to read the report of an inquest on the body of John Plumley, carpenter and joiner, who drowned himself the other day at Rotherhithe. Poor Plumley had been obliged to take to spectacles in consequence of failing sight, and had been unable to obtain work in consequence, having been informed by a firm to whom he applied, that they did not employ men who could not do their work without the aid of glasses. Thereupon he retired from the struggle altogether, leaving habitual spectacle-wearers, like myself, with a general impression that he had not been very fairly treated.

AS the case of the Central News Agency against the proprietors of Judy is, while I write, undecided, it would be manifestly improper to express any opinion as to its probable issue. But I think that any member of the public has a perfect right to say that, when a Canadian telegram of thirty words is worked up at the office of the agency in London into an indefinite number of lines, the fact should be openly and candidly stated. If this is not done, the public is led to believe that the telegram was absolutely sent from the other side in the exact shape in which it is published, an inference which is in no sense in accordance with the truth.

THE accounts which reach us from America of Mr. Irving's first appearances are not a little uncertain and contradictory, but there can be no reasonable doubt that he has by no means taken the New York public by storm. I am inclined to think that the exaggerated puffery and blowing of trumpets which accompanied his departure from this country and heralded his arrival in America, have quite as much to do with this disappointing result as any effect which has been produced by Mr. Irving's own merits or demerits as an actor.

AND it must be confessed that Mr. Irving himself has said a good many things which were so obviously intended to tickle the national vanity as to do a good deal more harm than good.

ARTISTIC and fashionable society in New York knows quite well what goes on in London, and when Mr. Irving told the Lotus Club that Miss Mary Anderson is a reigning favourite and Edwin Booth a household word in London, he was exaggerating in a way which could deceive nobody, and which was calculated to do his own cause infinite harm with the shrewd and sensitive people of the United States.

I MAY be pardoned for again alluding to the book of my father's letters to which I referred last week. After those paragraphs had gone to press, I received a letter from a gentleman who had assisted the late Mr. Ouvry in the arrangement of his library and collection of autographs, which makes it plain that that gentleman never contemplated the publication of the letters, and that the whole responsibility in the matter rests with his executors, who have certainly shown more business 'cuteness than discretion and delicacy.

Cookery.

DISHES FOR PLAIN DINNERS.

FIRST DAY.

Savoury Batter Pudding.
 Fillet of Beef Potatoes à la Maître d'Hôtel.
 Stewed Carrots.
 Baked Apple Pudding.

SAVOURY BATTER PUDDING.

Mix a quarter of a pound of fine Scotch oatmeal in half a pint of cold water, add to it a pint and a half of boiling milk, stir over the fire for ten minutes. Then mix in a quarter of a pound of sifted bread-crumbs, two ounces of suet finely shred, an onion finely minced, two teaspoonfuls each of marjoram and sage, half a teaspoonful of salt, a pinch of pepper, and two eggs well beaten. Rub a little lard or dripping over a Yorkshire pudding tin, into which put the pudding, and bake in a moderate oven for three-quarters of an hour. Serve with gravy, or butter-sauce flavoured with catsup.

FILLET OF BEEF.

There are several ways in which the undercut of the sirloin can be cooked. That in which it would go farthest as a family dish is as follows: Put one ounce of dripping into a stewpan, let it get hot, then turn the fillet about in it until brown on all sides. When this is done, put into the stewpan two onions fried a nice brown, two sprigs of thyme, half a teaspoonful of salt, the same quantity of pepper, and a gill of boiling water. Cover the stewpan closely and let the contents simmer gently for an hour, then strain off the gravy, leaving the fillet in the stewpan to keep hot. Take the fat off the gravy, which boil up and thicken with a tablespoonful of flour mixed in half a pint of water. Stir over the fire until thick, when season to taste, and add a few drops of browning. Pour this gravy into the saucepan over the fillet, let it simmer very gently for a quarter of an hour, turning the meat about occasionally.

POTATOES À LA MAÎTRE D'HÔTEL.

Half boil the potatoes in salted water; this done, cut them in slices the round way, about an inch and a half thick, and put them into a sauce made of a small tablespoonful of flour mixed smoothly in half a pint of water, slightly salted. This quantity of sauce will be enough for a pound of potatoes, which simmer very slowly in it for twenty minutes, when some will be mashed and some pieces left whole. A small pat of butter may be added, and a few minutes before serving the potatoes throw in a teaspoonful of finely minced parsley.

STEWED CARROTS.

When young, carrots need only to be thoroughly washed and cleaned with a brush. When older, after being so treated, if not perfectly clean, they must be slightly scraped, but on no account should carrots ever be peeled. Boil young carrots whole; those which are larger in quarters or eighths; young carrots take about an hour to boil, those which are older from an hour and a half to two hours. It is impossible to give the exact time for cooking carrots—like all other roots they vary in quality, and it is difficult to boil either those which are stale or of an inferior kind. After the carrots are trimmed, properly cleaned, and if necessary divided, throw them into boiling water, well salted, and let them continue steadily boiling until done. Drain the carrots, cut them into pieces about an inch long, and put them into a sauce made of flour and water, seasoned with salt and pepper, the thickness of ordinary melted butter, and let them simmer for ten minutes. Then throw in a few minced capers, previously scalded, and having added a small piece of butter, serve, with fried bread, in a tureen.

BAKED APPLE PUDDING.

The recipes for both baked and boiled apple-pudding will be found in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 131.

SECOND DAY.

Dumplings with Gravy.
 Roasted Sirloin. Browned Potatoes.
 Greens.
 Batter Pudding with Fruit Sauce.

DUMPLINGS WITH GRAVY.

Shred very finely a quarter of a pound of beef-suet, mix it with half a pound of flour and a gill of cold water into a smooth paste. Pepper and salt may be used, a small quantity of minced parsley also, and some people relish a little grated cheese.

The great point to observe, if it is desired to make these dumplings popular, is to have them light, free from lumps of fat, and delicate both in flavour and appearance. Roll pieces of the paste into balls about the size of a chestnut, and drop them one by one into a saucepan of boiling water, slightly salted. Let them boil rapidly for twelve to fifteen minutes, take out of the saucepan with a skimmer, put them in a tureen or vegetable-dish, and pour over them a pint of gravy, which may be made quickly and cheaply with a tin of Nelson's Extract of Meat, costing fourpence. Parsley-sauce, for those who like it, makes a nice change.

ROASTED SIRLOIN.

There is a great difference of opinion as to the best method of roasting, and many people consider that meat is never fit to eat unless roasted before an open range. This we think to be rather a matter of prejudice than of fact, and it is certain that the old-fashioned open range is troublesome to manage, and consumes a great quantity of fuel.

A large and bright fire must be ready when the meat is put down; and the great art of roasting well by this method is to maintain the fire thus during the whole process, small pieces of coal being added from time to time to keep it up.

It is always a good plan to use a hastener, which must be bright, so as to radiate the heat, and to let it stand before the fire to get hot before the joint is put down. If possible, some dripping should be made hot in the pan, so that the basting may commence early.

As the heat of the fire will be greater at the bottom than at the top, the thickest part of the meat must be downwards. The hook having been passed through the thin end of the joint, it is placed on the jack, or failing this, is attached to a ball of worsted, and put as near the fire as possible. The object of thus applying a great degree of heat to the meat is, by the rapid action of it to form a sort of skin which will prevent the gravy running out. In about ten minutes draw the meat about a foot from the fire, and baste with the hot dripping every ten minutes.

The old rule of a quarter of an hour to a pound of beef or mutton is a good one. If the fire is brisk, a hastener used, and the meat of fine quality, an hour and forty minutes will be sufficient to roast a leg of mutton weighing eight pounds, and an hour and a half a joint of beef of that weight. When the joint begins to give out little jets of steam, it is a sign that the meat is nearly done.

When the meat comes in from the butcher carefully examine it, especially in summer, lest flies have attacked it, and always wipe it well with a clean, wet cloth. If there is the slightest degree of staleness use a little vinegar in the water. Before putting the meat to the fire, rub it well over with salt, a little pepper, and flour. The salt improves the flavour of the meat, and does not, as some people suppose, cause the gravy to run out. When meat has been frozen, it will, after being gently thawed, take less time than given above.

As to roasting in a closed range, when the oven is not properly ventilated air cannot circulate round the joint, and it acquires a disagreeable and unwholesome flavour. The principle on which the ovens of Flavel's Patent Kitcheners are ventilated, is the correct one.

The greatest care must be taken to keep the roasting-oven clean. If fat is allowed to remain from day to day in the oven, it burns, and impregnates the meat with a most unpleasant and unwholesome odour.

The dripping-pan should be double, and the under one must contain water. The meat should be placed on a stand like a gridiron, bone side uppermost. If it is not possible to roast the meat rapidly for a short time, as in the case of an open fire, put it into a kettle of boiling water, and boil it rapidly for five minutes. Dry in a cloth on taking out of the kettle, have hot fat in the dripping-pan, baste, and roast by the usual scale.

Experience has shown that in a good gas-oven, cooking of all sorts, and especially roasting, can be most successfully done. Two faults are common in roasting by gas—the meat either is sodden so that one can hardly tell if it is roasted or stewed, or it is dried up and even burned on the outside. Sometimes the fault can be referred to the stove being of inferior action, but more frequently to a want of knowing how to regulate the gas. Some stoves cook rapidly, and unless the gas is kept low, things must be spoiled. Sometimes the supply of gas is insufficient, and in this case nothing can be properly done. The points, therefore, to study, are how to regulate the heat, and to understand the precise action of the particular stove with which we have to work.

Gas-stoves lined with a non-conducting substance (Leoni's patent) have the advantage of retaining and radiating the heat, and cooking done by them cannot be surpassed. In stoves of this maker it is not necessary to baste meat whilst roasting. It is a good plan to put hot fat over such things as poultry, game, and small joints of meat before suspending them in the oven. Cooking should go on rapidly at first, as by other methods of roasting, the heat being checked in about ten minutes.

The gravy for roast beef should be clear; the old-fashioned plan of making it in the pan after the joint is roasted is objectionable. Not only is there a risk of having greasy gravy, but unless it is expeditiously made, the meat, meanwhile, gets cold. The water in which vegetables have been boiled, though meat stock is to be preferred, with the addition of a little of the deposit from beneath dripping, is excellent for joints. In no case should either gravy or water be poured over a joint. Many cooks use only the latter, with a little salt, and thus sodden the meat. Although it is not desirable to make gravy in the pan, the dripping must be carefully saved. After pouring the contents of the pan into a basin, rinse it out with a little hot water, and add it to the dripping; thus you prepare one day a valuable gravy for the next dinner.

BROWNED POTATOES.

Prepare the potatoes in the usual way, and boil or steam them for a quarter of an hour, if of average size; if small, somewhat less time.

Drain the potatoes, put them in a baking-dish with some dripping, bake them in a quick oven, basting occasionally, for forty minutes, or until they are perfectly brown. They must, when done, be dry and free from fat. If there is no pudding in the dripping-pan, the potatoes can be browned under the meat, and indeed are better than when baked. Potatoes for browning should always be parboiled, as if baked raw the outer crust is indigestible.

GREENS, CABBAGES, ETC.

The first thing to do is thoroughly to wash the greens in order to get out all insects; throw them into plenty of water with the chill off, but do not put salt, as this kills the insects and prevents them coming out. Use several waters, taking care that all sand and earth are removed, and that the vegetable is perfectly cleansed. The pot in which green vegetables are to be boiled must be scrupulously clean, if it is not so the colour of them will be spoiled, and the smell of them whilst cooking be most disagreeable. The water should have salt, in the proportion of one ounce to two quarts. When it boils throw in the greens, press them down, cover the saucepan with its lid until on the point of boiling, then take it off, and carefully remove the scum, keeping the saucepan uncovered until the greens are done. We particularly desire to press upon cooks the fact that if these simple directions are observed there is no need to use soda in order to preserve the colour. Soda, indeed, destroys both the flavour and value of green vegetables, because it draws their fine properties into the water. The time green vegetables take to cook depends upon their age and quality, and it varies from ten to thirty minutes.

BATTER PUDDING.

The great secret of making a light batter-pudding lies in mixing the flour very thoroughly with water before adding the milk, and in well beating the yolks and whites of the eggs separately. Mix half a pound of fine flour with a gill of cold water, adding by degrees, so as to keep the batter smooth and free from lumps, a pint of new milk. Stir in the yolks of two eggs, a pinch of salt, and when ready to boil the pudding, the whites beaten to a strong froth. Grease a basin thoroughly, pour the batter into it, cover with a cloth, and steam or boil the pudding, not covering it with water, for an hour and a quarter.

When convenient, plain copper moulds, such as are used for Charlotte Russe, are best for batter-puddings. When the pudding is done, take off the cloth, let it stand a few minutes; run round the edge with a knife; it will then turn out without difficulty.

Sauce may be made by stirring jam into plain butter-sauce, or apples may be stewed and used in the same way. Prune-sauce goes well with batter-pudding, and may be made like the above, or the fruit can be simply stewed with sugar and lemon-juice, so as to have plenty of syrup.

About Eyes.

THE eye shows character. The eyes of great warriors have almost always been grey, their brows lowering like thunderclouds. Inventors have large eyes, very full. Philosophers, the most illustrious, have large and deep-set eyes. The poets all have large, full eyes; and musicians' eyes are large and lustrous. Buffon considers that the most beautiful eyes are the black and blue. We think we have seen black and blue eyes that were far from beautiful. Byron says the gazelle will weep at the sound of music. The gazelle's eyes have been called the most beautiful in the world. Mary Queen of Scots had liquid grey eyes. Dark eyes show power, light eyes gentleness, and grey eyes sweetness. There is great magnetic power in the eyes of several of the lower animals. The lion's, the tiger's, and the serpent's eyes are all magnetic. It is well known the serpent will charm birds that are flying above it, until in great circles they will sweep down to the destruction that awaits them. A friend of the writer, a doctor, was one day walking in the fields, when he saw an adder lying on a rock. He drew near to examine it, and presently looked at its eyes. He was attracted by their great beauty, and involuntarily stepped forward two or three steps. Beautiful light flowed from them and seemed to bathe the very coils of the serpent. Gradually he drew close, until just as he was almost within the reptile's reach, he fell, feeling, as he said afterwards, as though he had been struck by a stone. When he became conscious his head was in a friend's lap. His first words were: "Who struck me?" "No one struck you, doctor. I saw you were charmed by the snake, and I struck it with a stone." He had struck the snake, and the doctor had felt the blow.

A Story of Gortschakoff.

WHEN the Russian Nihilist Hartmann's extradition was refused by France, the Czar Alexander II. became very much incensed, and ordered M. de Giers to forward an angry protest to the French Government. General Gortschakoff, then very old and ill, caused himself to be carried to the Winter Palace, and after a long and stormy interview with the Czar, succeeded in correcting the arrogant tone of the imperial note. M. de Jomini was entrusted with the getting up of a new one, but the German ambassador managed to impress on the Czar's mind the notion that it was too conciliatory in terms. So Alexander II. wrote on the margin, with his own hand, some observations destructive of all the friendly spirit of the diplomatic instrument. Gortschakoff could not stand it any longer. "Tell the Czar," he said to his staff-officer, "that I cannot put my name at the foot of an historical document that will be harmful to a country I served devotedly for more than sixty years. I am now too weak to fight against my master's will, yet strong enough to be able to send in my resignation." "Tell Gortschakoff," Alexander replied, "that he will die, as he has lived, in the skin of the most stubborn being; and be it done as he wishes!"

Home-Made Christmas Boxes.

PART II.

PRESENTS may be articles for personal use, or they may be for domestic purposes, for the good of the household generally. These divisions may be subdivided, and under both heads be looked at as useful or as ornamental.

LADIES have so many wants, or imagine that they have, that no difficulty is ever experienced in designing offerings for them. The really embarrassing question for Christmas is what to give a gentleman. Slippers and smoking-caps are always in favour, and since embroidery was revived, cigarette-cases worked on leather generally accompany the caps; but the making-up of a case, to be so convenient as to be acceptable, presents an insuperable difficulty to an amateur. To send the work to a manufacturer to be completed is to incur expense, the limit of which it is impossible to calculate beforehand.

WHITE silk evening-ties are one of the most acceptable presents to prepare for young gentlemen. Satin is only worn by a few exquisites, and it is a most unmanageable material. Surah is better, and Indian silk can be recommended. The ties must be cut the long way of the silk, so that a piece of thirty-two inches long will make several, according to the width of the material. As the ties are to be washed, the sides require hemming with a silk thread. The finish of the end is a difficulty, as in cutting to a point two short cross-cut hems present themselves. Fold over the silk at the ends before cutting, and press with a warm iron, marking the lines the hems will take. Cut the surplus away and hem at once, being careful not to stretch the hem. The folding of the tie can be done by copying the width of a shop-made one, and pressing the folds with an iron.

A HANDKERCHIEF-CASE answers for either lady or gentleman. A square of silk, satin, or plush, measuring more, but not less than thirteen inches. A lining cut the same size, sewed at three sides and turned inside out, the fourth side being sewed with a slip stitch. The edge may be finished by a lace border, a silk cord, or fringe. Dry perfume is shaken in before closing the last side, violet, orris-root, patchouli, etc., are favourite powders. At present terebene, which has a pleasant woody smell, being made from the pinewood, is the reigning favourite in dressing-rooms. Three corners of the square are brought to meet in the centre, and passed about half an inch over each other, tacked, and a button sewed on. The fourth makes a flap to close the case, and the loop for the button is worked on it. As gentlemen's handkerchiefs are larger than ladies', their size must be particularly remembered when cutting the square.

WASTE-PAPER baskets are such a drawing-room necessity, especially in summer, that their decoration has become an artistic question. The lining may be of sateen, silk, cashmere, satin—in fact, to have a pretty colour is more important than a rich material. A fringe of coloured wool round the top gives the basket an air of elegance. Remains of crewels or Berlin wool can be made into little tassels, mingling the various colours, so that even a few threads left over from a piece of embroidery can be turned to account and worked in.

THE decorated bellows is now a household feature, and, whether much used or not, a pair looks pretty hanging beside the fireplace. Since the fashion of applying home ornaments arose the supply of undecorated bellows to be had cheap is abundant. With plain wooden sides they can be bought for about a shilling each. The simplest ornament is to paint a little flower or a few leaves on each side. To stain the wood a darker colour before beginning to paint is sometimes preferred. Others paint the groundwork with a uniform colour, generally a neutral tint as best showing the brighter shades of the flowers. Covering the sides of the bellows with plush, silk, silk sheeting, or velvet upon which embroidery has been wrought, is the highest class of ornament, but few amateurs are able to accomplish the covering neatly for themselves, which is a great drawback for those who have no skilful workman near at hand.

THE ordinary wooden milking-stool, which can be procured at any country fair or market, is found to be a charming footstool when stained and decorated, and lines of red, yellow, with gold—Judson's gold paint answers very well—glorify the milking-stool almost out of all recognition. Wooden pails, lined and painted, are so well known at bazaars that all our readers must be already familiar with them. American flour-tubs, having lids, make the best work-boxes, but require to be lined.

A WATERPROOF-SACHEL is one of the most acceptable offerings to a lady in this our very changeable climate. The tidy little cases in which the lighter cloaks are folded up when sold are most useful and compact, if there be abundance of time at disposal either to take the cloak out or put it in again. But very neat folding being absolutely essential, it follows that the case must be often thrown aside, and the cloak taken out, and carried in a strap or hanging loose. Even leather has its inconvenience, especially if the gloves be dainty, for a lady finds the strap and its buckle not all that could be desired. The satchel resembles a muff in which no interlining is used. It is not the plain muff of our grandmothers, but the ornamental modern trifle which is cased and has a frill at each end. Into the casings elastic is run which confines the cloak, the latter being folded and run through, appearing at each end. Strings of ribbon or silk-cord are sewed on by which to carry the satchel. A small pocket for handkerchief or railway-ticket can be inserted at the seam which closes up the case. The materials used are from the richest silk to the cheapest chintz. The lady who, like John Gilpin's spouse, is on pleasure bent, yet has a frugal mind, can carry her cloak in a satchel and leave it in the entrance-hall when she makes a morning-call; or she may even carry it in her hand to a drawing-room meeting, when velvet or satin has been pressed into her service.

DESCENDING through a scale of velveteen, serge, cashmere, etc., lowly chintz may be reached—a fragment rescued from a lawn-tennis costume and turned out as a beautiful addition to the dress itself. Three-quarters of a yard of material suffices. Sew it up into cylindrical form. Fold in at the two ends enough to make a frill at each, leaving about twelve inches in the centre. Sew to the inner edges of the frills twelve inches wide of lining for the centre. Run two narrow casings at each side of the middle, and put elastic in to draw in the frills, instead of casing with thread only. Strings are a matter of taste, but a few bows of ribbon, jet ornaments, some lace, or at Christmas-time a spray of holly, give a waterproof-satchel a gay appearance.

ECONOMICAL ruffles and lace collars have already been described. A higher-class ruff for the neck, costing more money, is known by a variety of names, the "Marie Stuart," the "Raleigh," or the "Medici." It is made in the form of a ruching, quilled in double box-quills, and a pearl bead sewed at each point where the lace is brought together. Less than three yards of lace will not admit of being quilled double, cut in two lengths of a yard and a half each. Run the lace together at the edges, quill in the centre, meet the top of each pleat in the middle, and sew on a pearl bead. Single quills may be tacked in the same way, but are rather formal and severe in character.

A YARD of material is required for a tennis-apron, and, if the material be narrow, two breadths will be absolutely essential, the tennis-apron being always made of ample proportions. Pockets for the balls are made either by turning up a piece of the material, ornamenting it, and sewing it down, or by laying on round, diamond-shaped, or square pockets at the centre or sides. The apron is gathered to a band, which requires to be substantial since it became the fashion to have a hook sewed at the left side for hanging the racket on.

BAZAAR aprons are more airy creations, and useful at every season. Bandanna handkerchiefs have had their day, and now look loud and vulgar. White muslin, with lace borders and knots of coloured ribbons on the pockets and at the bib-corners, are always fresh and pleasant to the eye. They have, also, one valuable advantage of making a half-worn dress look many degrees better, while the strong-coloured handkerchiefs often disfigure dresses.

No mention has been made of old-familiar Christmas-boxes, such as cushions, chair-backs, book-markers, screens, needle-cases, or, as they used to be called, "housewives." Neither have pincushions been even alluded to, for all these are so well known that the difficulty is not so much to remember them as to emancipate one's mind from subjection to the stereotyped forms, and courageously try to produce something newer and more in accordance with modern ideas.

A Conscientious Jury.

AT a little backwoods settlement in Vancouver's Island, an Indian had been seen stealing potatoes from a farm, belonging to Mr. Sproat, the local justice, one day, and in order to frighten this Indian, the man in charge, who was a Western backwoodsman, fired his gun vaguely in the direction of the potato field. To his astonishment he found that he had shot the native dead. An inquest had of course to be held. The woodsmen did not look upon a slain Indian as a very great affair, and several came to Mr. Sproat and said: "You are not going to trouble Henry about this, are you, sir?" Mr. Sproat, being not only the man's master, but also a magistrate, had to reply that however much he felt for the man's misfortune, he must let the law take its course. But where was a surgeon to be found to make the post-mortem examination? A careworn-looking man stepped off a pile of lumber where he was working, and said he was a surgeon. This statement being naturally received with some hesitation, he produced from an old army chest his commission, his degree, and ample proof of not only having been a medical man, but of once having been a staff-surgeon. He performed the post-mortem, and soon produced a shot from the lung and proved that the Indian had died from gunshot wounds in the chest. Other evidence was forthcoming, one of the witnesses testifying that the prisoner had said: "Jack, I've shot an Indian."

The "judge" laid down the law to the jury, which was composed of twelve of the most intelligent of the men, and they were sent into another room to consider their verdict. It was nearly half an hour before they returned. The foreman then said: "We find that the Indian was worried by a dog?" "A what?" the judge exclaimed. "Worried by a dog, sir," said another jurymen, thinking that the foreman had not spoken plainly. Assuming a proper expression of magisterial gravity, his worship pointed out to the jury the incompatibility of their verdict with the evidence, and again went over the points of the case, and calling their particular attention to the medical evidence, and to the production by the doctor of the shot found in the body of the Indian, he again dismissed them to their room, begging them to come back with a verdict reasonably connected with the facts. They remained away longer than before. When they at last returned, the judge drew a paper towards him to record their finding. "Now, men, what do you say?" Their decisive answer was: "We say he was killed by falling over a cliff." The judge shuffled his papers together, and told the jury they might go to their work, and he would return a verdict for them himself. For a full mile in every direction from where the dead body was found, the country was as level as a table.

This jury was not so conscientious as another in the same part of the world, composed of the friends of some people accused of stealing pork: "We find the defendants Not Guilty; but we believe they hooked the pork."

Household Gardening.

WE last week referred to the seasonable practice of making alterations in gardens, suggested that these are not necessarily and invariably improvements, enforced the importance of thought and caution in dealing with trees, and endeavoured to derive a lesson from Nature in furnishing attractively those parts of a garden that are not unfrequently disappointing. Let what was said be well considered by all who are interested, so that the whole matter may be fully comprehended, and we will, in due time, return to the subject of garden improvement. In the meantime some matters of more immediate importance must have attention.

FLOWER-BEDS IN WINTER.

Summer flowers are over now, and the plants are dead or dying. At once clear them away, as decay is obnoxious. Empty beds neatly dug, and all clean around them, whether grass or gravel, are cheerful in comparison with shapeless masses of dismal occupants which have run their course and done their duty above ground; their right place now is below it, and they will do their duty there not less effectively, in enriching the land.

THE DISPOSAL OF RUBBISH.

In small gardens where every part is fully exposed to view it is often a source of perplexity to know what to do with the leaves, weeds, and decaying plants that are so unattractive. There is no obscure corner in which they can be stowed, and therefore a rubbish-heap cannot be formed without being more or less unsightly.

There are only two ways in which garden refuse can be disposed of, and yet utilised—namely, by burying and burning; bury, therefore, all that is of a soft, succulent nature that will decay in a few months, and burn, when dry, all that is of a hard, woody character, and not amenable to ready decomposition.

As an example of what we have referred to as "soft" plants, we will take a bed of Geraniums.

The way to dispose of the plants under the circumstances indicated, is to place them at the least nine inches below the surface of the soil.

If the bed be very long, take out the soil across one end, forming a trench eighteen inches deep and the same in width, and wheel the soil to the other end of the bed, but not placing it on it; in fact if there is not more than a barrow full it may remain in the barrow.

In the trench place a layer of the old dead or dying Geraniums, chopping them up with the spade and treading them down closely. Now form another trench exactly of the same size as the first, and place the soil on the plants, making it level, then place in more plants, and so continue trenching and burying the refuse until the other end of the bed is reached; the soil first taken out will fill the last trench, and we have a bed thoroughly dug, with a layer of vegetation below that will steadily decay, and give to the soil what was taken out of it by the preceding crop.

By this practice the soil in the bed will be necessarily raised higher than before, but if it is made level, and the edges neatly smoothed with a clean spade, the bed will look better rather than worse for the change. The soil will, however, gradually settle, yet will be increased in richness and in bulk by the matter that has been added.

All kinds of plants and flowers that can be readily chopped up with the spade may be treated as directed with undoubted advantage to the soil and the appearance of the garden.

Verbenas, Petunias, Heliotropes, Marigolds, Stocks, Asters, Nasturtiums, and nearly all annuals may be thus disposed of when there is no convenient place for a rubbish-heap in which the plants can decay before they are used as manure, and even then it is a question if the first-named practice is not the best.

Hard refuse which will not decay readily consists of the trimmings of hedges, the prunings of Roses or fruit trees, and the woody stems of such plants as Phloxes and Sunflowers. All such matter should be burnt on a favourable occasion, when the weather is calm and the material dry; the resulting ash is of great manurial value, being admirable for scattering over seeds when they are sown, and for mixing with soil for potting purposes.

GARDEN ANEMONES.

Mention was made last week of these beautiful flowers as flourishing even under trees. They will do so, but the finer varieties deserve the best positions that can be afforded them; and no hardy flowers in cultivation produce a more beautiful effect than do these when grown in masses.

There are, perhaps, some flower-loving readers who are not acquainted with these handsome flowers. In Carters' "Vade Mecum," a group may be seen illustrated, and if the reader imagines the colours to be crimson, scarlet, purple, glossy and rich, also nearly white varieties with almost black discs, some conception will be formed of the beauty of these Anemones. Yet the tubers of this fine Empress variety may be purchased for a shilling a dozen, or six shillings a hundred.

The present is the time for planting. Make the soil light and free by digging it with a fork, adding gritty matter of any kind, such as road-sweepings, if the land is heavy.

When the surface is made quite level, draw drills five inches apart and two inches deep, and scatter in them some sand to the depth of a quarter of an inch, on which place the tubers two or three inches apart, just covering them with sand, then level in the soil and the work is done.

It is very essential that the tubers be placed right side upwards, and this is not determinable at a glance; still, if they are closely examined, an incipient crown may be seen from which growth will issue. Let attention be paid to this point and all will be well.

If clumps are required in borders rather than masses in beds, plant from six to a dozen tubers as above described, disposing them two inches apart, inserting a label or neat peg with each clump to mark its position.

If a layer of cocoa-nut fibre refuse be spread on the surface of the soil in which the tubers are planted, the beds and borders will have a neater appearance, and the Anemone roots will be the safer by the protection afforded them.

THE GLORY OF THE SNOW.

This is a pretty and expressive name for one of the most charming of hardy bulbous plants that has ever been introduced to British gardens.

Its botanical name is Chionodoxa Lucilie, and the plant will be new to the majority of readers of these notes. It is a comparatively fresh arrival in this country, yet it has been here long enough to become a general favourite with florists; and it is now, moreover, so plentiful that the price of bulbs is no longer prohibitive.

The popular name, Glory of the Snow, refers to the hardness of the plant and the beauty of its flowers, as like Snowdrops, they are often seen pushing their way through the snow; but while the Snowdrops are white, the flowers of the Chionodoxa are of the most charming cerulean blue imaginable.

The plants only grow a few inches high, their flower-spikes being seldom more than six inches long, and the single star-shaped blooms, an inch in diameter, when seen in masses are invariably admired.

The bulbs may be planted precisely as recommended for Anemones, and they are sure to grow and flower freely.

They are also admirably adapted for planting on grass, such as near the margins of lawns, as if they had crept from the border, and, if naturalised in such places, they appear, if possible, additionally attractive, while the grass keeps the flowers clean, displaying them to the best advantage.

During the past few years, either by accident or design, bulbs of Scillas have been substituted for those of the plant under notice, but there is no difficulty now in obtaining the true Glory of the Snow from vendors of repute, and no one can err by planting them.

They may also be grown and flowered in pots, but, like Snowdrops, must always be kept cool and have abundance of light and air, heat and a close atmosphere being fatal to their progress; a cold frame, therefore, affords all the protection they need, but they are best planted in beds, borders, or lawns.

SNOWDROPS.

Bulbs of these ever-welcome flowers may still be planted, wherever they may be required to flower. But there must be no delay, and on the first fine day that occurs the work should be completed. They may be inserted exactly as advised above, only put closer together; indeed, for producing the best effect, Snowdrops cannot be planted too thickly. Associated with the Chionodoxa or Scilla Amœna, no combination can be more pleasing. There are double and single varieties of the Snowdrop, and although the flowers of the former are larger and more massive, they are not quite so pure nor so elegant as the smaller single form with its gracefully-nodding blooms.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTION.

BERTIE L. will be obliged if a correspondent can give him the words of a poem commencing, "Life is like a pack of cards."

ANSWERS.

A. G.—You will find all information as to painting on satin and glass in articles on those subjects in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, Nos. 32, 39, and 106. Your handwriting is good.

C. A. H. S.—Many thanks for the anecdote of your brown spaniel. We will use it, with pleasure, as soon as opportunity offers.

DIETITIAN.—By way of further answer to your question, we quote from the pages of the Lancet a sound opinion on the form of diet you are anxious to adopt: "Wheatmeal, oatmeal, and lentils are eminently nutritious foods, but it would not be advantageous to feed on them alone. Their drawbacks consist in the excess of insoluble residue they contain, and the amount of fat required to be taken with them in order to bring them up to the standard of a "mixed" diet. Besides this, there are many who are unable to digest large quantities of them. Vegetarians are persons with whom this form of diet agrees, but physicians see in the course of their practice many who have done themselves injury by making the attempt. Unfortunately these cases are not reported, whilst the successful ones are, so that the public has no means of founding a true basis of opinion in the matter."

E. G. W.—Blackberries should be preserved in the same way as other small fruit, that is, boiled for half an hour before the sugar is added. This done, boiling should continue until the preserve will set. Brandy is an unnecessary addition, and, as you have found from experience, will not help to keep jam which has not been well made. If fermentation has commenced, you must consider the jam lost; but if it is merely mouldy, take off the top from each pot, and reboil the whole for an hour. A little more sugar may, perhaps, be desirable.

F. ALEXANDER.—We are glad to have your reminder, and the subject of your letter shall have attention in an early issue. There is no doubt whatever that the grubs that you describe are the larvæ of a species of the Crane Fly (Tipula), commonly known as the Daddy Long Legs. We have your former letter and note you have an entomological son; you, therefore, must leave him to determine the species; but it is, in all probability, Tipula oberacca.

INTERESTED.—There is a popular tradition that Deacon Brodie invented our present instrument of execution, and was the first to suffer by it for robbing the Excise Office at Edinburgh.

LEGEND.—The old-world story is told in an essay by Benjamin Franklin, entitled, "The Art of Procuring Pleasant Dreams." The author says: "It is recorded of Methusalem, who, being the longest liver, may be supposed to have best preserved his health, that he slept always in the open air; for, when he had lived five hundred years, an angel said to him: 'Arise, Methusalem, and build thee an house, for thou shalt live yet five hundred years longer.' But Methusalem answered and said: 'If I am to live but five hundred years longer, it is not worth while to build me an house; I will sleep in the air as I have been used to do.'"

LETTER.—Sitting round the fire, while chestnuts are roasting, is not a bad occupation. You can tell the children stories, or read aloud to them meanwhile. If they are older than mere children, it is no use our suggesting what they are to do, as we do not know them.

MARIE LOUISE.—Such employment is most difficult to procure. We are sorry that we cannot help you.

O. B. B.—The version you enquire for of the Christmas Carol, which is still popular in the Midland Counties, is as follows :

As I sat on a sunny bank
On Christmas Day, in the morning,
I saw three ships come sailing by,
On Christmas Day in the morning.
And who do you think were in those ships
But Joseph and his fair lady ;
He did whistle and she did sing,
And all the bells on earth did ring,
For joy, our Saviour he was born,
On Christmas Day in the morning.

SEARCH-WARRANT.—As you are so out of the way of books, we copy for you the poem you want. It is by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and is entitled, "A Woman's Shortcomings."

She has laughed as softly as if she sighed,
She has counted six, and over,
Of a purse well filled, and a heart well tried—
Oh, each a worthy lover !
They "give her time"; for her soul must slip
Where the world has set the grooving ;
She will lie to none with her fair red lip,
But love seeks truer loving.

She trembles her fan in a sweetness dumb,
As her thoughts were beyond recalling,
With a glance for one, and a glance for some,
From her eyelids rising and falling ;
Speaks common words with a blushing air,
Hears bold words, unrepenting ;
But her silence says, what she never will swear,
And love seeks better loving.

Go, lady, lean to the night-guitar,
And drop a smile to the bringer,
Then smile as sweetly, when he is far,
At the voice of an in-door singer.
Bask tenderly beneath tender eyes ;
Glance lightly, on their removing ;
And join new vows to old perjuries—
But dare not call it loving.

Unless you can think, when the song is done,
No other is soft in the rhythm ;
Unless you can feel, when left by one,
That all men else go with him ;
Unless you can know, when unpraised by his breath,
That your beauty itself wants proving ;
Unless you can swear, "For life, for death !"—
Oh, fear to call it loving !

Unless you can muse in a crowd all day,
On the absent face that fixed you ;
Unless you can love, as the angels may,
With the breadth of heaven betwixt you ;
Unless you can dream that his faith is fast,
Through behaving and unbehaving ;
Unless you can die when the dream is past—
Oh, never call it loving !

SPECULATION.—There are two classes of gas-meters, the wet and the dry. The wet meter is composed of an outer box, about three-fifths filled with water. Within this is a revolving four-chambered drum, each chamber being capable of containing a definite quantity of gas which is admitted through a pipe in the centre of the meter, and, owing to the arrangement of the partitions of the chambers, causes the drum to maintain a constant revolution. This sets in motion a train of wheels, carrying the hands over the dials, which mark the quantity of gas consumed. The dry meter consists of two or three chambers each divided by a flexible partition or diaphragm, by the motion of which the capacity on one side is diminished, while that on the other is increased. By means of slide-valves, like those of a steam-engine, worked by the movement of the diaphragms, the gas to be measured passes alternately in and out of each space. The contractions and expansions set in motion the clockwork, which marks the rate of consumption. The diaphragms in all the chambers are so connected that they move in concert.

T. M.—Remuneration is given.

T. T. (Glasgow).—"Management of the Poultry Yard," by James Long, 1s., L. Upcott Gill, and "Profitable and Ornamental Poultry," H. Piper, 1s., Groombridge and Sons, are useful and trustworthy books. "Tegetmeier's Poultry Book" is a handsome volume, with numerous coloured illustrations, 1s. 1s., Routledge.

WHAT'S IN A NAME.—Double Christian-names, if used at all, were rare in England until quite late in the eighteenth century.

XXX.—1. "The Green Bag Inquiry" took its name from a green bag, full of documents relating to alleged seditions, which was laid before Parliament by Lord Sidmouth, February, 1817. Secret committees presented their reports, 19th February ; and Bills were brought in on the 21st to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and prohibit the seditious meetings which were then frequent. 2. "To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace;" speech of George Washington to both Houses of Congress, January 8, 1790. The Latin original runs, "Si vis pacem para bellum."

Puzzles for Prizes.

RULES.

1. Answers should be written on one side of the paper only, and should be posted so as to reach the office, 24, Great New Street, Fetter Lane, E.C., by the first delivery on the Tuesday after date of publication. Envelopes must be addressed, "The Puzzle Editor," and each answer must bear the nom de plume of the writer legibly written on the top of the first sheet.

2. A First Prize of TEN SHILLINGS and a Second Prize of FIVE SHILLINGS will be awarded each week to the best and second-best answers respectively to the two Puzzles set. The Puzzle Editor reserves, however, the right of withholding either the First or Second Prize, or both, if, in his opinion, the answers received should not come up to the required standard of merit.

3. No winner of a First Prize will be eligible for another Prize during the same quarter. A winner of a Second Prize will be eligible for another Second Prize in the same quarter, but not for a First Prize.

4. Every Prize-winner must consent to send his or her name and address for publication.

5. The Puzzle Editor's decision is to be taken as final.

PUZZLES.

1. Five Metagrams.

As most of our readers are aware, a Metagram is a Logograph, in which the initial is changed again and again, so as to produce a series of words of divers meanings. The following is an example :

Of letters four I am composed,
A man of wisdom great ;
And sometimes also I am used
A kind of plant to state.

But now, if you will change my head,
Part of a book am I ;
And likewise an attendant young
In me you will deary.

Change once again, and then you will
A furious passion see ;
And I sincerely hope, my friends,
You'll ne'er get into me.

Another change will plainly show
I am remuneration,
Earned by all grades of working men
Throughout the British nation.

Renew my head once more, and then
A prison I appear,
From which sweet sounds oft issue forth,
That pleasant are to hear.

Answer—Sage, page, rage, wage, cage.

The first task will be to compose Five Metagrams, either in poetry or prose. The answers must be distinctly written.

2. An Historical Mental Picture.

A city was held by a small garrison, and was in imminent danger of yielding to its besiegers unless speedily relieved. A brilliant scheme of relief was planned and carried out. Three thousand picked men were assembled, and headed by a veteran officer, marched during the night through ten miles of sea, the average depth being four or five feet, while the tide rose at least ten feet, and the bottom was muddy and treacherous, and traversed by three deep channels. The leader plunged gallantly into the waves, followed by his army, each man carrying on his head a sack containing biscuit and powder. The water was never lower than the breast, often higher than the shoulder, yet that adventurous band pursued their midnight march for five hours, sometimes swimming for their lives, and before the day had dawned set foot on dry land, and triumphantly accomplished their project of relief.

When did this incident take place, who was the leader, and what was the town?

Puzzles in No. 131.

The Answers to these Puzzles being so few in number that there was practically no competition, no Prizes will be awarded this week.

The Winner of Second Prize in No. 127, was Miss Annie Faldo Neal, 179, Hornsey Road, Holloway ("Maiblume").

The answer to the Diagonal Puzzle is as follows :

B	O	R	D	E	R	E	R
B	E	W	I	L	D	E	R
G	R	A	N	T	H	A	M
C	R	O	U	C	H	E	R
V	E	S	T	M	E	N	T
F	R	E	T	W	O	R	K
E	L	O	Q	U	E	N	T
F	I	L	A	M	E	N	T

Beaumont—Fletcher.

OUT OF THE RUNNING.—The following Prize-Winners come under the conditions of Rule 3, for thirteen weeks from the date of the Number in which they gained a Prize : No. 120.—1st Prize, "Dranssem" ; 2nd Prize, "Alice." No. 121.—1st Prize, "Achilles" ; 2nd Prize, "Comus." No. 122.—1st Prize, "Midnight Oil" ; 2nd Prize, "Stella." No. 123.—1st Prize, "Zyx" ; 2nd Prize, "Comus." No. 124.—1st Prize, "Ferdinando" ; 2nd Prize, "Ambrosia." No. 125.—Equal Prizes, "Frensham," "Ryland," "Maiblume." No. 126.—1st Prize, "Hookwood" ; 2nd Prize, "L. C. L." No. 127.—1st Prize, "Manhattan" ; 2nd Prize, "Maiblume." No. 128.—1st Prize, "Irish Exile" ; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 129.—Equal Prizes, "Abracadabra," "Acacia," "Ethel May." No. 130.—1st Prize, "The Arabs" ; 2nd Prize, "Alice."

Answers have been received from—Abracadabra, Emma Jane, J. Dark, L. C. L., Lex, Richmond.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—ESPERANCE—Your name would have been printed as a Prize-Winner if you had gained a Prize. Many others besides yourself were successful in solving the Logograms, but the Birthday Verses were also taken into consideration in awarding the Prizes. K.—Both Puzzles are considered in awarding Prizes.

Odds and Ends.

KING CHARLES II. asked Stillingfleet how it was that he always read his sermons before him, when he was informed that he always preached without book elsewhere. He replied that the awe of so noble an audience, when he saw nothing that was not greatly superior to him, but chiefly the seeing before him so great and wise a Prince, made him afraid to trust himself, with which answer the king was well contented. "But, pray," asked Stillingfleet, "will your majesty give me leave to ask a question too? Why do you read your speeches when you have none of the same reasons?" "Why truly, doctor," said the king, "your question is a very pertinent one, and so will be my answer. I have asked them so often for money, and for so much, that I am ashamed to look them in the face."

SCENE: Circuit Court in a Highland county-town. Young country-woman under examination. Advocate: "Now, my good girl, you say you were near the spot when the prisoner at the bar committed the act. Was any one with you at the time?" Witness: "Yiss, yiss, my lort, my sweetheart was with me." Advocate: "Courting, I suppose. Is he here? We want corroborative evidence." Witness: "Yiss, my lort; shust outside." Judge: "We had better call him into court." Witness: "No, no, my lort—goodness, no! I can hardly get him to court me when we're alone, and I'm sure he won't court me afore you all."

SOME merchants went to an Eastern sovereign, and exhibited for sale some fine horses. The king bought them, and, moreover, entrusted the merchants with a lac of rupees to purchase more horses for him. The king being one day in a sportive humour, ordered the vizier to make out a list of all the fools in his dominions. He did so, and put his majesty's name at the head of them. The king asked him why he did so; he replied: "Because you entrusted a lac of rupees to men you don't know, and who will never come back." "Aye, but suppose they should come back?" "Then I shall erase your name and insert theirs."

KING HENRY VIII. designing to send a nobleman on an embassy to Francis I. at a very dangerous juncture, he begged to be excused, saying such a threatening message to so hot a prince as Francis I. might cost him his life. "Fear not," said Henry VIII. "If the French king should take away your life, I would revenge you by taking off the heads of as many Frenchmen as are in my power." "But of all these heads," replied the nobleman, "there may not be one would fit my shoulders."

THE members of our staff are very fond of boasting of their prowess at cricket. A match was commenced on Thursday, and on the evening of that day our hero went to the wickets, but before he had received a ball stumps were drawn for the day. All Friday it rained, and there was no play. On Saturday morning he was clean bowled by the first ball he received, and now he boasts that it took an All England Eleven three days to get him out.

It is said that a foreign artist, although long amongst us, used occasionally to make funny mistakes in his English when excited. On one occasion, finding he had been driven for some distance in a wrong direction, and being anxious to know where he was, he astonished the coachman by putting his head out of the window, and shouting indignantly, "Who am I?"

A PERSON, who dined in company with Dr. Johnson, endeavoured to make his court to him by laughing immoderately at everything he said. The doctor bore it for some time with philosophical indifference; but the impertinent "Ha, ha, ha!" becoming intolerable, "Pray, sir," said the doctor, "I hope I have not said anything that you can comprehend."

JOHN, reading to his wife from a newspaper: "There is not a single woman in the House of Correction." There, you see, don't you, what wicked creatures wives are! Every woman in that gaol is married." "It is curious," she said; "but don't you think, John dear, that some of them go there for relief?"

A FRENCHMAN, being taken prisoner by the Algerines, was asked what he could do as a slave. He replied that he had been used to a sedentary employment. "Well, then," said the pirates, who were not used to employments of that nature, "we will mount you in feathers, and set you to hatch chickens."

THE New York Journal says: "The Princess Louise has sent seven water-colours to the Boston exhibition. One of them represents a blue cow grazing in a lavender meadow, through which a purple brook, filled with pink fish, purls along under a green sky, in which a terra-cotta sun flames gorgeously."

PROFESSOR YOUNG says: "Take a railroad from the earth to the sun, with a train running forty miles an hour, without stopping, and it would take about two hundred and sixty-five years to make the journey." He estimates the fare, at a penny a mile, to be £372,000. These figures kill the project.

VOLTAIRE, having lampooned a nobleman, was, one night on his way home, intercepted by him and beaten for his licentious wit. On which he applied to the Duke of Orleans, then Regent, and begged him to do him justice. "Sir," replied the Regent, smiling, "it has been done already."

A WOMAN hunted two hours for a needle she had dropped on the floor, and then her husband came in, and had hardly taken his boots off before he could tell where it was. Queer how men can do things that women can't.

A VERY thin audience attending the third representation of a new comedy, the author observed to a friend that he thought it must be owing to the war. "No," said his friend, "I think it is owing to the piece."

A GENTLEMAN observed to Mr. Erskine, who was a great punster, that "punning was the worst kind of wit." "It is so," answered he, "and therefore the foundation of all wit."

BANNISTER, passing a house which had been almost consumed by fire, enquired whose it was; being told a hatter's, "Oh," said he, "then the loss was felt."

A BISHOP, congratulating a poor parson, said he lived in a very fine air. "Yes," replied he, "I should think it so, if I could live upon it as well as in it."

ADDRESSING an Edinburgh audience recently, Mr. Toole said that he met an old friend who congratulated him upon the business he was doing, and expressed the hope that the actor was careful. "I replied, I was the most careful man in Edinburgh, or elsewhere. Thirty years ago, when I first played the 'Artful Dodger,' I had a pair of trousers given me by my friend Wyndham. Those same trousers I wear to-morrow night in 'The Artful Dodger.' Can any one be more careful than keeping a pair of trousers for thirty years?" Mr. Toole evidently appreciated the fact that he was addressing a Scotch assembly.

A GIRL in one of the public schools applied to her teacher for leave to be absent half a day on the plea that they had company at home. The teacher referred her to the printed list of reasons that the school committee think sufficient to justify absence, and asked her if her case came under any of them. She naively replied that it might come under the head of "domestic affliction."

MRS. BARBAULD, being on a visit to the University of Oxford, was shown over one of the colleges by a stupid young nobleman who acted as cicerone. It was observed by a person who knew both parties, how very unfortunate she was in her conductor. "Not at all," said a gentleman present. "Minerva, you know, was always attended by an owl!"

A LADY, travelling in a railway-carriage, was much annoyed by a cockney companion continually embellishing his conversation with "This 'ere" and "That 'air." A few minutes afterwards she quietly requested him to close the window, remarking, "This ear is affected by that air."

WHEN Dr. Zimmermann was at the court of Berlin, Frederick II. asked him one day in conversation, how many he had killed in the course of his practice. "That is an arduous task," replied the doctor; "but I think I may venture to say not half so many as your majesty."

A GENTLEMAN, who was dining with another, found the meat excellent, and asked who was the butcher? "His name is Addison." "Addison," echoed the guest. "Pray, is he any relation to the poet?" "In all probability he is, for he is seldom without his steel (Steele) by his side."

A YOUNG officer, not over fond of fighting, waited on his colonel on the eve of a battle to ask leave of absence to visit his father and mother, both of whom were very ill. "Yes," said the colonel; "honour your father and mother that your days may be long."

"Do you think," asked a college student of a professor of theology, "that the lion and lamb have ever yet lain down together?" "I don't know," answered the professor, "but if they have, I have no doubt the lamb was missing from that date."

"WHY aren't the organ-grinders numbered in this country, the same as they are in other countries?" indignantly asked a gentleman just returned from abroad. "Because they are numberless," replied one who had never been from home.

A Quiet Life.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"ROBERT, I must not go." There was the dignity of a noble resolution in Hannah Martin's face and figure as she said those words. She stood in a meadow, a few feet from the garden-gate, and the crimson glory of sunset was all around. Her lover was near her, tall and strong, looking at her with a little wonder in his loving admiration, she was so beautiful, with the soft radiance lighting up her sad face and earnest eyes.

"Surely you cannot forsake me now, Hannah—now, when you are fairer and dearer than ever. I have been patient, it is more than two months since the ship started in which we were to have sailed. I must not let this next one go without me. I am doing nothing here, wasting time and money. Give in, my girl, and let us be married on Sunday, and then you shall stay with your mother until Wednesday, when we must go to London. I will not claim you until the very last moment."

"I am very sorry to grieve you, but I must not go. Poor mother will never walk again, and you know she has no one but me in all the world."

"And I have no one like you in all the world!" he exclaimed impetuously.

She put her hand upon his arm and said very gently:

"Dear Robert, you have relatives and friends, and health and strength, and you are so young, and you have all your life before you, and can forget what has passed between us, and, in a little time, begin to love again."

"Never, never!" he cried passionately.

"At least you must be free to do so. You are no longer engaged to me, for my promise is broken. I cannot be your wife. I must stay with mother, who is poor, and lonely, and helpless."

"We can send her money in the future. Come with me; think how I have hoped for you, longed for you, waited for you; think of all the plans we have made and the bright times we have been looking forward to, and come."

"How I wish I could! But poor mother needs more than money—love, and careful nursing, and company, and I only can give her these. Oh, Robert! I have sought long and hard for a way out of this trouble, but there is not one. We must part."

"You sacrifice me to your mother?" he cried angrily.

"I cannot help it, you are the lesser sacrifice. If you lose much, she would lose everything if I left her. Dear Robert, you will grow reconciled, there will be so much to occupy you and distract your thoughts in your new home; this is my comfort."

"It should be your sorrow, for every new thing will make me think of you and what we should have said and done together. Hannah, you must come, you dare not desert me now; we are almost married, the banns have been long published, surely I have some right, some power over you; surely my great love will constrain you to keep true to me—to come with me?"

"I cannot," she said gently.

"Then you cannot love me," he said vehemently; "you never loved me or you would not throw away my love as if it was a pebble picked up by the roadside because it was pretty. You never loved me—you fooled me, you made pretence!"

"Never!" and then there was a ring of passion in her low tones.

"You must have done so," he continued; "you do not love me; those who love cleave to each other and will not be put asunder, and you say go—go, and be happy. Hannah, if you persist in your refusal to be my wife, and my wretchedness drives me to evil courses, my sins will be on your head."

"I must bear them," she answered gently, "but I have faith in your goodness, Robert."

"You wreck my happiness, you blast my life, yet you keep calm and serene," with scorn in his voice.

"I try, Robert, for your sake. I wish our parting to be as kindly as possible, that we may have pleasant memories of each other, and we must part though our hearts should break."

"You make the law and I am forced to obey. Cruel, heartless woman, I go!" and he strode away.

She stood watching him as he marched away with head erect, so young, so strong, and handsome, and a terrible bitterness filled her heart, that this parting in anger should be the end of her love and bright hopes. As she gazed at him with sight dimmed by gathering tears, he turned, and, rushing back to her, folded her in his arms, and, kissing her passionately, said, "Though I go, I shall love you for ever," and turned away swiftly. And she, startled and trembling, again watched him until he was lost to her sight amongst the trees. She felt great tenderness and compassion for his suffering, and a desperate longing that it might be possible that her love should so enfold him as to be a shield and protection against the sorrows and troubles of life. That he might be happy was the cry of her soul. In that supreme moment she had no thought of herself.

The sunset glow had faded; the cloudy sky was grey and cold, and when the gentle repetition of her own name, Hannah, had recalled her mind to the actual present, she found that it was raining. She gave one lingering glance into the darkness towards the spot where Robert had passed away from her, then, with a deep sigh, turned from the lonely view and entered the garden. She went up the path near the wall, and soon she stood close to it, and, putting her hand over, touched a boy's head.

"Your curls are wet, Willie. I am so sorry."

"Never mind," he replied. "I was afraid you might forget it was raining."

"I did. Thank you for calling me, Willie;" and stooping, she kissed the upturned face.

"Oh, Hannah, do not cry!" he said imploringly, as a tear fell on his cheek.

"It will save my heart from breaking," she murmured. "Perhaps Willie, it was only a rain-drop. Run in quick, my pet. Good-night."

"Good-night, dear, dear Hannah," replied the boy in his sweet loving voice, and ran quickly indoors.

Hannah entered her quaint little kitchen, and busied herself there until all trace of tears or rain had disappeared from her face and apparel. Then she took in the cup of gruel to her mother, and while she was drinking it, turned the big easy-chair into a bed for herself, that she might be at hand to minister to her mother in the night.

As Hannah came to her to take away the cup, the invalid said:

"You have seen Robert?"

"Yes, mother."

"And he is eager to take you away. You must not try him too much, dear; he has been patient. Something must be done with me. I will consult the vicar."

"Mother, dear mother, I shall never leave you. Robert and I have parted for good;" and the girl bent over her mother, kissing her fervently.

"My darling, this must not be."

"It is done, mother. It would not be right that I should leave you."

"Your father's words, 'it would not be right,' decided everything with him; but it must not be. You renounce too much. Wait—consider."

"It is too late. Robert is gone; and take comfort, dear mother, that I am following my father's teaching. To me it seems clear that it would not be right for me to go, so I stay. Oh, do not look at me with such anguish in your eyes, or you will break my heart. If you will be pleased to have me with you, to cheer and help you bear your great trouble, I shall forget in time, and we shall be as happy as in the past—almost."

"My darling, Heaven bless you!" and the mother hid her face in her daughter's bosom, that the great sorrow in it should not trouble her. Presently she said:

"I am thankful to have you with me, and, to show my gratitude, will try to be brave and happy, but it is natural that I should regret that your life should be ruined for me."

"I have no faith in ruined lives; mine is not ruined, will not be ruined, because I stay here in England with you instead of going with a husband to Australia. I mean to be useful and to do well for myself and for others; and, mother dear, think how young I am, and how many good things may happen to me. And do not let us make our disappointments more bitter by unavailing regrets. I know you are greatly disappointed; you were fond of Robert;" and she arranged her mother's little shawl with tender caressing hand.

"I am fond of him."

"We both loved him dearly; but that is in the past now, and we will try and forget him. He is quite gone from us."

"Quite?"

"Yes, quite. I believe that he has passed out of our lives for ever." Even as she honestly said these words she remembered his passionate declaration that he should love her for ever; and a thrill of delight passed over her at the thought that, if he loved her, he would be constrained to seek her, and they might meet again. But her intimate knowledge of his character helped her to a more sober judgment in the matter, and she recognised that he was at last convinced that she would not leave her mother, so would probably try to forget her, and to throw off the affection that had become a pain and a burden to him. As she lay sleepless that miserable night, she prayed that he might be able to do so quickly; and her mind was so full of compassion for him, starting alone on his long journey, missing her doubly when any event happened that they had talked over and expected to enjoy together, and finally settling, a solitary bachelor, in the little home he had hoped to share with her, that she had no thought for the sorrows of herself and her mother.

Mrs. Martin, when the light was out, and her child could not see her tears, wept very bitterly for the downfall of all her hopes. She would rather have died than have deprived her daughter of a good husband and a happy future. She resented a little not having been told of Hannah's intention to give up her lover until the deed had been done, and all remonstrance was of no avail. She felt it hard to have sacrifices made for her against her will. She believed that she would have been happier in a workhouse with Hannah comfortably married than she should be with all her careful tenderness and loving solicitude, sorrowing that she had ruined her prospects. Then there was poverty before them, and a competency for her girls is always the dearest wish of a mother's heart. Hannah married would be in comfortable circumstances, Hannah single would be little better than a sempstress, and would have to toil, and give painful consideration to ways and means all her days. The poor woman was grateful to her child, and she tried to be submissive to the will of Heaven; but she found it terribly bitter to know that she had had no voice in the ordering of her own destiny. Good had been forced upon her, but it was not the good that she had desired, and it weighed upon her as a darkness that could not be lifted, and her soul was crushed and desolate.

CHAPTER II.

MRS. MARTIN was a widow with a very small certain income. She and her daughter supported themselves by needlework. She was educated and gentle-mannered, and had been half maid, half companion to the squire's wife, who was still her best friend. A few months previously she had injured her spine in slipping off a little rustic bridge of one plank, and would never be able to walk again, or to do anything but lie upon her back, and, at the best, occupy herself with light needlework. Then for weeks the women sorrowed, and the man waited, and at last the end was come to the hopes, and wishes, and glad anticipations of years. The lovers had parted.

The day after the parting the women were very sad and ill at ease. Mrs. Martin was sore at heart and a little angered that Hannah should have destroyed all her chances in life without consulting her, and the girl felt that her mother was dissatisfied with her, and it seemed to her very hard that she should have put aside her happiness and yet get no thanks for doing so. She believed she had done well, but when we bring sorrow upon ourselves in doing right, we need the sympathy of our friends, and a little kindly admiration of our merit to reconcile ourselves to the position. And Hannah was very unhappy and very lonely, for a constraint had come between mother and child and they said little to each other, and that little with reserve and uncertainty, each fearing that the simplest expression might touch or aggravate the trouble of the other. The open free confidence of heart with heart that had sustained them in past trouble was gone, and each sorrowed separately in silence. For many days this sad state lasted, but as the mother watched the deepening sadness in her child's face, and the daughter noticed the furtive tears and the wistful eyes of her mother, the little sense of injury and division in the minds of each died out, and their great love drew them into each other's arms, and, as they wept, they resolved to grieve openly together, henceforth. And as a sorrow shared is robbed of half its bitterness, they became more composed and hopeful, and gave thought to the ordering of their future life.

More employment was needed, and Mrs. Gidding, the present squire's mother, got the owner of a baby-linen shop in the neighbouring town to give them constant work, and Mrs. Martin lay stitching through the long hours of daylight. Her room had two windows, and across one of them her bed was placed, so that she could have good light for her sewing, and look out at the little front garden, the narrow lane, and the hedge and trees on the other side. There were but few passers-by, but it made a change for her even to see a smock-frocked labourer, and after a time all who passed that way looked out for the little white face at the window, and greeted it with a smile. Hannah sat at the other window working, and in the chamber were gathered all the widow's choicest possessions, the curiosities she had brought from foreign parts, presents, and in the corner-cupboard was some old choice china that had come to her from her grandmother—little handless cups, with saucers, and a punch-bowl, many of them greatly broken, but so deftly mended that no damage was visible except on near inspection. There was always a great nosegay on the table, for Mr. Martin had filled her garden with choice flowers. The window-sills were full of sturdy geraniums. The chamber was large and square and low, and people sometimes came in and said how pleasant and quaint it was; and Mrs. Martin knew it was very comfortable and recalled her great pride in it when she was a young wife; but as years passed and she lay in it always, year after year, seeing ever the same four walls and gazing out at the same garden-hedge and trees, it seemed to her a prison from which death could bring the only release.

Hannah told herself always, as she told her mother, that Robert and herself had parted for ever, yet deep down in her heart was a feeble spark of hope that refused to be extinguished by her reason, that she would hear from him again, that he would make some effort to move her from her resolution. The year passed and she had no news of him; his family ceased, from the time of his quitting England, to hold any communication with her. Robert and she were virtually dead to each other, yet it was with a thrill of disappointment that she heard, a month or two later, that he was married.

Willie Stone, the little boy who had spoken to her the night of her bitter trouble, was more intimate with her than anybody else. He had won his way to her heart by his gentle affectionateness and his kindly helpfulness, her attention having first been attracted to him by the fact that he was motherless. He was thoughtful and discreet beyond his years—old-fashioned, people called him. She found that he had a quicker comprehension of her feelings and wishes than anybody else, and an ever-ready intelligent sympathy for all her trouble.

He had heard talk in the village of how she would bear herself when she knew that her old love had consoled himself with another woman, and he resolved to tell, that she might not be taken at a disadvantage. As he helped her water the flowers one evening, he said:

"Robert is settled at last, Hannah; he was married last month. It is true; father made sure of it, or I should not tell you."

He went on vigorously watering, never lifting his eyes to her, but they filled with tears as he heard one little gasping sob. Presently she came close to him and said softly:

"I hope he will be happy; and, Willie, you were a dear good boy to tell me, and I thank you very much."

"And you will not mind much?"

"I will not mind at all," she said bravely. "All is really over now, and with mother and you I shall be very happy. You shall be my little brother, and I will do everything I can for you Willie."

"I am so glad, sister," and the sweet child-voice lingered lovingly on the last word. The two were fast friends thenceforth, and Willie's sayings and doings, and general well-being, made the chief interest of Hannah's life. She watched over him and loved him as if he were indeed her brother, and he filled the void in her heart left by the departure of Robert.

The years went by; the days were full of occupation; there was always the need to work that they might live. The weeks passed with such persistent monotony that, save for the changing of the seasons, the two might have believed themselves always in the self-same week.

Then the settled dullness was broken by an event. Mrs. Gidding died. The squire had been summoned from abroad to her bedside, and arrived in time to soothe her last hours, and have the invalid and her daughter recommended to his care.

Mrs. Martin and Hannah grieved much for the loss of their old friend; there was nobody left to them now but Willie. They were restless, and their constant working was rendered more difficult by the tears that would fall for the departed, and for a time they rebelled against their hard lot, and told each other that they were sorely stricken women. But soon they regained their fortitude, took courage, and led again the dull, sad life with calmness and gentle dignity.

The new squire came to see them, mindful of his mother's behest, and because the invalid had often been kind to him in his boyhood. He remembered pretty little Hannah, too; but he was a grave and learned man, who took little interest in girls or women. Mrs. Martin's face brightened at his approach, and she would forget her pain while he talked. And Hannah listened with delight to his account of the strange places and peoples he had seen, for he had been an explorer, and ventured into unknown lands.

He took to coming often. Their gentle manners pleased him, and he was flattered by their earnest attention to his discourse. He liked to see the lighting up of the delicate face and the smile in the widow's eyes, and thought her welcome the most gracious he had ever received. She believed that he visited her simply because she was the friend of his mother, and he had found out that he could cheer and amuse her, and for the time put from her all sorrowful remembrance. He gave little attention to Hannah, but was conscious that she made him an attentive auditor.

Mrs. Martin looked at her daughter as she sat with her delicate face bent over her work, taking no part in the conversation. She noticed the softness of her brown hair, the beauty of her rounded throat, the elegance of her figure, and, above all, her refined expression and dignity of mien; and she told herself that Hannah was fit to occupy any position, and she hoped that the suffering, bravely borne, that had produced these last attributes, might yet meet ample compensation. And from that moment she began to have a waking dream of great happiness for her child.

The grave squire continued his visits, brought views for them to look at, books for them to read, and by degrees Hannah began to take some part in the conversation. It was not from shyness she had held aloof, but simply because no call had been made upon her to speak.

Mrs. Martin watched the squire, and was well pleased, and at last one day, when Hannah was giving him some spirited answer, she saw him roused, in sudden surprise, to a full consciousness of her rare beauty; and afterwards his glance would constantly stray to the bent head with gentle eyes so patiently cast upon her work. The mother observed, with a little tremor, that Hannah did not feel the glance, but surely she could not be unresponsive to the regard of such a man when it should become patent to her, and it pleased her to know that her child required as long, and as respectful wooing, as a maiden of high degree.

But as time passed, and she saw the squire's love deepen, she wished that her child was not so cold, yet she feared to say a word, and comforted herself with the belief that when the declaration came her heart would open to the generous affection, and give it fitting welcome and response.

At last the hoped-for, watched-for moment came. The squire and herself were alone. He said:

"I think you have understood my hopes, and that I have your good wishes."

"You have my best wishes. Heaven bless you both!"

"May I go through to the garden? Perhaps I shall find her there."

"Go, and send Willie to me."

Willie came, and the mother's heart was a prey to a terrible anxiety. Should this great blessing come to her child and fill their lives with enduring joy, or would it slip from her because she would not just put out her hand to grasp it, and their sadness be deeper than before?

Willie spoke a few words, trying to soothe her, for her eager longing for a certainty of happiness brought the sweat upon her brow and made her face haggard.

"I do hope she will have him," whispered Willie.

"You know?" said Mrs. Martin, a little surprised.

"I think everybody knows but Hannah," said the boy.

"He would make her so happy," said the mother.

Then the old woman and the boy waited, almost breathless, listening for a sound that should give them an assurance of the good news they longed for.

Shortly, although the time had seemed wearily long to the watchers, a man's step was heard in the little passage, and the squire entered the room. He went straight to Mrs. Martin, and said softly:

"She cannot love me, but do not grieve or blame her. She cannot help it," and, stooping, he kissed her tenderly, and observing the speechless misery in her face, said again: "Do not grieve, my dear old friend, and rest assured that I shall watch over her from a distance. She shall never want for help or protection while I live."

The sad eyes thanked him eloquently.

"She is one of those that can love but once, we must not blame her," and pressing cordially the cold hand he left her.

Then the poor woman did battle with her disappointment, trying to repress all signs of it that she might not wound her daughter; she made no complaint, she uttered no reproach, but the despairing grief in her face told Hannah all she felt, and made her very miserable.

They were just drifting back into their old ways of dull monotony when a surprise came to them in the shape of a lawyer's letter, saying that the late Mrs. Gidding had left Hannah a small annuity for life. It would not relieve her of the necessity of earning money, but it would make the doing so comparatively easy, as so much less would be required.

Mrs. Martin rejoiced exceedingly, and insisted that the yearly income should not be touched, but should accumulate for Hannah's benefit. She was so eager and anxious about this that the girl was obliged to consent, although the doing so cost them both many privations.

But to stint oneself and go without things for an object is very different to being forced to do so by necessity, and now that there was a possibility of providing for her daughter's future, Mrs. Martin became cheerful, and began to get over her great disappointment.

More years passed on, all alike; for the women did always much the same work, and Mrs. Martin lay always in the same corner, and Hannah performed the same monotonous duties. But the years were full of industry, and kindness, and gentle piety, and mother and child had a strong affection and respect for each other, and were happy in a sad subdued fashion, save for an occasional fit of melancholy when their minds went back to the joyful past, or speculated on what might have been but for Mrs. Martin's accident.

The squire went abroad after his rejection by Hannah, but brought a wife home a few years later. Then one little fellow after another stopped his pony at the cottage-gate to show himself to the face at the window, and be admired by the invalid, until there were five strong lads at the Hall, and two little girls.

Then one summer evening, as Mrs. Martin and Hannah were looking out of window, the latch of the garden-gate was lifted, and a figure walked up the path, which startled them by its great resemblance to the Robert Cleave who had left them twenty years before.

Hannah rose to open the door with a curious feeling that the years had rolled back and that she would again be face to face with her lover. Mrs. Martin heard herself asked for, and then Hannah came in with the stranger, saying: "Mother, this is Robert's son."

"My father bade me seek you out when I came to these parts," the young fellow said cheerily; "he was anxious to hear that you were doing well, he has often told us what good friends you were to him when he was a lad."

"Yes, we knew him well," said the mother, and Hannah busied herself setting out refreshment for the young man, giving many a kindly glance at the lad, and taking pride in his stature and comeliness because he was Robert's son.

He chatted pleasantly, giving them freely full information about his family and their prospects. Everything had gone well with his father, who was so well-to-do as to be considered rich; he had many children, and was looked up to by everybody; his eldest girl was well married and the next engaged. The second Robert made a hearty supper and then he talked on until the gloaming was past and the room illuminated only by the pale light of the moon. Even then Hannah did not rise to get a candle, but hung spellbound on the words that told of the success and brave endeavour of the man she had loved. She felt the boy's pride in his father and she shared it, and rejoiced that time had amply justified her girl-choice of a husband.

Robert told them that his last relative had left the neighbourhood and that he must be on his way early on the morrow, and yet he lingered. Then Hannah became yet more gentle to him and spoke specially of himself and his views, and he told her of a sweet girl who was very dear to him, and of his hope to make a start on his own account in a year. He promised to write to her as soon as he was married, and afterwards to let her have news of him once a year. Then the newly-made friends parted with regret, and Hannah stood in the moonlight watching him pass from her sight as she had once watched his father. Then shutting the door gently she came to her mother and said:

"He has done thoroughly well without me, so I have nothing to regret;" the deep thankfulness in her voice revealing that she had sometimes feared it might have been otherwise.

The years went on. Willie had married a delicate girl, and now had delicate children, so Hannah and her mother had to give constant thought to his concerns. This was good for them. And they had great sympathy for all sore hearts, and occupied their minds with the troubles and pleasures of others so effectually that they forgot their own sad lot, and were thoroughly happy and cheerful.

Mrs. Martin's face grew plump and bright in this glad time, and Hannah developed into a very handsome elderly woman. They still lived in the same thrifty manner, the mother exulting that a little fortune was being stored up for her daughter. They worked hard, but the days were no longer so horribly monotonous. They had more varied sources of interest, and there were Willie's children to visit and amuse them, and their hearts were filled with content.

Mother and child seemed to find more pleasure in each other's society, and to love each other more as the years passed on, and made the one old and the other very old. And Death came to a serenely happy home when he summoned Mrs. Martin.

She died blessing her daughter, and bade her not to mourn overmuch.

Hannah was deeply desolate, but she saw that there was work for her to do. Willie was prosperous, and all his children in good health. They no longer needed her solicitude. But sad news had come to her from the other side of the world. Robert's wife was dead, all his sisters married, and there was no one to take care of his young family. He had written several times to Hannah, telling her of his great distress.

She resolved to go to him and offer him her services. She had now an income sufficient for her maintenance, so need take nothing from him but gratitude.

She went, and was received with open arms. Calmly she took the management of his household, and did all things well and fittingly. The children quickly loved her, and as it was necessary they should have a friendly name for her, she was called Aunt Hannah.

And as Aunt Hannah the lover of her youth met her with cordial greetings and warm thanks for looking after his grandchildren, and no recollection of long-ago troubled for either of them the pleasantness of the interview. Nothing in the stout, bold, prosperous colonist reminded Hannah of the Robert she had once expected to marry, and he had quite forgotten that one episode of his adventurous and eventful life.

First.

HIGH swells his soul, who, after war's alarms,
Stands conqueror, where his flag in triumph flies;
Keen is the joy that lights the lover's eyes,
When his fair bird comes fluttering to his arms.

Pure is the gladness of the mother's heart,
Bending above her first-born's rosy sleep;
Full is the measure that the pulses keep,
When the world's plaudits crown the royal art.

But highest, purest, fullest, is the joy
That thrills, in silence, in her happy breast,
Who sees and knows her best-beloved is best,
Her worship firm, her gold without alloy.

His Own Guest.

(A SERIAL STORY.)

CHAPTER XXVIII.

SIR CHARLES MEREDITH would have preferred, on his return to the house, after his rejection by Mary, to retire to his own room, but he had been bred in the old school of courtesy, and felt it incumbent upon him to join his guests.

As well as he could he disguised his agitation, and went straight to the drawing-room, where, however, he found his mother alone.

Rubina, escorted by her maid and a lantern, which latter, considering that the moon made everything almost as bright as day, she apparently had had brought as a sort of weapon of defence rather than as a light to guide her on her way, had some time since taken her departure; Edith was upstairs putting on her things; and the gentlemen had gone to the smoking-room for a final cigar.

Sir Charles, with a sigh of relief at finding that he might, for the moment at least, put aside his feigned tranquility, threw himself into a chair. Lady Meredith at once saw that something had occurred of moment.

"Why, Charles, what is the matter? How serious you look!" she said.

"I have enough to make me so; everything seems conspiring against me," the young man replied doggedly.

"Charles," remonstrated his mother, "do not talk so. You, the head of an old family, the bearer of an honoured name and title! Why, half the world envies you."

"Do they? I almost hate my honoured name, my titled poverty, for they cause me to play a double part. Mine is a false position—I must act as if I were rich, when I ought to grudge every penny that I spend—"

"Why suffer all this, my boy, when there is a remedy close at hand?" Lady Meredith interrupted him by saying.

"I know whom you mean, of course—Edith Pennington; but she does not care for me an atom."

"How can you tell?"

"By intuition."

"Do not trust to that, it is a dangerous guide. Try her as you promised. At least, when you have asked and been refused by Mary."

He winced at the thrust.

"I have asked Mary, mother," he said, "and have been refused."

"My poor boy! I knew it would be so. But you must not give way to despair. There are plenty of girls as attractive as Mary is."

"Yes, mother, too many. They are all alike. Upon my soul, I have a mind to gratify your wishes and propose to Edith Pennington at once. Whether she accepts or rejects me depends upon her particular form of vanity. If she is ambitious for a title she will accept me."

"But," interrupted Lady Meredith, "if it is the man only she cares for?"

"Then she will reject me. I will put her to the test. Mother, make some excuse for sending her to this very room to-night—now; then keep the coast clear and leave us to ourselves."

Lady Meredith comprehended the state of mind her son was in, and, hastening to profit by it, left the room and told Edith that Charles wished to speak to her.

A few minutes later, and Edith and Sir Charles had the drawing-room to themselves.

"Miss Pennington, I have something of importance to say to you," said the latter, plunging in medias res, so as to avoid an awkward preamble.

"And, judging from your grave face, something very unpleasant too. Have I been misbehaving myself?"

"Far from it; conducting yourself so much to my liking, that I want you to become Lady Meredith."

"You are really too good, Sir Charles," replied Edith with a sarcastic smile and a sweeping curtsy. "Am I to take this as a proposal—a serious proposal?"

"Such is my meaning."

"This is Lady Meredith's doing; I will make her suffer for it, and her son, too, for being such a tool in her hands," thought Edith, who of course did not know of Mary Ray's rejection of Sir Charles.

"And do you really mean to say you love me?" she asked of her suitor.

Charles paused a moment, and then replied:

"Miss Pennington, I will be candid with you. I have loved another."

"Mary," said Edith to herself.

"I own I am weak enough to love her still. She has scorned my love because I am poor. I now turn to you."

"As the heiress, or the woman?" queried Edith somewhat scornfully.

"As both. I could not marry a rich woman I did not respect; I cannot marry a woman I love because I am poor. Edith, can an old name, an old title, tempt you to accept me?"

"Tempt me, Sir Charles? On my word, you speak as if you wished me to do something wrong. May I ask you why you have selected me for this honour?"

"I am afraid I must seem in a ridiculous position."

"At least we are in sympathy in that, for have you not put me in one as well? I don't know what cause I have given you for saying what you have; the evident agitation from which you are suffering must be to some extent your excuse, but I must tell you that you have indeed surprised me."

At that moment the door was quietly opened by Lady Meredith, who held the hand of Mary Ray in hers.

She had met, or rather waylaid the girl on her return from the deserted pleasure, and with the intention of clinching matters—or, as she put it to her conscience, of being cruel to be kind, resolved that Mary should see with her own eyes her son's proposal for the hand of the heiress.

Charles did not notice their entry; Edith, only that of Lady Meredith.

"And," continued Miss Pennington, seeing her opportunity, "I only regret there is no one present to hear my declaration that I will never marry except to become Lady Meredith."

With a cry of anguish, Mary broke from her aunt and ran to her own room, where, locking the door, she threw herself beside the bed, and burying her face in the clothes, burst into an agony of tears.

Charles had heard the cry, and pushing past his mother, hurried in pursuit of the flying girl.

"Bless you, my darling!" whispered a voice, whose owner had taken possession of Edith's hand, and, unperceived by Lady Meredith, was kissing it.

Gordon had entered by the conservatory, and had also been a spectator of Sir Charles's proposal for the hand of Edith Pennington.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THERE was no need for Lady Meredith to invent an excuse for the postponement of Mary's visit to town. The morning that should have seen her departure found her so ill from the excitement of the previous day, that a telegram was sent to Lady Harker to the effect that Miss Ray was too unwell to quit her room.

Sir Charles, unaware of her illness, left for town by an early train, Gordon travelling up with him.

Their journey was a dull one. Sir Charles was out of spirits, and Gordon, tiring of monosyllabic replies to commonplace remarks, preferred to give himself up to rosy dreams of the future, in which be sure Edith was the central figure, to keeping up an uninteresting conversation.

Two or three business matters called the elder man to town, the principal one being to write from thence a letter to his stepmother in his real name of Meredith, saying that he had put his claim to be recognised as the master of Meredith Court into the hands of his solicitors.

His object in so doing was to drive Lady Meredith, who would not dare mention the matter to Charles, and who had already been refused the co-operation of Mr. Pennington, to confide in him. He could then, under his alias of Gordon, discover how far she believed her stepson guilty of the crime she imputed to him, and perhaps hint that it might be advisable for her to help the claimant to prove his innocence, on the understanding that he wanted his good name and not the estate restored.

On the same day the American also paid a visit to the metropolis.

He had perused the newspaper which it will be remembered he carried off from Meredith Court, and his quick eye had fallen upon Messrs. Ridge's advertisement. It at once set him thinking, and he carefully a second time went through it.

"If T. M., who left England and went to New York by the Corrie Roy, in 187—, where he passed under the name of Smith, and was subsequently heard of at Mexico, will communicate with Messrs. W. and F. Ridge, 217, Broadway, New York, he will hear of something to his advantage."

Gordon had been in Mexico, and was known there as Smith. Could he have had another alias, the initials of which were T. M. ? and if so, what did the initials stand for ?

Thus reflected the colonel. Suddenly, as by an inspiration, the marble tablet, "Sacred to the Memory of Thomas Meredith," seemed to appear before his eyes. Thomas Meredith had died at sea and about the time when, from what he had heard the man himself say, Smith must have been crossing from England to America.

At first this connection between Gordon, Smith, and Meredith did not particularly impress the thinker, but the more he reflected on the matter, the closer the three names seemed to dovetail and form a whole that represented the rightful heir of Meredith Court.

But Tom Meredith had died at sea. Had he ?

Colonel Skooter made enquiries and could find no stronger corroboration of the fact than that Lady Meredith had said so, and that there was the epitaph in the church.

Proof strong enough for the Meredith Court servants and village tradesfolk, but not convincing enough for Colonel Skooter.

He wired to the agents mentioned in the advertisement:

"Thomas Meredith is staying at Farehurst ; let him have particulars of the matter you refer to, addressed to him under his present alias of Colonel Skooter, The Laurels, Farehurst."

It was a bold stroke, but when done the colonel returned to the country with the satisfactory consciousness of having done his best to turn something that did not apparently concern him to probably his own advantage.

He had drawn his bow and shot at a venture ; if the shot told, and Thomas Meredith was not dead but the man advertised for, then he had brought down a family skeleton, and one which it would cost the family something to bury ; if the T. M. wanted was not the man he suspected, Messrs. Ridge would consider that someone was playing a hoax on the strength of the advertisement, and take no more notice of the matter.

The colonel's reason for going to town to dispatch the message was obvious. Had he sent it from the Farehurst station, where both the Merediths and himself were well-known, the discreetest of station-masters might have been tempted to blurt it out.

With the intention of keeping an eye upon the good people at the Court, Colonel Skooter, the morning after his return, made a call upon Lady Meredith and learned that the young men were back sooner than had been anticipated, Sir Charles's invalid friend having been ordered at once to the South of France, and Gordon of course being anxious to see how his plot would work and glad again to be near Edith.

This speedy return of her son had considerably disconcerted the mistress of the house, who could not decently again propose Mary's immediate departure, especially as Edith had come over to stay for a few days and cheer her friend.

Lady Meredith had not had a pleasant morning of it. Wishing to keep matters in the way she considered they should go, she had been talking to the young lady whom she had elected to be her daughter-in-law, upon the question of her marriage, and Edith had been, to say the least of it, disappointing.

Her ladyship had brought the subject round by commenting upon the low spirits and pallor of Mary.

"Poor child !" she had said, "I am very sorry for her."

"So am I," Edith had replied.

"But it is necessary," went on Lady Meredith with an air and tone of conviction. "Edith dear, I can't tell you how pleased I was when I heard you accept my son. He will make you a good husband."

"Yes," assented Edith, "he is a great deal too good for me."

"Oh no, my dear, do not say that," contradicted the mother condescendingly.

"I ought to know best. I am so selfish and fond of my own way."

"All these little things will disappear in time."

"Will they ? Ah, how nice it will be to become Lady Meredith. Didn't you find it so ?"

The question evidently annoyed her ladyship.

"Really I forget," she answered coldly.

"And then to be presented at Court, to read the next morning, 'Lady Meredith, upon her marriage, by the Dowager Lady Meredith.'"

"And this is the reason you have accepted Charles ?" asked the foreshadowed dowager.

"Well, not entirely, perhaps. I suppose the family diamonds go to the reigning Queen. Are there many family diamonds ? It's so nice to be able to talk to you about it all ; I can't ask Charles yet, you see, and—"

"Really, Miss Pennington," said Lady Meredith, her temper getting the upper hand of her prudence, "I should advise you not to. Do you not care for him ?"

"Does he care for me ?"

"Of course he does, or he would not have—"

"Honoured me by asking me to become Lady Meredith," broke in Edith. "But you have not told me about the diamonds. Am I wrong in showing curiosity respecting them ?"

"It is not always wise to show one feels so much pleasure in possessing such vanities."

"I wonder when I become the Dowager Lady Meredith whether I shall feel regret in parting with them. Well, perhaps you are right, we should not let people know our true characters."

Lady Meredith had by this time lost all control over herself.

"If you have just been revealing yours, it is a pity you did not determine to conceal it all your life," she replied.

After all, there was something Lady Meredith cared for, even more than for her son's welfare, and that was the son's mother's dignity. She rose and left the room.

"Ha, ha ! I have made her quite angry," thought Edith ; "and now to tell the joke to Mary, who has been particularly dull in seeing it up to now."

Mary was playing a dreamy nocturne of Schubert's as Edith stood beside her, and leaning over kissed her on the forehead.

"Mary," she said, "there is something I wish to say to you—something to explain."

"Do not trouble to explain anything, you cannot alter facts. Oh, Edith, why have you deceived me, and broken your word ? You promised me you would never accept Charles."

"I shall never marry him."

"Edith, what do you mean ?"

"I cannot tell you yet, dear, wait a little longer ; believe me, all will come right in time. Mary, will you trust me ? Remember we are friends—old friends ; what is friendship without faith ?"

"You promise me that you won't marry him ?"

"Marry him ! Do you think I am going to throw myself away on a misanthropic young—"

"Edith, you sha'n't call him names."

"Never mind, Mary, what I say ; he's quite suitable for your fancy, I think, and quite unsuitable for mine, I am sure. You shall have him for all I care. Now can you trust me ? Hush ! here comes your admirer, Colonel Skooter."

"How do you know ?"

"By the creaking of his boots, and the pricking of my thumbs."

Edith had scarce time to assume a demure demeanour when the subject of her remark entered the room.

"All by yourselves, girls, I see," he observed.

"Are you nobody, colonel ?" asked Edith maliciously.

"Hope you don't mind my being here ?" said that gentleman, casting an appealing glance at Mary.

"It doesn't make the slightest difference." Mary's looks quite corroborated her words.

"That's real kind of you to say so," observed the colonel, interpreting her speech in a flattering manner which only thorough self-conceit could have done.

"How did they treat you in the matter of dinners whilst you were in town ?" asked Edith, knowing the colonel's weakness in that line.

"Oh, uncommonly well. I fixed up at a place where the meals was real good and frequent. Didn't come up to our New York feeding, though. Miss Pennington, you should taste our canvas-backed ducks."

"Should I ?"

"Really Colonel Skooter finds every thing American so much better than English that I wonder he stops over here," said Mary.

"Jealous of the attractions of America—good sign that," thought the colonel. "It's a change, you see," he replied. "It don't do to eat partridges for ever. But there is one sort of goods you have in England superior to our sample, and that's the women."

"Now that's very gallant of you, colonel," said Edith. "Tell me, in what respect are they superior?"

"Well, they are more quiet and modest than our girls."

"Yes," observed Mary, "the men don't monopolise those qualities in England."

"And you came here to see the Englishwomen, of course?" suggested Edith.

"The fact is, miss, I want a wife."

"Don't let him say anything more. I know what's coming," whispered Mary to Edith, but of which whisper Edith took no notice, but went on drawing him out.

"Do you. What kind of a wife?"

"I want a smart little girl who will look well at the head of my table—one worthy to become Mrs. Colonel Skooter."

"Ah, colonel, like all men you crave for the impossible!" This was Edith's little sarcastic speech.

The colonel took it literally. "Perhaps so," he said.

"Have you any one in view?"

"Yes, I have."

"Have you asked her yet?" Edith was assuming an air of bashfulness now. She had so placed herself as to intercept the admiring glances which the colonel was trying to convey to Mary.

"No," said the colonel, "but I am going to."

"Perhaps she might refuse you," said Mary.

"Absurd, Mary!" broke in Edith. "How could any one refuse Colonel Skooter?"

"By telling him so," was the prosaic reply.

"The young lady I have my eyes upon isn't a hundred miles away now, I guess."

"Oh, colonel!" cried Edith, appropriating the reference to herself.

"And if she says yes, the wedding, bride-cake, bridesmaids, and all the fixings shall be ready in a week."

"Oh, colonel, that will be too soon." Edith again was the speaker.

"Why?"

"I deeply appreciate the delicate way in which you have made your offer, but I could not leave my father so soon. Now, Mary, it's your turn."

The latter part of the sentence was in an aside.

"No, colonel, do leave me my friend a little longer," pleaded Mary, who, in spite of her trouble, could not but be amused at the comicality of the colonel's position.

"What the mischief—what—Ah, here's Sir Charles coming!" exclaimed the colonel, who began to have a dim notion that Edith was "getting at him," and was not altogether sorry, therefore, for the interruption.

Edith seized the opportunity of his attention being attracted by the new comer, to whisper into Mary's ear:

"Mary dear, I don't think the colonel will trouble you much more, but you may just as well finish him off at once. Now I want to be alone with Sir Charles for a few minutes—nay, dear, don't be jealous, believe me there is no cause, and if you were to go into the conservatory, it's just possible Colonel Skooter might follow you. You trust me now, don't you?"

The hands of the two girls met in a cordial clasp, and perfect faith in her friend came back to Mary's heart. Mary took up a book, and sauntered into the adjoining conservatory.

"Miss Ray!"

As Edith had foreseen, the colonel had followed Mary.

"Yes, colonel."

"Or Mary, if I may call you so."

"Decidedly you may not."

"I'm afraid there has been a mistake."

"I am sure there has."

"Let me explain."

"No; you would make a greater one, I am certain."

"But, my dear Miss Ray—"

"You mustn't call me your dear Miss Ray, or Edith will be jealous."

"But it is you I want to be my wife."

"Is it the custom in America for gentlemen to propose to two ladies within the hour?"

"But, I assure you, I had no intention—"

"Then why propose? Well, never mind, let us forget all about it, and now let me propose to you."

"Ah!"

"Yes, propose that we change the conversation."

And Mary showed by her manner that, necessity arising, she could be as dignified as Edith, or as Lady Meredith herself.

During this titte-à-tite between Mary and the colonel, one had been going on between Sir Charles and Edith.

"Well, Sir Knight of the Rueful Countenance," said the lady, noting the melancholy expression on the face of Mary's lover, "you do not seem so overjoyed at finding me alone as I could have hoped—I may say could have expected. Come, you may sit beside me and I will see what can be done to cheer you."

"May I? Thanks," said Sir Charles, seating himself at the extreme end of the sofa from Edith.

"Are you quite comfortable?" asked Edith, moving closer to him.

"I? Oh yes."

"I am glad of that, as I want to ask you a favour. Charles, dear Charles, will you grant it to me?"

"You have a right to demand it."

"I want to see my lover at my feet. You see it's only recently that I have had one, and I have a right to expect he will go through the orthodox phases of sweetheating, have I not?"

"But," said Sir Charles, looking with no amiable expression at the stool which the young lady had pushed with her foot in front of her, and then glancing at the half-open door of the conservatory, "there is someone in there."

"Oh, never mind them; you are engaged. Come, sir, do as I tell you."

It really seemed to Sir Charles more undignified to wrangle about such an absurdity than to do it, so he chose what he considered the lesser evil and seated himself on the footstool.

"Really, Charles," rebuked Edith, "you look more as if you were sitting on a stool of repentance than on what an ardent lover's imagination should turn into a bank of rose-leaves. But tell me, sir, what have you been doing all the morning that I have seen nothing of you?"

"Talking over some business matters with Mr. Pennington."

"Business, of course—the usual excuse. Where is papa?"

"I left him with Colonel Gordon."

"Papa seems very fond of his society."

"I think papa is not the only one of your family who has felt the influence of his attractions."

"Capital! You're jealous, I declare; just as a lover ought to be. It's the more refreshing as it's the first lover's speech you've made. Come, what do you say to a stroll on the terrace? It's a lovely day, and the open air may inspire you further still."

"As you will," said Charles, rising, and only too glad to get up from what he considered a ridiculous position.

"Or shall I send Mary to you to act as my deputy? Perhaps then you will be able to exhibit a little more enthusiasm."

"I understand your taunt, Miss Pennington."

"Edith, if you please," she said, interrupting him.

"And," he continued, heedless of her suggestion, "it would be as well, I think, if we both tried to forget the past."

"Am I to be bound to this heartless woman for life? To have known Edith Pennington all these years, and not to have discovered her real character until I have bound myself to her, is too cruel," thought the young man.

"Come, come, Sir Charles, I did not bargain for your running through the whole gamut of love-making in a single morning, sir. At least you might have put off our first lovers' quarrel for a few days. It was all your fault. I'm sure I tried to be pleasant," said Edith, adding mentally, "I think we're quits now, Master Charles."

At this moment the appearance of Lady Meredith put an end to a conversation that was amusing to only one of the persons concerned in the dialogue. They were soon after joined by Mary and the colonel. Lady Meredith, by the approbative smile upon her face, showed that things were working as she had wished and planned. Her son in titte-à-tite with Edith, and Mary alone with Colonel Skooter in the conservatory. What could be more satisfactory?

The servants brought in afternoon-tea, and Lady Meredith sent one of them to inform Mr. Gordon and Mr. Pennington, who were in the library, that they were to come and join them.

"Well, what news, you two conspirators?" asked her ladyship, who was brimming over with courteous good-humour, as the two men entered the drawing-room.

"Everything seems going on well," replied Gordon. "We are simply irresistible. You see we have been fighting this battle with all the advantages of a coalition. Sir Charles is a Tory, but should his sentiments not agree with those of the particular free and independent voter we have in hand at any moment, Mr. Pennington comes to the rescue with his opinion as a Liberal-Conservative; if that doesn't do, I take up the parable as a Liberal pure and simple, for this occasion only; if we all fail, we fall back on Colonel Skooter, who is a radically democratic revolutionist. So we hope to persuade the entire constituency, should Dolby persist in standing, that it is their duty as free, enlightened, and all the rest of it voters, to plump for Sir Charles."

"I'm sure after that burst of eloquence Mr. Gordon must want some tea," said Lady Meredith, handing him a cup with her sweetest of smiles.

Gordon, after taking his tea from Lady Meredith, retreated with it to the sofa where Edith was seated; Sir Charles having left his supposed fiancée and joined his mother at the tea-table.

"Upon my word, Mr. Gordon," said Edith, sotto voce, "if Lady Meredith were not your mother-in-law, you might have effected an alliance, and entered into your rights unopposed."

"Nay, there would still have been an obstacle."

"Indeed, what?"

"Cannot you guess?"

"I am not good at guessing."

"And yet the obstacle is close at hand."

"To whom?"

"To me," said Sir Charles, taking Edith's hand, unperceived by anyone but themselves, and giving it a lover-like squeeze. "You can guess now?"

"You seem in high spirits since your return."

"Do I? I suppose it's because I've made up my mind to bring matters to a crisis, and confront my stepmother. Whilst in town I wrote her that I, 'Tom Meredith,' had put the matter in my lawyer's hands, and intended coming to Meredith Court to claim my rights. Given the opportunity, I fancy she will confide the whole business to me as Gordon."

"She seems on the best of terms with you."

"Does she not? See, she is coming to join us. Will you, Edith, after a minute or two of conversation, contrive to leave us alone? What are you smiling at?"

"Only at a coincidence. A few minutes ago, I made a request to poor Mary to leave me alone with Sir Charles. You should have seen the face she made over it! I don't believe she has so thoroughly distorted her pretty features since her jam and powder days."

"And are you going to similarly distort yours?"

"What, make a wry face about leaving for a few minutes a fish so thoroughly hooked as you are? Upon my word, sir, you are too conceited."

Nevertheless, on leaving her lover and Lady Meredith together, Edith made a little grimace behind that lady's back which Gordon thought delightful.

More serious work than love-making, however, lay before him, and Lady Meredith's first words, when Edith was out of earshot, led him to hope that his stepmother was feeling her way to see how far she might confide to him her present trouble.

"You cannot think, Mr. Gordon," she said, "what a relief it is to my mind to think that Charles's return seems so sure. It is to you we owe in great measure our favourable position. You could not have taken more interest in the affair if Charles had been your brother. To think we should have found such a friend in—pardon my calling you so—a comparative stranger."

"A comparative stranger, but a positive friend, I hope. Lady Meredith, can I not in some more important matter prove myself worthy of the title of friend? May not I claim a friend's privilege, and ask your confidence? Excuse me, but I believe you have a much greater anxiety on your mind than the election."

Lady Meredith started and looked at Gordon with some surprise; after a moment's pause she said:

"You are right, but I hesitate to tell you."

"Why?"

"It is connected with an old family secret."

"Anything to do with Sir Charles's elder brother, who—"

"What! do you know? Who has told you?" said Lady Meredith, repressing with difficulty her agitation.

"You see my canvassing work has taken me a good deal among your villagers, who, in this dull place, having no new excitement to occupy their minds, are not likely to forget when there has been a scandal, be it ever so old, or be they ever so ignorant of its details."

"You are right, and I ought not to be surprised at your having heard that something unpleasant happened to cause my unhappy stepson's departure, ending, poor fellow, in his death. It was a sad business altogether."

"Very sad," assented Gordon.

"The rumour of it somehow reached the ears of an adventurer, who, seeking to take advantage of his knowledge, had the impudence to write, stating that he was no other than the Thomas Meredith who had been reported dead."

"A statement which you refuted?"

"Of course; but I have again heard from the villain, who threatens to place the matter in a lawyer's hands."

"But the writing? Of course you know Mr. Thomas Meredith's?"

"There is a resemblance between his and this impostor's. Probably the fellow got hold of some letter or document of my late stepson's. You know that similitude in writing often puzzles the cleverest experts."

"That is true, but if you have any handwriting of Mr. Thomas Meredith's—by the way, if he were living he would be Sir Thomas Meredith, would he not?—I should like to see and compare it with that of the man you deem an impostor."

"Deem! Who is one. Yes, I have several papers, drawn and signed by the unfortunate young man, and if this evening, Mr. Gordon, you will come into my private sitting-room, you shall see them. Candidly, though, I do not think the comparing them with those I have recently received will help us. I am sure they are not in the same hand. Excuse me now; it is time I dressed for dinner."

"What news?" asked Edith, as a few moments later she and Gordon passed each other on the staircase.

"I hardly know yet," he said; "but within the next few hours I shall probably hold in my hand the document which has gone nigh to shatter my past prospects, and upon which all the brightness of my future depends."

"Not all, dear," said Edith, who was standing a stair lower than he was, looking up with a bright smile into his face. "No, come what will, not all. Promise me you will not let it do that."

"I accept the sacrifice," he replied, bending down and kissing her.

At that moment Lady Meredith was debating whether she should so far trust her new friend and apparent ally as to tell him the story of the alteration of the cheque, and by placing it in his hands and giving him ocular proof of her stepson's lack of principle, enlist him on her side, even should that stepson arise as one from the grave to claim what her boy was enjoying.

A Word of Comfort.

THE shadows of the autumn gather slowly round and o'er us,

The wind goes sighing sadly down the avenue of pines,

The western sky glows redly through the barren boughs before us,

And flings their swaying shadows down in long fantastic lines.

Athwart the river, dull and grey, a single sunbeam glitters,

Where once a thousand golden shafts flashed downwards far and nigh;

Within the woodland, bleak and bare, a single songbird twitters,

Where once a thousand carols rose in gladness to the sky.

The scene without, our hearts within, alike are sad and cheerless;

A sorrow born of parting casts a shadow o'er our lives,

And all the happy dreams and hopes we cherished, frank and fearless,

By adverse fates are swept away, till one alone survives—

A single sunbeam, when the day is darkening, dull and dreary;

A single strain of music, when all else is hushed and dumb;

A voice that whispers ever, "Though the winter may be weary,

Be patient, working, waiting, and the happy spring shall come.

"Be brave, dear heart, for, as we speak, the darker hours are fleeting,

And smaller grows the space between with each recurring chime,

And bitter though the parting now, yet sweet will be the meeting.

No need to count the moments then, nor watch the flight of time.

Let life and love, let troth and trust, outlast the stormy weather;

Again the woods shall verdant be, again the birds shall sing,

And you and I, in faith and hope, will link our fate together,

Forgetting winter's sadness in the sunny smile of spring."

Arnold.

(A STORY IN FOUR WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER VII.

I HAD not wanted more proof, but more was given me. I had remained at home all one morning, intending to go down to the office immediately after luncheon, while my wife was about to proceed on one of her visits to Langside. We left the house together, there being no excuse for going separately, and as it was not a yard out of my way, I could not but see her safely into the car.

I suppose I loved her even at that time, though my mad passion of jealousy had made me unconscious of any feeling but burning hatred towards her, and him, and all the world; and I chose a nice place for her in the corner with a lady on her left hand, where she would be safe from the many annoyances and unpleasantnesses of public conveyances.

I turned away after seeing her settled, without a parting look or word, such as we should have exchanged but how short a time ago! and was turning into Buchanan Street, when, just as I had done a month before at St. Enoch's Station, I ran full tilt against Arnold! He was looking bright and eager, and was coming along with such an impetus that the violence of a collision nearly lost both of us our footing. Again we apologised. I saw that he recognised me, for he smiled in some surprise, and would have said more, but for the fierce scowl with which I returned his regards. If I had had a pistol in my pocket I must have shot him then like a dog!

He passed on, but unknown to him I turned and watched him as, conspicuous amid the common crowd, he ran out eagerly into the road. I understood then the reason of his haste. He had just lost a car! Then a meeting had been arranged on pretence of a visit to Langside! Oh, how my false wife must have congratulated herself on his failure to appear on this occasion when I had accompanied her! And she had seemed so calm and unconcerned! It was no longer a shadow that stood between us, but a reality—a fearful, terrible reality!

I stood still, and followed his movements with vengeful eyes. Glasgow abounds in trams; there was a line of cars, five in number, running slowly along the line one after another; the one in which Dickie was had gone on, and was beyond pursuit. He gave up the idea, if he had really entertained it, and began to look out for the next, examining each eagerly and hurriedly as it rolled by.

I looked at the printed names as eagerly as he did. It all depended upon that, in my mind. If he took a Cross Hill car I would follow him and wreak vengeance without mercy—the righteous vengeance of a wronged husband—upon his head; if he took another I would try to believe his appearance at that moment accidental, and would wait for further proof before I acted.

I thought myself very merciful and reasonable as I stood on the kerb with the crowd. My lips were dry and burning, my eyes strained to agony, my teeth and hands clenched. The people near looked at me curiously; I was vaguely conscious of their wondering glances, but I heeded them not. All my attention was concentrated upon the young, tall, handsome man who stood out in the road heedless, in his anxiety, of the danger from the throngs of carriages and carts which were continually passing.

He stood close by the rails. The first car turned to the left, down Buchanan Street, rounding the corner where I stood. The next was for Jamaica Street, and would turn off to the right a few blocks farther on; he let that pass also. The third was another Buchanan Street car.

The fourth had "Cross Hill" painted on the front in rather small but very distinct black letters. I had read it long before it came near, and watched it and him in breathless suspense. It came on, its speed accelerating as those in front cleared off, the fifth and last close behind. He looked up at it—the Cross Hill car—seeming to study the names printed in a row upon it, and then leaped on to its platform—or rather attempted to do so, for he seemed to miss the step or to lose his balance. Whatever it was, he fell, and lay with his head on the line, under the very hoofs, as it seemed, of the horses of the advancing car, which was coming on now at a brisk trot, and was quite unable to stop at a moment's notice. The driver did all he could; the horses strove with all their power to obey; but the rolling weight behind them could not be stayed, it forced them onwards like a monster demanding sacrifice.

It took but a moment for all this to happen, and but a moment for me to think a thousand thoughts, change my mind a dozen times over, and make as many resolutions. In that second of time, when eternity was so near my enemy, whom I hated with such deadly hate, I was seized with a sudden impulse of mercy. I saw things in another light. I saw how admirable and loveable this man must be in the eyes of a woman—though I had always seen that. I saw how cruel was the accident, or rather, the deliberate malice, that had separated them—how untoward the circumstances their meeting after it was too late; and I could excuse her, in her youth and disappointment, of the imprudence she had committed in allowing him to see her again. She loved him, doubtless, as he loved her, and could they help that? Whether they could or not, whether they ought or not, did not matter to me—I did not trouble myself with the rights and wrongs of the question; one idea had seized my whirling brain—to get rid of my miserable life, which surely was the heaviest burden that ever man carried, and in losing it to save him—for her.

After all, through it all, I loved her—I knew it then—with all the absorbed and passionate love of my nature. If by one prompt action I could rid her of myself and give her her loved one again I would do it and be thankful. She would always remember me kindly then—she would never forget that I ended my life in giving her back her beloved from the very clutches of death.

So with the mingled idea of saving life and destroying it, I plunged through the concourse of carts, and carriages, and people, seized upon that prostrate dark head that lay still, as if stunned, in such imminent danger, heard the shouts of the crowd and felt a sharp blow upon my forehead, and then, falling back, thought that I died.

I did not know how long a time had elapsed when I opened my eyes and found myself lying in bed in my room at home. I was quite alone; no anxious watcher hung over my pillow, listening for my first faint breath as I returned to consciousness. Even my mother had deserted me.

My first sensation was one of intense surprise at finding myself still in the land of the living; my next, keen disappointment that I had not died. I had meant to die. I had meant to commit that great crime of suicide as surely as I had meant to save the life of another; and I had not hoped to palliate the one act by the other. But I had felt that in no world could I meet and endure more misery than had fallen to my lot in this one, and so I had recked little of the hereafter.

Nor did I think now of what I had escaped as my eyes wandered hopelessly about the room, resting upon the familiar articles of furniture and some little knick-knacks of Dickie's. Where was she? Where was he? Had they left me carelessly to live or die alone? or did they think me already dead? But no, there was no cold winding-sheet, no formal arrangement of the room; it was rather untidy, indeed, and looked as though some hurry or agitation of the domestic atmosphere had disturbed its wonted tasteful orderliness. A bright red fire, too, burnt cheerily in the grate, with fresh coals on the top evidently just put on, while I lay in a warm nest of blankets and down quilts. It must be a bitterly cold day, for I could see, through one half-open Venetian blind, the frozen snow clinging round the window-panes through which the chilly wintry sunshine entered and lay in a barred patch upon the carpet; but in my cosy room the atmosphere was that of summer. No, they knew I was not dead, and yet they had left me thus.

Well, what did it matter? I tried to reason with myself. I did not wish her to come crying and pretending to rejoice over me when I knew that her heart belonged to him. And then another thought struck me: perhaps I had not succeeded in one purpose any more than in the other; perhaps he was mortally injured, and she had gone to take his dying farewell; perhaps he was already dead, and she was looking her last upon him.

The uncertainty about everything and everybody became unbearable. I turned restlessly upon my pillows, wishing that my mother would come, or old Janet, or anybody, and in so doing I became aware that my head was bound up. I remembered the blow upon my forehead then, and wondered to feel so well as I did; and then, while my hand was wandering over the bandages, I suddenly became conscious of a voice speaking in the next room—his voice, that deep pleasant voice, which was as the sound of my doom in my ears!

I thought my wound must have affected my brain; at first I could not, would not, believe that he could be here, in my house. She could not have brought him here; he could not have come! But after listening intently I knew that I had made no mistake; it was that voice and no other—softer and more subdued than I had before heard it—but his. He had come here to see if I was dead yet, had he? Oh, how the fierce blood leaped in my veins at the thought! And they were talking together while I lay here helpless—for all they knew, dying. I knew that he was holding a conversation with somebody, for sometimes his tones were questioning, and sometimes consoling and reassuring, with long pauses between. I could not hear a sound of any other voice, therefore, I argued, his companion must be a woman; I should have heard the deep tones of a man. Had the knowledge of it all reached my mother, and had it killed her, that she did not come to her son in his need?

The room in which they were, the next one to mine, was a sort of little study, or "den," much used by me, where I kept my papers and many of my books, and where I smoked my pipe often, until lately, in the sweet company of my Dickybird. A second door opened into it from my room, so that it could be reached from thence without going out into the lobby. Of late it had been a place of refuge from the sight of the sweet changing face upon which I could not bear to look, from the soft voice that was never raised now in joyous song, yet whose lowest tones jarred unbearably upon my overstrung nerves. How dared she bring him to that room—that room of fond and sacred memories to me at any rate—how could she, even if she dared? Oh, how she must be changed from the sweet ingenuous girl—almost child—who had been placed in my charge but nine months since! But now he should have no mercy at my hands; I would show that I was yet able to take my just and terrible revenge!

And with that dread thought I essayed to rise from my bed. My head swam, but I managed to get across the room to the water-bottle, and after drinking a little I felt better. I longed for some wine or spirits to steady my shaking hand, but to call for that would be to frustrate the purpose upon which all my powers of mind and body had suddenly become intent. With great difficulty, and fingers trembling from weakness and excitement, I dressed myself in the clothes that I found on a chair near the bed—the same, evidently, which had been taken off me I could not tell how long since. I made as little noise as possible, for fear of disturbing the two so intent upon each other in the next room. Only the coat was missing, and looking round for it, I saw it, thrown hastily into a corner of the room, and stained with blood. His blood or mine? I wondered as I surveyed it. But he had evidently escaped without serious injury.

I did not dare stoop to pick it up, lest I should bring on the swimming in my head again. I took instead the old velvet shooting-coat that I was in the habit of wearing about the house, and then I unlocked my private drawer, and took from a case a tiny shining pistol that had many a time saved my life during my ramblings in far countries, examined it to see that it was loaded, and then concealing it, together with the hand that held it, in the side-pocket of my coat, I advanced towards the door of communication between the two rooms. The fierce and vindictive jealousy of an Oriental possessed my soul in that moment—the deadliest, most murderous hatred that a human being, not actually a demon, could feel. I have already said that a warmer strain was mingled with my English blood, and the passions that beset me were far fiercer than those which belong to our cool northern isle—the fiery tides that coursed through my veins were nourished in warmer Eastern climes; their heat and fury nerved my weak hand as I stepped forward, cursing the day which gave me my wife.

I opened the door and walked straight into the room, my gait unflinching now. As I expected, he stood there—that other Arnold—upon the rug in front of the fireplace. He held a woman in his arms; she was crying softly with her head upon his breast, and he was in the act of caressing and consoling her. But that woman was not my wife. That bright golden hair did not belong to my wife—no, nor the strikingly beautiful face and blue eyes that were turned quickly to my view upon my entrance. The young handsome woman, exquisitely dressed—I heard afterwards that she was Scotch, but she had a great deal more the appearance of a Frenchwoman—who faced me in astonishment and alarm, uttering a little scream, and then ran towards me, was a perfect stranger to me.

"Oh, Mr. Challenge," she cried, appearing to know me well enough, though I did not know her, "however did you come here? Do go back, you will hurt yourself."

I stood still and stared at her. I had withdrawn my hand from my pocket to be ready for aim, and amid all my bewilderment I was intensely conscious of that little, shining, deadly thing in my grasp.

He came forward then, and I saw him glance at it, half-concealed, in my hand.

"Do allow me to help you back to your room, Mr. Challenge?" he said in his hearty yet refined tones. "You have received a wound on your head, and will become feverish if you take cold."

"Who is that lady?" I demanded of him briefly.

"My wife, who will bear you everlasting gratitude that this day has not found her a widow."

His wife! Such a thing had not entered into my calculations.

"And you?"

"Arnold de Rosny, who will never be able to thank you enough for having preserved him to all whom he loves."

"All whom you love?" I repeated slowly after him.

"Yes, only two, my wife and baby girl, but they are all the world to me. Mr. Challenge, I am your friend and servant for life, if you will allow me. Your noble rescue of me at the imminent risk of your own life has called forth admiration from all who witnessed it, but of our feelings"—here he cast a tender glance at the woman by his side, a glance that softened indescribably the whole haughty cast of his face—"I cannot adequately speak."

I saw that there was some mistake, though yet I knew not where; I saw that I had been wrong in my suspicions, though the truth was yet hidden from me. I grasped the tiny pistol firmer in my hand, striving to cover every inch of its shining barrel, striving to keep them from guessing what mean ignoble thoughts I had had of my wife, and how I had intended to revenge myself, though all the while I knew that he, at any rate, had seen it already.

"Let me help you back to your room," he began again anxiously.

I perceived that he thought the blow I had received had temporarily affected my brain; and I think now that perhaps it really had. The wound was bleeding afresh—my movement had brought it on—and the blood kept dropping down upon my eyes and blinding me, and I kept wiping it away with my other hand. I must have been a ghastly sight.

"Not till he has received a wife's sincere and heartfelt thanks for her husband's life!" cried the lady impetuously and rather hysterically.

"Darling, do be calm. You will excite him and do him harm. Speak to him another time," remonstrated De Rosny.

Just as he approached me and took my arm, the hand of which I still clutched that terrible deadly thing of which I was now so miserably ashamed, the door opened, and my mother entered, half-supporting my Dickie, who, looking so pallid and ill that her appearance struck me with horror, put out her hands towards me.

"Arnold!" she exclaimed, "Arnold!"

And I could not think that her call was for him—that other Arnold. Her look, loving, anguished, startled, was for me; her hands were stretched towards me. In the new light that had dawned upon me I seemed to see things as they were, not as my distorted imagination represented them to be.

But I was not worthy to touch those hands stretched out to me—those dear hands which had performed so many little acts of loving service for me, which had caressed me in happier days, and pleaded dumbly with me in these latter ones of distrust and misery, and which I had repulsed so cruelly! No! I went over to her and knelt at her feet, and prostrated my head to the hem of her gown. Could I ever make sufficient atonement?

And there at her feet, the world faded away, and again I thought that death had come to me.

CHAPTER VIII.

UPON my recovery I heard one part of the story from my mother and the rest from my wife.

I had been brought home in a cab, senseless, by a strange gentleman whose life I had saved from under the horses' feet—so my mother told me, while Dickie lay sleeping on the sofa, worn out with her late watching and nursing—and had remained in that state all night, and until nine o'clock on the following morning. The stranger, Mr. de Rosny, had been very anxious about me, and would have stayed to watch if they would have allowed it, but they preferred to sit up themselves, Dickie having been immediately sent for from Langside. He had come early the next morning, accompanied by his wife, to see me, if possible, and had been hastily shown into the little room, one of whose doors opened on that in which I lay, still unconscious.

The fatigue of watching, together with the sudden shock and the suspense that followed, had become too much for Dickie, who had fainted away at last as she stood by my bed, and it was just when my mother and old Janet had left me for a moment to carry her away into the former's room that I roused up. It was some time before she recovered. They feared, from her appearance, that she was going to be very ill. When my mother left her to come back to me, she was so horrified to find the bed empty, its still pale occupant gone, that she gave an involuntary cry of fear, which brought Dickie to her side in a moment. Then, hearing voices, they went in at the half-open door, and found me with Mr. and Mrs. de Rosny.

"Mr. de Rosny seemed to think that your mind was a little confused after the blow," my mother said. "Your head bled violently again, and we had to send for Dr. Little at once. He said that your moving had trebled the danger of fever, but, after all, it kept off. I can hardly believe that it is only four days since it all happened."

I knew what had kept the fever off—what had snapped that tight burning band round my forehead, which had seemed to grow tighter and hotter every day for the last six weeks. Nothing else could have done it—I knew that. My brain had been consumed with raging fire until I saw my enemy—my intended victim—holding his own wife in his arms, kissing her lips—not another's; consoling her—not taking advantage of my helplessness to linger with my wife.

The sight had been to me like cold water suddenly thrown upon raging flames.

"It is a strange thing," my mother continued, "but do you know these De Rosnys are both old friends of Dickie's? She knew them before they were regularly engaged, though there had been an understanding between them long before. She stayed with Mrs. de Rosny when she was Miss Urquhart, and there met Mr. de Rosny. The marriage was not spoken of at the time, though it was already a settled thing, and now they have been married more than a year."

"It does seem strange," I responded; but I could have told my informant a slightly different story about the arrangement of that match.

Miss Urquhart was, without doubt, the girl who had been forced upon the young man against his will. He seemed very well satisfied now, however.

"Mrs. de Rosny is a Scotchwoman, and has relatives in Edinburgh and Glasgow, as well as somewhere down the Clyde—Dumbarton, I think. They spent three months in Edinburgh, as her health required bracing after the birth of their little girl, and have been here since the new year. They are going home in a day or two now, to avoid the March east winds. I wonder Dickie never met them and where—don't you? It would have been a pleasant surprise for her, and would have cheered her up."

"Do you think she has required cheering, then?"

"Well," consideringly, "I know what her answer would be to such a question—that she wanted nobody but you and me, and was perfectly happy with us; but yet I have fancied lately that she has been a little quiet and low-spirited—the winter weather, no doubt."

I knew, by my mother's manner, that she was putting forth her sentiments in the mildest form possible: I knew, too, that the keen breath of winter had only given my Dickybird new life and strength, until my cruelty had descended upon her like a scorching blight.

"Mrs. de Rosny is quite a girl, and so lovely," my mother remarked, and it was with difficulty that I refrained from answering:

"Yes, Dickie told me she was."

But the sight of the black rings round the eyes of my sleeping wife caused me to reproach myself anew. I had to see my old rival, De Rosny; he was so anxious about me, so full of concern, that it would have been churlish to refuse, and I bore him and his inevitable gratitude as well as I could, though I would rather have suffered instead half-a-dozen such injuries as mine.

"I know who he is," I had whispered to my wife, just before he came into the room, and there was no surprise in the sad and wistful look with which she answered me.

"I guessed that you knew," was all she said.

I liked him immensely—he was the sort of man that no one could help liking—and admired him even more; but I was glad he was going away. The thought that he had once been her lover was not pleasant to me, and he could hardly have forgotten it, though he had consoled himself so quickly. Not that I distrusted him now, but no one could ever quite forget a girl like Dickie—of that I felt sure.

Before leaving, he gave us a warm invitation to Normandy, where his mother's estates, which on his marriage she had made over to him, were situated, and where they intended to pass the summer, and probably the greater part of their lives.

Directly he was gone, I turned to Dickie and asked her what had become of the pistol—stumbling ashamedly over the word—that I had had in my hand when I fainted away.

"Oh, do you remember that?" she answered, with a look of disappointment, almost of apprehension.

"As well as I remember De Rosny being here five minutes ago. Did it do any mischief?"

"No; Mr. de Rosny took it out of your hand. Nobody saw it except he and I."

She was kneeling beside my easy-chair, my hand clasped in hers. Now she drooped her face low, out of my sight.

"Did you guess what I was going to do?" I asked in a shamed whisper.

"The thought did flash upon my mind," she said. "The sight of the pistol made me think that you must know or guess something. I knew that you had thought a great deal about him at one time, and so, if you knew that I had seen him lately—if you had found out who he was, the sight of that—that thing, seemed to give me the clue to it all. Oh, Arnold, what must you think of me for concealing it from you! But I did it with the best of intentions, dear."

"I am sure you did."

"Mr. de Rosny took it for granted that you were not in your right mind, and I was very glad to take his view of it. He said you looked frenzied when you entered the room, and that you evidently meant mischief. He saw it in your hand directly, and was in terror for his wife, not dreaming, of course, of your having any particular object; that was only my idea, which, equally of course, I kept to myself. After you had been put into bed again, and had fallen asleep, he showed it to me, and asked me if I knew where it was kept. But I had never seen it before. I did not know you had such a thing in your possession. However, the key was left in the little drawer that you always keep locked up, so he looked there, and found the case, with another in it. He put it back in its place, and locked the drawer, and returned me the key. He wanted neither you or anybody else to know anything about the—the—its having been found in your hand, for your own sake; and he thought that if, when you were recovered, you found the drawer just as usual, you would never remember anything."

"He was very kind to try to save me pain," I said, "but it is beyond his power, Dickie, and yours too. I knew what I was about well enough. Perhaps no man furious with jealousy is perfectly sane, but I was quite sufficiently so to bear the responsibility of my own actions."

And there and then I told her the whole miserable story, and she listened in such self-reproach and deep grief for my sufferings as made my heart ache to see. She did not seem to think of herself at all—of how I had injured her. Nothing of that entered into her unselfish heart, all her pity was for me—all her sorrow for what I had endured—all her reproaches for herself. Knowing her tenderness and generosity, I had dared to hope for pardon from her, and here she was pleading, instead, for pardon from me!

"I did it for the best," she told me, "though now I see I was wrong in keeping anything from you. It made me miserable directly, but after keeping it secret at first it seemed impossible to speak later on. I thought it would disturb you to know that I had seen him—you would be fancying that I was grieving over his marriage or mine; and as I never thought to see him again, it seemed not worth while to mention it. He did not know then that they were coming on to Glasgow, and had he known it he would not have thought to tell me, for I did not tell him we lived here. We did not say much to one another upon any subject, for our chat only lasted about ten minutes. I met him just as I was turning into the close. We were so surprised, and still more so when we discovered that the one had been as easily consoled as the other. We had a hearty laugh over our faithlessness."

And this while I had been tormenting myself with every vain and jealous thought possible!

"I heard you call him 'Arnold,'" I said, in self-excuse, "and you spoke so softly that I imagined you speaking to him like that two years before, when you were free to love one another. I think that our having the same name has made it worse for me all along. I often thought that, just as you had liked my name for his sake, so perhaps you had loved me because it was mine as well as his, for the memory, the associations, connected with it; and so, when—"

"Oh, Arnold, you goose!" she broke in, speaking in such a way that the words sounded like the softest of endearments. "Perhaps I did like the name for his sake, just at first, when I was a silly child, and thought I could never forget a man who had flattered me, and made a little love to me; but I soon forgot all about that, I soon learnt to love that name—not like it—for a dearer reason than that, Arnold. Scold me as much as ever you will for concealing all this from you," she went on, "though, indeed, dear, I did it thinking only of you."

"I know it, my love," I answered. "And how can I blame you for doing the best you knew how for me, when I have so entirely misjudged you—when I have thus given way to my evil impulses?"

"Don't think about it. You were not well. The knowledge which I thought concealed, preyed upon you until it warped your judgment and embittered your temper. You were not yourself, Arnold, say what you will. I saw that you were changed, but how little did I guess the cause."

She paused. I yearned to kiss her, as I had done many times in the course of her sweet consolations; but I did not, I was too deeply ashamed.

"What I cannot understand," I said presently, "is the speediness with which he consoled himself." She laughed. "Do you know how it came about? Did he tell you anything?"

"No; I heard nothing. It must have been only a fancy of his about me, and I was very young, and felt flattered, and so, no doubt, made a great deal more of it. There is no doubt that he is passionately fond of his wife, and, indeed, she is a very nice girl away from her mother; and so lovely, too—enough to make anyone love her. But I was disappointed in him—I thought he was nicer. I suppose it was after being used to you," naively.

"Why, Dickie, what made my jealousy a thousand times more bitter, was the thought of how I must appear in your eyes by the side of such a man as that. I did not wonder, when I saw him, that you had cared for him. If I were a girl I think I should have chosen him from the rest of the world. And you must forgive me, my love, for thinking that such a man as he was not easily forgotten."

"Oh, he is very fine and handsome—I don't deny it," she replied with a little toss of her pretty head. "And when I was a girl—we both laughed at that—"I suppose I was fascinated. Yes, I remembered him until I saw you. But he hasn't got your ways, Arnold—your dear, kind, gentle ways—nor your talk, nor your beautiful, fierce, sad eyes; and oh, I didn't admire him at all after you!"

What could I say to such an earnest flatterer, who believed so utterly every word that she said? I could say nothing; I could only stroke her down-bent head, and summon up courage at last to kiss the only bit of her within reach of my lips—the tip of her delicate pink ear.

"I do not wonder that you thought me deceitful," she went on to say presently. "It must have seemed very strange to see us meet again here after meeting in Edinburgh. But that time, when you saw him saying good-bye to me, was the only time we ever met here; and as to his getting into the Cross Hill car, I am able to tell you that he must have meant to take a Jamaica Street car, for when he was explaining to us how it all happened, he mentioned that at the time he was going down to the docks in a great hurry, and being near-sighted, had great trouble in finding out which was the right one, especially as he did not know his way about Glasgow. He said that had it not been for his uncertainty and consequent flurry, he thought he should not have missed the step. And we know that a Cross Hill car will not take us to the docks."

"There! you see I was wrong altogether."

"Never mind, dear," she said, looking lovingly into my remorseful eyes. "The evidence was enough to mislead anybody, and no one knows but I."

I pressed my lips gratefully to her dear hand.

"Do not be too hard upon yourself," she went on. "In spite of all, you have acted nobly. You were mad with rage and jealousy, and you thought you had good reason—and yet you saved him. Never mind the rest"—stopping me as I essayed to speak—"I don't think of that; this one act, in my eyes, covers all else."

"In your kind eyes," I returned sadly; "but how about those of Another? Merciful though you are, my Dickie, there is another judgment than yours, before which I must stand, and before which your sweet pleading cannot avail me."

"And do you think that will be a less kind, a less merciful judgment than mine?" she said in her sweet way. "I am only a weak and faulty human being like yourself, Arnold. I can feel jealousy and hate, even as you; but yet I can take circumstances into account, and make allowances, and forgive all. And do you think He will do less?"

"Why, all the souls that were were forfeit once,
When He that might the vantage best have took,
Found out the remedy. How would you be
If He which is the top of judgment should But judge you as you are?"

I quoted dreamily.

"There," said my wife, nodding her head, "you see you knew all about it without asking me. Let us say good-bye to the last few weeks, Arnold, and always trust in each other's love—shall we not?"

And our lips met in a long kiss of reunion.

Six months later the dear old mother died, holding our hands and blessing us, and was laid to rest on one of the loftiest breeze-swept ridges of the beautiful Necropolis. We could hardly mourn her, so glad was she to go, full of years as she was, and wearying for her rest. Her death seemed to break up many of the ties and associations that had bound us to Scotland, and when Miles proposed that we should go and live near him—not joining him at his unhealthy post; that would not do on my Dickie's account—but settling not far off, on the Mediterranean shore, where he will retire when work has lost its charm for him, or his health gives way, we with one accord agreed.

And so there Dickie dwells, in the fairyland which I once described to her, and which she declared would not be fairyland without me. I love to think now of her quick-growing affection for me while I stood to her but in the relation of a parent; it shows that our deep mutual love is more than mere passion—a love arising from kinship of natures—it supports my favourite theory of twin-souls.

As I sit writing at the window the low wash of the waves sounds in my ears; whenever I glance up I see the blue waters of the Mediterranean heaving and sparkling in the sunshine, and breaking softly upon the yellow beach like a huge jewel set in gold. I am better and younger now than when we lived in Scotland. The climate suits me, and my life is so calm and happy that under such circumstances it would be a wonder, indeed, if my health did not improve.

There is only one thing wanted to complete the picture—that is, my wife. And now she comes into the room and up to my side, and my happiness, as well as the picture, is made complete. She tells me that I grow younger and handsomer every day, while I am quite sure that I am the owner of the most beautiful wife in the world, not even excepting Arnold de Rosny.

And as we are so entirely satisfied one with another, there remains no more to tell, since when husband and wife perfectly agree, they cease to be interesting to any beside themselves.

Mrs. De Vere Appears in Public.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

It might be said of old Sam Sladger, as it was said of another, that his counting-house was his temple, his desk was his altar, his ledger was his Bible, and his money was his God.

What old Sam loved next best after his money was, to use his own expression, a "nob"—a lord, or a somebody of any sort, titled for choice. Next to a "nob," he loved his only child, his daughter Julia.

It was not a little hard to realise that Julia was his daughter, or even that she bore the unromantic name of Sladger. She was beautiful, well-bred, and accomplished, was sweetly winning in manner, and was considered by her admirers, who were many, to be an "all round a winner," a phrase which appeared to them to happily sum up all her varied attractions, personal and mental.

Old Sam had determined that Julia should wed his friend, Mr. Alderman Chozzle, who was worth a mint of money, and would be Lord Mayor at no distant day. It was an excellent match from every point of view except one—Julia's. Julia would have nothing whatever to do with Chozzle, much less would she marry him. The matter was often debated between father and daughter, if that can be called a debate which was all command and loud-voiced argument on the one side, and all tears and silent obstinacy on the other.

Had Chozzle had no favoured rival in the field it is possible the poor girl might have been bullied into accepting him; marrying him, after the manner of the Irish lady, for the sake of peace and quietness.

But there was a rival in the field. He was an artist. He was very poor. He was a complete failure in his profession. He was exceedingly romantic, and his name was Vandeleur de Vere.

Anyone must see at once that these were quite good and sufficient reasons for any young woman falling in love with him. At any rate, they were quite sufficient for Julia. She thought Vandeleur was like a Greek god, which he wasn't; and that he had "latent genius," which he hadn't; or which, if he had, remained latent for the term of his natural life.

At last Chozzle became too much for Julia, even though she wasn't married to him. Her life seemed all Chozzle. Her father served him up, at breakfast, at dinner, and between meals. At last this incessant Chozzle diet, as it may be called, became unbearable. So Julia went out one fine morning and married Vandeleur de Vere, according to a prearranged plan.

Now, if there was one man old Sam objected to more strongly than another, it was Vandeleur de Vere. He branded him, with fine scorn, as "one of them good-for-nothing ascetic fellows"—by which he was understood to mean the great æsthetic brotherhood in general. When, therefore, he received a letter from his daughter, putting him in possession of the state of affairs, imploring forgiveness for herself and "my darling Van," the old man's feelings may, to use an altogether novel phrase, be better imagined than described.

In their lodgings, in a back-street in Camden Town, Mr. and Mrs. Vandeleur de Vere awaited the outraged parent's reply with a good deal of anxiety. They did not expect that he would "come round" all at once—that would have been too much; but they did hope that he would, after his first fit of passion, accept the inevitable, and his son-in-law. But they were soon undeceived—not quite so soon, however, as might have been supposed, for two days elapsed before a letter made its appearance, bearing on the cover the stiff, awkward writing of Samuel Sladger. When it did come, the young couple found it very brief and to the point. It was addressed to Mrs. V. de Vere, and ran as follows:

"MADAM,

"Your favour of 4th instant to hand, and contents noted. As you have made your bed, so must you and your vagabond husband lie. You have not broken my heart by your wicked and disgraceful conduct, but you have closed it against you for ever.

"I am a man of my word; that you know well. I cast you off, I disown you as a daughter, I forbid you or your Mr. de Vere to set foot in my house under any pretence whatever, and I tell you now, once for all, that you shall never have even one penny piece, or the value of it, from me. It will be quite useless to write to me, as all your letters will be returned unopened.

"SAMUEL SLADGER."

Writing to the obdurate old man under these circumstances was certainly a forlorn hope, but the young people did write—more than once, and each time the letter was duly returned unopened, and, it may be added, with the return postage unpaid.

To do Julia and her husband justice, they bore up under their misfortunes pluckily. Van painted pictures by the perch, the rood, the acre, but they would not sell. By the time all Julia's trinkets had been turned into money, and actual starvation was staring the young couple in the face—for dealers and art-shopkeepers wouldn't even look at poor Van's productions now—the landlady, who was getting anxious about the rent, which was rapidly falling in arrears, volunteered this—to Julia—mysterious piece of advice.

"If you can't sell 'em," and she indicated the blushing canvases, "why not spout 'em?"

"I—I beg your pardon, I don't quite understand," replied Julia, looking a good deal bewildered.

The landlady, in a tone of ill-concealed pity for her lodger's ignorance, explained that "spouting" the pictures meant pledging them at a pawnbroker's for whatever he could be induced to lend upon them.

Julia shrank from the idea at first, and Van was indignant when it was suggested that he should pawn his works of genius just as if they were flat-irons or Sunday suits. But Julia had grown more practical of late—was beginning to come out of her shell, as the landlady said—and soon reconciled herself to the notion of obtaining small advances upon her husband's pictures.

The work of pledging was by no means a pleasant one. Only a few pawnbrokers here and there could be induced to lend anything upon Van's priceless art-treasures. And those who lent anything at all lent very, very little, grumbling that "pictures was a drug in the market," and suggesting that they were prepared to make really liberal advances upon any articles of solid commercial value, such as fenders and blankets.

In their keen struggle for life both Van and Julia became smart and artful to a degree which surprised even themselves. Van very soon got to know the sort of picture upon which most money would be lent, and was lavish in the use of his brightest colours. But to Julia must be given the credit of hitting upon the idea of Van's producing endless copies of his most popular piece—a red-cloaked maiden walking in a gamboge corn-field under a brilliant ultramarine sky. Van soon dropped into the knack of "knocking off" these masterpieces at a terrific rate. He worked upon some half-dozen at once, first putting on six brilliant skies, then calling into being six fields of waving grain, and then introducing into each the simple maiden in the excruciating scarlet cloak.

For many a week did the young people live upon the proceeds of the gaudy manufacture, but there came a time when there was scarcely a pawnbroker in London who had not in his keeping one of Van's outrages upon Nature. But it gradually became harder to part with them, or with any picture at all, and the young people were getting terribly anxious about the future.

"Van, dear," said Julia one day, for the thousandth time, "we must have money somehow. I'm getting desperate. I wish, oh, how I wish I could earn some! But what can I do? I was never taught anything useful. I can play very decently, it's true, and I can sing, that's one thing I can do really well. But where could I sing? I have never sung in public. I have no recommendations nor introductions. I shall never make anything by singing."

"I'm afraid you're right, darling," said her husband gloomily, as he clinked the few shillings remaining in his pocket. "You could never make a public appearance, unless," and here he smiled at the quaintness of the idea, "unless you made it in the public streets, like that girl we saw with a crowd round her the other night, don't you know? How delighted your amiable parent—confound him!—would be if he knew of it. Wonder what he'd do!"

Julia was always ready to laugh at a quaint conceit, even in the midst of their poverty. But she did not laugh now. She started as Van spoke, and turned quickly away from the table. Van rose also, went to his easel, began misrepresenting Nature, and in that pleasing occupation very soon forgot all about old Sladger and the cantatrice of the pavement.

All that day Julia was exceedingly quiet and thoughtful.

"Van dear," said Julia suddenly, when they had been sitting talking for some time after tea, "I'm going out."

"All right," said Van, "I'm ready. Where do you want to go?"

"Oh, not far; there are several little things to buy. I can get them quite well by myself. You needn't come."

"Needn't come! But I don't like your going out alone at night. Besides, why should you go alone?"

"For a woman's reason. Because I want to. Now don't be angry, Van. You must let me have my own way. I won't come to any hurt, I promise you."

And Van gave in, of course. But he had a fresh remonstrance to make when he saw Julia wrap herself in a faded old black shawl, and put on a bonnet which had long since seen, not only its best, but pretty nearly its worst days.

"What on earth are you putting on those wretched old things for?" he enquired. "We're poor enough, goodness knows, but you have some respectable garments left, anyhow."

"For the sake of economy. I don't care how I look about here," and with that she hurried out.

Julia walked rapidly westward, looking neither to right nor left. She feared if she proceeded slowly, or hesitated, the courage to carry out the resolution she had made might ooze away.

At last she arrived near her father's house, a handsome corner building. It was about nine o'clock, and old Sam and his guests, for he was giving a dinner-party, were in the brilliantly-lighted dining-room.

Sam Sladger had changed a good deal since his daughter's departure from home. He looked aged and haggard. He missed her sorely, and yearned to have her back with him; but he had stuck stubbornly to his determination to have nothing further to do with her.

He had found, too, to his bitter annoyance, that the opinion of nearly all his friends was that he had treated his daughter with undue harshness and severity, not to say actual cruelty. He feared that Vandeleur might be driven by poverty to resort to any shady means of getting a living that might present themselves, and he was filled with a vague terror that he might thereby find himself—the respected Sladger—involved indirectly in some scandal brought about by his son-in-law.

The old man, then, was not happy. But on this particular evening he was less unhappy than he had been for a considerable time, for among his guests was one of the "nobs" he worshipped—a lord, who had been induced to put his legs under Sladger's mahogany as a tacitly accepted payment in full of several sums his lordship had borrowed of the City man, who had never looked for any other payment than that which he was getting now.

His lordship did not contribute much towards the conversation, but whenever he did speak, his host drank in every word, said "Quite so," and "Exactly," with an air of profound conviction, and looked round the table, as if to challenge contradiction.

Sladger hoped that his noble friend would be a constant visitor.

"Well, as I was saying," remarked his lordship, continuing a conversation, "as I was telling you, there was quite a scene. Regular excitement, don't you know; everybody upset, and all that. I don't say there was anybody in particular to blame. But a scene is a thing I really cannot stand; and so, don't you know, I've never been to the house since."

There was a murmur of applause at this very spirited and aristocratic way of treating the affair, which had hardly died away when Sladger's face suddenly became ashy pale. He hurriedly drank a glass of wine, and listened with feverish eagerness, for it was something he had heard which had caused the blood to leave his cheeks. Yes, there was no mistake. Tremulous and low at first, but growing louder and clearer now, a woman's voice singing a simple ballad could be heard.

There was nothing much in that to other hearers, but there was a good deal in it to old Sladger. It was his daughter's voice. Surely he could not be mistaken. Making some trivial excuse for going to the window, he raised the blind and looked out. There, before his very doorstep, was a small crowd—one of those crowds which spring up in London as if by magic—and in the centre of it was a young woman wrapped in a faded and patched old black shawl, with a pinched and shrivelled bonnet on her head. In spite of this, it was clear from her general appearance and the timidity of her manner that she was not a woman accustomed to get her living by singing in the streets. Some in the crowd were sympathetic, others were mirthful, and others, again, merely looked on and listened, and wondered vaguely.

Old Sam knew her in a moment. He had not mistaken the voice. It was his daughter he saw before him.

He looked out at her for some moments, unable to decide how to act. He must not have a scene, and he must have his daughter. He cursed himself for having held out so long.

This sort of thing must be put a stop to, at all hazards. His daughter singing in the streets! It would certainly come to be known and talked about. The scandal would be too great.

Leaving the dining-room with as composed an air as he could assume under the circumstances, he went quietly to the hall-door, opened it, and passed out. As he did so, the song came to an end.

Stepping up to his daughter, who looked at him with steady eyes, he said aloud:

"Very well done, young woman—very well done! You must be tired. Come in and take a little refreshment!" And then, in a tone that only reached her ears: "For Heaven's sake, Julia, come into the house; stop this horrible masquerading! You'll disgrace me for ever! Don't hesitate or make a scene. I wouldn't have a scene here for anything. I—I take back all I wrote to you. I'll let bygones be bygones. I dare say your husband's a very good fellow—in his way. I'll—I'll make friends with him too. You sha'n't want for money, either of you."

And, so saying, the old man, almost crying with excitement, drew her into the house.

What passed between father and daughter then is, perhaps, hardly worth relating.

But a reconciliation must have been effected, for the young couple and the old man are now on the friendliest terms possible.

Extraordinary to relate, Sam has come to be actually fond of his son-in-law, for Vandeleur has made a name as the founder of an entirely new school of art, by his friends and admirers called the Mystic, and by his detractors the Moonstruck, and which, whatever its claims to consideration, is talked and written about a great deal, and that is the main thing, after all.

Julia says she has no secrets from her husband, but, all the same, Vandeleur has never learnt what became of his wife when she donned the old bonnet and shawl, or how it was that Sam Sladger's heart warmed so suddenly to his runaway daughter and her artistic vagabond of a husband.

The Editor's Note Book.

THE speeches at the Colston Anniversary dinners at Bristol would have been even less interesting than political after-dinner oratory is apt to be if Lord Northbrook had not taken the opportunity of announcing a considerable modification in the measure which, under the name of the Ilbert Bill, has produced an extraordinary amount of discontent and excitement among the European population of India. In fact the protests of the best-informed Anglo-Indians have at last had their due effect on an unwilling Government, and Lord Ripon's ill-advised proposal is practically abandoned.

A VERY lively dispute has been going on as to the result of the Hospital Saturday Movement, its opponents looking apparently only to the comparatively small net annual income and pronouncing the movement a failure altogether, while Lord Brabazon, in defence, takes the total amount subscribed in ten years, and pronounces the fund a success on the strength of it. I think that most people who have no interest in the matter on one side or the other will be inclined to think that the proportion of wool to cry has been lamentably small, and that the device of placing ladies in the position of beggars in the public streets has certainly not been justified by any adequate measure of success.

THE new Lord Mayor, on taking his seat on the magisterial bench at the Mansion House on the day after his installation, struck the right key-note in saying that he considered that the first thing a Lord Mayor had to think of was his position as chief magistrate of the City of London. Entertaining is no doubt a very important part of his duty, and the Mansion House Committee business has of late years become a very fertile and remunerative source of self-advertisement. It is quite time that people should be reminded that the principal reason for the continued existence of the Lord Mayor is to be found in the proper discharge of his plainest duties.

THE Lord Mayor congratulated himself, the officers of his court, and the citizens of London, on the day after his show, on the extreme lightness of the charge-sheet and on the remarkably good behaviour of the crowd throughout the day. I can only suppose that all the roughs and drunks left the City and came West early in the day. Certainly, I hardly remember so much disorderly behaviour and so many drunken people in the streets as I saw about the Strand, the neighbourhood of Covent Garden, and Oxford Street, on the 9th of this present November.

I HAVE never had much belief in centenaries, commemorations, and functions of that sort, but I begin to think they are not without value as showing the world every now and then how little it knows of some of the great men who have helped to make history, and how ready it is to swallow formulas and fetishes whole, in blissful unconsciousness of their meaning. Thus, for instance, I talked last week with many men, more or less distinguished in divers walks of life, about the Luther Commemoration, but I found very few with any distinct and accurate knowledge of what it was that the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther actually did, while, except to newspaper writers, with books of reference at their elbows, the very names of the equally great but less dramatic reformers who were associated with him appear to be absolutely unknown.

So much has been said in depreciation of the rank and file of the army, that it is well to draw attention to some remarks of Lord Justice Fry to the Grand Jury at Maidstone the other day. A very heavy calendar, comprising the names of sixty-seven prisoners, had just been got through, and it appeared that the ranks of the accused did not include a single soldier or sailor or any person wearing Her Majesty's uniform. Considering that the district included in this Assize contains seven garrison towns, this state of things is as gratifying as it is remarkable.

THE Amalgamated Cab-Drivers' Association has been in communication with Mr. Gladstone in reference to the amendment and consolidation of the Metropolitan cab laws, which are designated in the secretary's letter as extraordinary. No doubt the subject is one which requires attention, but it must not be forgotten that the public will insist upon having a very considerable voice in any alteration of the existing system.

WHEN people can ride in cabs with something like certainty of being drawn by a fairly good horse, and of being driven by a man who knows his way about and will be satisfied with his legal fare, it will be time for the cab-drivers to talk about the necessity of dealing with their "present frightful position." For the present, although there are very many honest and respectable men on the rank, the proportion of black sheep is far beyond any reasonable average.

MISS LEIGH, who appealed some little time ago—rather unnecessarily, as most people thought—on behalf of English ballet-girls in Paris, is now to the fore again, asking for five hundred pounds wherewith to start a British working-men's home in Paris. I do not think there will be a rush of philanthropists to provide the sum out of any regard for the abstract merits of the case, and the very perille arguments which Miss Leigh's letter to the Times advances in support of her scheme ought to have the effect of still further checking the flow of subscriptions.

THE requirements of the British working-men in Paris are, according to Miss Leigh, "their English paper and no less English cup of tea," "a place which shall be as near as possible like our own homes in England," where they can have "plain substantial food within their means, instead of, as one man called it, 'the table d'hosts,' with the many entrées, which rather confuse than satisfy the appetite." To this the obvious reply is, that the working-man who can afford "a table d'hosts" with many entrées, can very well afford his English paper and cup of tea; and that if he cannot go abroad without wanting charitable people to provide funds for all his English notions, he had very much better stop, and be independent if he can, on this side of the Channel.

MR. WILLIAM MORRIS, the author of "The Earthly Paradise," is a delightful poet when he permits himself to be comprehensible, and is likewise a fashionable authority on decorative art, but it seems a pity that he should meddle with political economy, or that he should make the name of art ridiculous by associating it with the crudest socialist arguments.

IN his recent lecture in the hall of University College, Mr. Morris is reported to have said that he was "one of the people called Socialists, as he believed that Socialism would take the place of competition among men in conditions of life, and that thus art would revive," an oracular saying which does not seem to me very far removed from absolute nonsense. Nor is there much more practical wisdom in Mr. Morris's expression of opinion that the employment of mothers of families in factories is "an abominable custom, especially when there are so many able-bodied men standing idle," or in his description of the middle classes as living "in a sort of swinish comfort," disregarding art.

RED-HOT enthusiasts like Mr. Morris really do what they call art as much harm as all the Philistines put together. Art has its own place in the world, and deserves, it may be granted, more respect and recognition than it generally gets; but that place can only be at best side by side with the hard facts of life and the imperious necessities of a relentless civilisation, of which it must always be, in the very nature of things, rather the servant than the master.

It would be, I suppose, hypercritical to look for much reverence for the English language in the paragraphs of the gentlemen who were once upon a time called "liners," and who now flourish as interviewers or graphic reporters. But, as a good slipshod bit of English, the following sentence, which appeared in the daily papers last week, is worthy of record: "The Lord Chancellor also called" on the Crown Prince of Portugal, "and inserted his name in His Royal Highness's visitors' book." Inserted, as Polonius would have said, is good.

MOST French writers, even when they are as well-informed as M. Max O'Rell, appear to be firmly convinced that it is the ordinary custom of Englishmen to buy and sell wives, and, as one isolated fact is quite enough for a Frenchman to build a vast superstructure of generalisation on, a prosecution which came last week before Mr. Justice Denman at Liverpool will probably confirm the superstition for many years.

IN this case one Betsy Wardle was charged with having bigamously married a certain George Chisnal—who was described in the report as being apparently just out of his teens—the legitimate Wardle being alive. The transaction turned out to have been of a strictly commercial character, Chisnal having paid Wardle a quart of beer for the lady, and everybody concerned, including two ladies, friends of the bigamous bargain, evidently looked upon the whole affair as being perfectly legal and proper. Mr. Justice Denman undeceived them by sentencing Mrs. Wardle to a week's hard labour, and the wife-market is likely to be inactive in Lancashire for some time to come.

THE story of the girl in Shropshire, in whose presence crockery, clocks, buckets, burning coals, and other incongruous matters flew about the house in all directions, is only a repetition of well-known tricks with which mischievous and hysterical girls have very often amused themselves at the expense of their credulous neighbours. The only remarkable part of the business is; not that the credulous neighbours should be taken in, seeing that there is never any lack of fools in the world; but that the girls who play these pranks should reproduce so accurately the proceedings of their predecessors, of whom it is in the last degree improbable that they can ever have heard. C.D.

After an Ostrich.

IN lion-hunts, and in tiger-hunts, and in boar-hunts there are joys and risks of which all have heard; but of the ostrich-hunt the world which is not used to running after ostriches has heard very little. There is an old fable (which is only a fable) that the ostrich when pursued will hide his head in the sand and believe himself invisible. I know the ostrich has a stupid face, but he is for all that a sharp fellow, wary and long-sighted, and one of the last creatures to put his own head in a hole. I have hunted him in his own deserts and can testify.

Every year as the summer sets in, horsemen arrive at the oasis of Derej from the mountains in the north, distant about six days' journey. They come to hunt the ostrich and stay only during the summer; as it is only during the great heats of that season that a horseman has any chance of overtaking the swift-footed bird. In cold weather he will outstrip every pursuer.

An Arab friend of mine, who was bound for the hunting-grounds, once persuaded me, now a good many years since, to go with him and try my skill at running down an ostrich. My friend Sidi had a grand air, and sustained no loss of dignity by reason that his trip to Derej was made for the sake of gain. I who only went for sport was looked upon with much respectful wonder by my fellow sportsmen.

We managed to reach Derej a day or two before the hunt began, that we might rest and prepare for the fatigue to come. It began on a sultry morning in the middle of July. The hot Gibli wind or simoom had been blowing for several days, and the thermometer stood at ninety-eight degrees, or blood-heat, just before sunrise. We were sure, therefore, to have one of the hottest days of a Saharan summer. So much the better, for the warm-coated ostrich would find it hot as well as we. The dangers of this chase do not arise from the fierceness of the animals pursued, but from the fierceness of the sun, for an Englishman is almost more likely to come off unscathed from an encounter with a lion, than to return from an ostrich-hunt without sunstroke or brain-fever.

Our party consisted of ten horsemen, and a few scouts who had been sent out at daybreak to explore the sand for footprints of the ostriches, and track them to their feeding-ground. We were all well mounted, and made ourselves as light weights as we could be, dispensing with four out of the five thick pieces of felt which invariably form the Arab's saddle-cloth, and thrown off every superfluous article of clothing; only taking care to have our heads well wrapped up as precaution against danger from the sun.

We started about two hours after sunrise, following leisurely on the tracks of our scouts, and after proceeding thus for a few miles, came upon one who told us that five fine birds were grazing in a wady a little distance off. Knowing they would not stray far, we dismounted for a few minutes to ease our horses, and to allow time to run still further into the mid-day heat. A sultry wind was blowing from the south, and the sun's glow was returned from the white sand under our feet with almost unlessened strength.

The Arabs, who are made of very porous clay, having absorbed long draughts of water, and hung little gourd bottles of the same fluid to their saddle-bows, we mounted and set off again. From the top of a little hill, if you could call it by that name—a height of about ten yards—about the bottom of the wady, we saw the ostriches, who I expect had some knowledge of us before we were visible. They had already started at full trot, and seemed to skim along without any exertion, using their small downy wings to help them onward, and, like horses in full career, kicking up the stones behind them. We went after them in a canter, for had we tried to catch them at once in a gallop, our horses would soon have been blown, and the birds would have got out of our reach. Our plan was to follow them as closely as we could without frightening them into their quickest pace, and to keep them in view.

They soon parted, two going together one way, and the others starting each in a different direction. We followed a single ostrich, a fine male, the feathers of the male bird being the more valuable.

Noon passed, and the sun was rapidly declining. We had been following our ostrich for four hours, but not in a straight line, since these creatures have a fancy for running in large circles. My hands and face began to feel as if they had been skinned and salted. The excitement and emulation among us, however, made one forget every thing but the object of the chase. One by one the horses of the Arabs dropped behind dead beat. Sidi, two other Arabs, and myself, being the best mounted, alone kept up the hunt, our aim being to turn the ostrich, and so drive him back to our companions. The two Arabs pricked their steeds into a full gallop, one going to the right and one to the left, and tried, by making a circuit, to get ahead of him. Sidi, not liking the idea of being outdone, made a dash at the game on his own account. His horse had still a little strength and spirit left, and a few long bounds brought him alongside. The bird then saw that he was outrun and outwitted. With a little stick, such as we all carried for this especial purpose, Sidi tapped him on the neck, turned him, and drove him back to me like a tame creature.

The ostrich was, of course, a Mussulman, and soon convinced that it was in vain to strive against his fate. One by one we came up with our beaten companions; surrounded our bird, caught him, and cut his throat. It would have been simpler to have tapped him on the head, and then have strangled him, for then there would have been no danger of damaging the feathers with blood. But such a way of killing is not in accordance with the Moslem creed concerning holy and unholy food; and of an animal so slaughtered the flesh could not have been eaten.

Ladies, I trust, will be satisfied with the amount of trouble taken to get for them their court plumes. But it is a pity that each feather which costs them a guinea scarcely brings a shilling to the Arab sportsman.

When we had skinned the bird and cut off the best joints, we rode leisurely back to Derej, which we reached a little after sunset, pretty well knocked up. Heartily glad was I, after a good supper of boiled leg of ostrich—which is a meat, not very choice, but welcome to the hungry—to lie in the soft sand, and take a nap that lasted until sunrise the following morning.

It has commonly been made to appear that ostriches are so stupid or so greedy as to be totally indiscriminate in the matter of food; but this is a mistake. When two kinds of food are placed before them, they will prefer the one, and are notably fond of certain kinds, such as mealies and prickly pears. Many of them even show a delicate choice. But a hungry bird eats almost anything. His system requires food in large quantity, but he always prefers the suitable kind. It is a fact, however, that the ostrich often dies a victim of over-indulgence. On the South African farms birds also die by the score from apoplexy, brought on by their keepers stuffing them constantly with all they can eat. An incredible number of pebbles are sometimes found in an ostrich's stomach, where they serve the same purpose, in triturating the food, as sand in a pigeon's gizzard. An ostrich farmer once found a carcass, the gizzard of which contained some nine hundred and thirty stones, of sizes varying from that of a pea to that of a walnut. Most of them were bright and hard, and all more or less rounded by constant rubbing. We may see the reason of that instinct which prompts the ostrich to stretch his neck over the fence and pick off a gold stud or a diamond pin from the breast of an unsuspecting visitor, or, in default of a jewel so attractive, to attempt to pull a button off his coat.

Cookery.

DISHES FOR PLAIN DINNERS.

THIRD DAY.

Stewed Haricot Beans.

Cold Beef.      Fried Potatoes.

Treacle Pudding.

STEWED HARICOT BEANS.

If the beans are left to soak all night in cold water they will be easily shelled, but, if this is not convenient, boiling water must be poured over them, and, after they have stood a few minutes, be drained. The skins will then come off easily. Choose the large white sort; a pint will make a dish sufficient for eight persons. Put the beans, when shelled, into enough broth to cover them; let them boil until tender. They will probably take three hours. Watch that they do not boil dry, adding broth or water from time to time. When the beans are done, add to them a pint of plain butter-sauce, broth, or gravy. Season nicely with pepper and salt; let them simmer for five minutes, and serve.

COLD BEEF.

As it is more than probable that there will be only just sufficient meat left on the bones to give each person a little, it will be best to cut it all off as neatly as possible, and serve it on the dish with fried potatoes. With a view to make the dish look prettier, a few pieces of home-made pickled cabbage can be put round the potatoes.

FRIED POTATOES.

Peel fine kidney potatoes, and cut them into slices from a quarter to half an inch thick, and as you do them, throw them into cold water. When all are done, drain and lay them in a cloth to dry; put them into a wire basket, which immerse in a stewpan half-full of boiling fat, and when the potatoes are a light golden-brown, throw them on to paper for a minute, turn them on to a dish, sprinkle salt and pepper over, and serve. Potatoes are fried thus, cut into chips, ribbons, or blocks, taking longer or shorter time according to the thickness.

TREACLE PUDDING.

Shred a quarter of a pound of beef-suet, roll it into ten ounces of fine flour, mix into a paste with a gill of cold water, roll it out to the thickness of a quarter of an inch, and line with it a pint and a half basin, which has been well rubbed with butter. Cut the remainder of the paste into rounds the size of the interior of the basin, put a dessert-spoonful of treacle in the pudding, then a round of paste, and so on until the basin is full, putting a round of paste on the top, and fastening it securely to the sides. Tie over with a cloth, and boil or steam for an hour and a half. When done, turn out the pudding; have ready half a pound of treacle made hot in a stewpan, pour it over, and serve. There should not be more than half a pound of treacle boiled in the pudding. If preferred, jam of any kind can be substituted for the treacle. The direction to shred the suet must not be overlooked, because, if minced, at least one ounce more of it will be required to make the pudding good and light.

FOURTH DAY.

Savoury Rice.

Stewed Beef, with Onions, Carrots, and Dumplings.
Boiled Oatmeal Pudding.

SAVOURY RICE.

To prepare this in an economical manner, instead of slices of streaked bacon, use the bones from which it has been cut, and on which very little meat remains. Scrape the underside of the bones, wash, and put them into a saucepan with plenty of water, two or three onions, and a carrot cut in rounds. When the bacon is done, take it off the bones, mince it up very finely, return it to the liquor, and add a breakfast-cupful of rice to each quart of this. Boil the rice until it has properly swelled and has absorbed all the liquor; add a little pepper and salt, if necessary.

STEWED BEEF.

Take the thin end from the sirloin, wash it, and be sure it is perfectly sweet; put it in a deep dish with a light sprinkling of salt. Each day that it remains turn it about in the salt, and when ready to cook, rinse it with cold water. Put the meat into a saucepan with enough cold water to cover it. As soon as it boils up, skim and put in onions, carrots, and turnips. Simmer gently for two hours, or more if the meat is not by that time tender. It is best to allow three hours for the stewing, as, if done before it is wanted, the meat can be kept hot without any injury to it. When perfectly tender, keep the meat hot whilst you take the fat from the gravy, which thicken with flour, and having added pepper, with salt if required, put it with the meat and vegetables, and simmer together for a quarter of an hour. Prepare some dumplings as in the recipe given in No. 134 of this Journal, and having put the stew on its dish, place them round it.

BOILED OATMEAL PUDDING.

This is a cheap and nice family pudding. Mix a quarter of a pound of coarse oatmeal in half a pint of cold water, and stir on to it a pint of boiling milk or water; add an ounce of shred suet, or any other fat, two eggs, a little spice, sugar to taste, and by way of a treat, two ounces of sultana raisins. Put the pudding into a greased basin, cover with a cloth, and boil for an hour and a half. Make a sauce to eat with the pudding as follows: Boil an ounce of currants in half a pint of water for five minutes, break up the currants with a spoon, and stir in a tablespoonful of flour, mixed smooth in a little cold water; add a little spice and sugar to taste. Children like the sauce without the currants if sweetened with treacle.

FIFTH DAY.

Lentil Soup.

Rissoles. Curried Rice.
Apple Pie.

LENTIL SOUP.

The bones having been cleared of meat, fry them until brown, put them into a saucepan with two quarts of cold water, a pound of onions fried, a turnip, carrot, a tablespoonful of salt, a dozen peppercorns, and a sprig of marjoram and thyme. Boil for an hour and a half, then put in a little celery or celery-seed tied in muslin, boil for another half hour, strain the soup, take off all fat, and add to the lentils prepared as follows:

Lentils require to be soaked. It is as well, if convenient, to let them lie in water all night with a pinch of carbonate of soda. Before soaking wash the lentils in several waters, rubbing them with the hands. The next day boil the lentils gently in the water in which they were soaked for two hours until they are tender, when they will be ready to use with the soup.

RISSOLES.

Mince the meat very finely, taking care it is free from skin and gristle, add to it about a fourth of its weight in breadcrumbs. Mix them with an onion boiled until perfectly tender, a few drops of essence of anchovy, pepper and salt, and sufficient egg to make it all into a stiff paste. Roll into egg-shaped balls, dip each in egg and breadcrumbs, and fry very gently. One egg, if well beaten, will suffice both to mix and egg the outside of a dozen rissoles of moderate size. Make a gravy of the water the onion has been boiled in, and the trimmings of the meat; and when the rissoles are done, pour the fat from the frying-pan, in which let the gravy boil up, then thicken with a little flour and water. A few drops of vinegar or any sharp sauce may be added with advantage, season with pepper and salt, and pour the gravy round the rissoles. It is better, if convenient, to fry them in a wire basket with hot fat.

APPLE TART.

See recipe in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No 131.

CURRIED RICE.

Patna is the best rice for curries. It should not be small or broken, and, if fine, costs as much as "Carolina." Well wash the rice, throw it into a saucepan with plenty of boiling water and a little salt. Keep the saucepan boiling fast for fifteen minutes, then try a grain of rice by rubbing it between the thumb and finger; if it crumbles it is done, if not boil a few minutes longer. When done strain the rice into a colander, and pour quickly over it a small cup of cold water; this will cause the grain to separate. Make the curry-sauce as follows: Mince and boil tender, for a quarter of a pound of rice, half a pound of onions. In a pint of milk mix a dessertspoonful of curry-powder and a large tablespoonful of flour, add salt to taste, and mix with the onions and the water in which they were boiled. Thicken the sauce over the fire, and when this is done put in the rice; simmer together for five minutes. Finally stir in an ounce of butter and a table-spoonful of lemon-juice, and serve very hot.

Runaway Marriages.

"THAT's all bosh!" remarked a well-known American physician to a journalist the other day, as he threw down a paper containing an account of a runaway in which the daughter of a local politician figured as the heroine.

"What's bosh, doctor?" asked the reporter, on the look-out for a possible item.

"Why, this runaway match which you have just published. That girl's father is a sharp man, but this is one of the sharpest tricks he has ever played since I knew him. That elopement was all a sham. It's as simple as can be. The girl's father is one of the best known men in this section of the town, and is a politician besides. He has, necessarily, a large acquaintance with the element who are always expecting him to stand treat upon the slightest pretext, and, what with this and the wedding festivities, supper and other etceteras, his daughter's marriage, if solemnised in the ordinary manner, would have cost him a great deal of money. An elopement saved all this, so he just opposed his daughter's wishes strongly enough to give a pretext for the two to run over to Jefferson, where the expenses of the wedding, all told, didn't amount to more than five or ten dollars. There were no fine dresses, flowers, gifts, or anything of that sort, and when they returned home they had a chance to go to housekeeping quietly and unostentatiously. It was a shrewd plan and a sensible one for all parties concerned.

"I have known a number of runaway matches which had no other reason than economy. Parents, relatives, and all are willing for the young people to commit matrimony, but the expense was a serious consideration, and a little timely opposition which caused an elopement smoothed out the crooked channel in which the course of true love was running. The cost of the wedding was saved for housekeeping, the young couple were forgiven, and all went on as merrily as if there had been any amount of marriage-bells ringing."

"In what classes of society do such marriages oftenest occur?"

"Generally in the middle classes—those who are only moderately well-to-do, and who yet want to keep up appearances. The very poor and the extremely rich are never troubled by such considerations, but the poor and proud often make use of this stratagem. I've known of some very aristocratic couples starting out on their matrimonial journey with an elopement, which was caused by nothing on earth save a want of funds. These fashionable weddings cost large sums."

"Are the young people ever in this secret?"

"Sometimes, but not often. Generally they are innocent parties to the deception. This is a new way to look at an elopement; but it's the real explanation of a good many, as I know from personal observation."

"The quickest courtship on record," added an old resident, "was that of Dr. Nick McDowell, who, driving along the street in his buggy one day, saw a beautiful girl standing at a window. He immediately stopped and hitched his horse, rang the bell, enquired the lady's name, was ushered into the parlour, announced his own name, said he was 'pleased with her appearance, and wished to marry her at once.' Nothing but the knowledge that she was actually in the presence of the celebrated physician kept her from fainting. To her plea of 'surprise at this unexpected announcement,' he only replied: 'Now or never.' When she asked to 'take a week to consider,' he said, 'I am going down street to attend a critical case, and have no time to spare right now.'

"Give me a day, then."

"I'll tell you what I'll do. When I am through with this professional visit I'll drive around and get a preacher. If you've made up your mind to marry me by that time, all right!" and he left her breathless, and unable to articulate another word. When he returned they were quietly married."

Fashions.

THE most remarkable feature in the fashions for this month is the extraordinary combinations of colours upon which Parisian authorities have ventured. It seems as if all the rules hitherto laid down—those art canons which æsthetic people obey—are all to be set at defiance, and new contrasts invented never before tolerated.

M. WORTH has sent out some wonderful costumes, made of myrtle-green mixed with brown; and so successful has his courageous attempt proved, that several manufacturers are trying to produce goods of the same shades in cheaper materials to meet the popular demand. Rich myrtle velvet, with fans of brown ottoman let in at the skirt seams, looks well because of the costliness of the materials. Upon the velvet, rows of pendent pompons break the uniformity of the plain surface.

THE different shades of red, for which names are sought in vain which will describe them accurately, are all in favour—even greater favour, than last year. "Poppy," "fire-red," "boëuf sanglant," "ibis," "fuschia," "grenat," "cardinal," and "geranium," are all well-known shades. Of the blues, "indigo," "navy," "gros bleu," "gens d'armes," and "moonshine," the last being an improved electric blue, give ample choice. As to the greys, there seems to be no end to the varieties, for this colour is likely to be the rage next summer, so it is safe to invest in it now. The tender shades are seen in plush, satin, and silk gauze. The stronger, darker shades of "elephant," "quarry-slate," "greystone," "London-smoke," "lavender," etc., are in tweeds, serges, cloths, cashmeres, and in velvet brocades, black upon a grey ground, and grey upon a lighter grey ground.

IN all the brocades of this year, there are daring innovations upon old-established arrangements of colours, the grounds being of very bright shades, and the embossed patterns in sombre and heavy colours. Particularly novel are dark green flowers upon golden-brown, and upon ibis-red; also brown upon bright blue grounds, and black upon grey.

STRIPED tweeds are among the most striking dress materials of the season. A rainbow stripe of many colours in narrow lines arranged together, alternating with a plain one, the sizes of the patterns varying from half-inch to inch-and-a-half wide lines. More unobtrusive are the tweeds which are striped in two colours only, black and grey, blue and black, green and brown, brown and gold, crimson and black.

LONG tunics are more worn than ever, so long, that those which are open in front and of equal length all round, are occasionally left undraped and look like pelisses. The Elizabethan tunic, with which is a square-cut bodice, full habit-shirt, and large collar falling over the shoulders, one of the class alluded to, is made in serge, tweed, or velvet, and is worn over a surah skirt.

THOUGH the waterfall backs to skirts are still popular, it is unquestionable that not every material lends itself to such severe treatment. Thick serges, velvets, brocades, etc., fall into rich folds effectively. Satin de Lyon, surah, gauze, tulle, or any other very diaphanous material, is only pretty just at first, or for a ball, when worn by a young lady who is dancing, and not sitting down frequently. These thin skirts are better when looped up, not inside, according to old lines, but caught up outside, thus forming a kind of bournouse back. For outside looping, the back of the skirt must be at least two yards wide, and cut so long as to allow of being draped gracefully, with every appearance of liberality in supply of material. Cloaks are looped in a similar manner, but less than two widths in the back will not permit of outside looping with good results.

THE basque bodice, the back of which is nearly as long as the dress-skirt behind, making a waterfall coat-tail, is generally made of some heavy material, and with flat trimmings, so as to give the impression that it is tailor-made, as the dressmakers of the stronger sex depend upon cut and fit rather than frills and furbelows to make the reputations of their dresses.

VELVET, cross-cut, and laid on in folds, is used for trimming almost any dress, be it silk or woollen; for all sorts of soft silky trimmings of the nature of velvet, such as chenille, are most fashionable. For mantles, a broad band, from four to six inches wide, entirely composed of loops of chenille, like black caterpillars, repeated ad infinitum, gives great richness to the fronts.

THE same character, of long, soft, deep-piled surfaces, is seen in other goods besides trimmings. Angora gloves and mittens are of a long-haired cloth, somewhat resembling fur. From Wales comes a fur-shawl which is the application of the angora cloth to a travelling wrap, and is more novel than the Scotch plaids or the Welsh Mauds.

LIGHT-COLOURED furs are once more in favour as bordering, though chinchilla is so very unserviceable, and soon looks shabby if worn on damp days. Perhaps this perishable nature recommends it all the more to rich people who can afford to be capricious. Silver-fox is a good hardy fur, and, if moths can be kept at bay, does not suffer from wear in an English climate.

BEAUTIFUL, but deceitful, was the marabout trimming of the last two years. Its novelty recommended it to ladies who wished for a bordering less massive than ordinary fur, and more distinctive than cross-cut velvet or plush. The prices of marabout-trimming varied in different marts, and misguided purchasers were lured to make cheap experiments. This error in judgment had to be paid for by the loss of beauty on the first damp day. If these trimmings revive by being shaken up before the fire they can be used again; if not, they must be consigned to the fire. Deep shoulder-capes in marabout are among this year's novelties.

IN millinery the most striking change is in hat-crowns, which grow more steeple-like month by month. As the crown rises in height it narrows in circumference, and is alluded to by sarcastic people as "the funnel." Our American neighbours call gentlemen's hats "stove-pipes," so we are now enabled to retaliate and accuse the American visitors to Paris of being the first patronesses of "funnels." The Regent Street steeple-hats are saved from being unbecoming by having the jet and lace upon the brims; and not a few have the leaf raised at one side very coquettishly. Others have long ostrich feathers passing from front to back and falling down behind. One or two small birds frequently seem to nestle on the front of the leaf. The nodding plumes of ostrich-tips are also placed in front of the high-crowned hats; the latter are of silk-beaver, velvet, or felt, in black, brown, or green.

CROCHET-WORK has been neglected since crewels came into fashion. Those who enjoy this kind of fancy work, especially in winter, when it can be carried on at the fireside, will be glad to hear of its revival. The newest outdoor dresses for children are little woollen overcoats crocheted in tricot-stitch. No longer can the old name "idiot-stitch" be applied to this kind of crochet, for the little garments are the very embodiment of common-sense, and to make them as tasteful as fashion demands requires no little experience and intelligence.

THE commonest tricot dress is a blouse, confined to the waist by a leather belt. The next is an ulster, buttoning across the chest, but with the addition of a thick-twisted girdle round the waist, terminating in two tassels. These forms are, however, but rudimentary, the aim of the best workers being to imitate some fashionable frock turned out by a dressmaker, and copy all the cuffs, collar, plastron, frill, revers, etc.; even the vest-front in a different shade, or colour, is worked in tricoterie. As tricot dresses are chiefly worn by young children, white wool is most used; the edge of the cuffs or of the frills being finished with filloselle, either white or coloured. For elder children who are likely to be out of doors in all weathers, coloured wool makes a more useful garment, all the five shades of brown, especially those tending to crimson, being used, and the filloselle finish is either of the same colour, gold, or white.

TAKING a princess frock as a model, it is begun at the bottom of the skirt and made in four breadths, one front, one back, and two sides, narrowed as required. When the front has been brought to about six inches from the waist, it must be wrought in two parts, thus making the front of the basque and bodice. When the skirt is finished and the seams joined, raised rows of chain-stitch can be worked on the outside, running vertically on the skirt, leaving three or four rows of tricot between each. This chain may be in either wool or filloselle, but the latter is expensive as it works up extravagantly fast. Most of the skirts have a trimming, a flounce, or frill added afterwards, and this is done by taking up a row of stitches at the head of the trimming, increasing one stitch in five for the first three rows, and not widening again until the edge is reached, when a scallop border in ordinary crochet makes the edge. A simulated basque is a pretty form to adopt, and the border for this can also be worked afterwards on the made-up skirt in tapestry stitch, using a netting mesh over which to form the loops. A thick white silk cord, sewed on to mark the basque, is less troublesome, but cord must then be used on cuffs, collar, and vest.

IN addition to the dresses, caps and capes are made in tricoterie. The former are round, worked in sections, and joined, being finished with a border in tapestry, and a tassel depending from the centre. The capes are begun at the border and narrowed to the throat. Chain-stitch comes in here again, to simulate a series of little capes, the coachman style.

INDOOR frocks for children are made of cashmere, honeycombed. Since it became customary to wear the sash considerably below the waist much of the skirt is quite concealed, so that the honeycombing need only come up to the scarf. Instead of one very broad sash of surah, or washing-silk, being worn by little girls, two ribbons of medium width in different colours, or two shades of the same, are twisted round the front, and bunched up in a mass of bows at the back. Roman scarfs are twined with plain surah ribbon. Watered sashes are no longer worn.

A PLEASANT fancy on an evening bodice, or one for demi-toilette, is a band of unmounted roses round the arm, or a bunch on the shoulders. With the bodice cut square, or half high, and an elbow sleeve, the flowers are pretty. Should the sleeve be dispensed with, a narrow band must still be worn, on which to fasten the flowers. A deep epaulette of lace, falling below the flowers, takes away from the skeleton appearance of an arm which is thin, or not beautifully moulded.

ALL kinds of steel, gold, mother-of-pearl, bronze, and jet ornaments are worn on dresses and bonnets, huge buckles looping up the tunics. Some Paris bonnets have folded velvet trimmings, fastened down at intervals with tiny squirrel feet, with silver claws.

Christmas Music.

AT Christmas-time, when everyone is trying to be merry, music is the one enjoyment which never seems to pall upon us, and the greatest possible help to spreading cheerfulness around. Music attends somewhat during the festive season, and we feel that she must step down from her pedestal and frolic it with the rest. There are indeed some highly æsthetic people who would play the profoundest works of the old masters on Christmas Day itself, but most of us have a feeling that for once Bach and Correlli should lie on the shelf, and give place to more mirth-inspiring strains.

TOWARDS Christmas-time the sternest of pianoforte-teachers relax, and suspend the series of improving sonatas to admit of the pupil's timid request for a "light piece." It is so pleasant to be able to add a little to the enjoyment of an evening, and bright music sets every heart dancing and makes every one feel gay.

But we would not have the student imagine that light music needs no practice. Depend upon it, it needs as much practice as anything else to make it go nicely; slovenliness always tells, whether in a sonata or in a light piece, and in point of fact these ephemeral compositions require very beautiful playing to set them off. Take some new gavotte, for example; you hear it played at some theatre or concert, it goes trippingly, and has a very catching air; crisply and delicately the pretty phrases go, like the steps of some practised dancer. The thing gets popular, and you hear it played in drawing-rooms by every amateur. What a different thing it sounds! Heavy and loud, no time not kept up, difficult bits slurred over, no light or shade, no more notice taken of dot or slur than if they were put in to make the page look pretty. No, these light things require to be played with great precision to make them go well; it is a dreadful thing to play a gavotte and to let it fall as flat as a pancake.

TOWARDS Christmas the professional person is always being met by the enquiry, "Do recommend me a light piece." It is sometimes difficult to think of a list all in a minute, but a person who plays about much will soon get to find out what pieces are popular, and the likely to take with a general audience. When brightness is the question, if it can be combined with worth, so much the better. The works of Gounod, for example, are always delightful to listen to, and while the musician delights in the fine construction, the curious harmonies, and the originality of idea, the unlightened are caught by the alluring melody and the wonderful and indefinable charm which the master possesses. One could listen to his "Dodelinette" a hundred times and always with fresh pleasure. It is an excellent exercise in the legato style, but it is no good for anybody to attempt it who has very small hands. It cannot be kept smooth enough if you have not what pianists call "a good stretch." The "Faust" music is delightful, but the lighter parts have become somewhat hackneyed. Else nothing can be more enlivening than the "Kermesse" scene, or the "Maiden's Chorus." There is, however, plenty of charming music in the "Reine de Saba," which appears to be little known—a march and a quantity of pretty ballet music. Talking of ballet music reminds me of the great beauty of Schubert's "Rosamunde." It wants nice delicate playing, but is perhaps better as a duet than as a solo.

SOMETIMES, in looking through the scores of operas, one finds out all sorts of charming things in the shape of incidental music which are little known, and therefore more worth playing. There is a delightful nigger dance in "Aïda," for example, which goes very well on the piano, and there is also an Egyptian dance, which occurs in the scene in the Temple, which is wonderfully weird and catching. You can fancy the slave-girls dancing round the idol with their heavy features decked with curious jewels; you can see their slow movements, their waving arms, all matching the strange barbaric solemnity of the Egyptian temple.

THERE has been a great fancy lately for Hungarian and Polish music. It has to be played in a particular style, and then it is wonderfully catching. It requires a tremendous deal of spirit, although a nice discretion must be observed even in the moments when we are most carried away, and playing with apparent abandon, so as not to tear a passion to tatters. Some of our pianists deserve the reproof I heard given to one the other day by a little child of two. She was allowed to sit on her mother's knee to hear the pretty music, but was appalled to find the player belabouring the piano in a way which she herself was never permitted to indulge in. She thought it was time for her to interfere. "Not too hard!" she said, holding up her tiny finger; "play pretty!"

WITH this caution, we may recommend the highly interesting and delightful music of this class—the Hungarian dances of Brahms; the national dances of Moszkowsky; the interesting mazurkas of the Scharwenka. One work in particular by the last-named writer—the first of his set of Polish dances—enjoyed a great measure of popularity all through last season; it has a very striking commencement, which may have something to do with it, for, alas! there is no better way with some audiences of commanding attention than to begin a song with a shout, or a pianoforte piece with a bang. It catches their attention at once, and they are curious to see what you will do next. The piece in question, however, has other merits; besides "beginning with a bang," it is full of light and shade, and of very clever pianoforte effects.

To speak now of a class of music lighter still. It is well even amongst that to choose the best. Mr. Walter Macfarren has written many charming tarantelles, and pieces of that kind, which are highly effective in a drawing-room; one in particular in F, which is very charming when played with piquancy. Some people appear to go through the world with their eyes shut—they never seem to hear of anything new. They never know of any new pieces, they never find out what style is in fashion. The theatre is a great place for hearing new music. If you listen between the acts you will hear all kinds of pretty gavottes, and savage dances, and things of that kind, and the names (in the good theatres) are always down in the programme. Sometimes, however, the name may not be found, or you hear an encore at a concert, or some piece in a drawing-room under circumstances which make it impossible for you to discover the title. The great thing to cultivate is the art of jotting down a few lines of music from ear, as then a few hurried lines on the back of your programme will serve as a memorandum of the melody; and once get the opening phrase, and send it to an intelligent music-seller, he will be almost certain to discover the piece for you.

Anise.

ANISE grows wild in Egypt, in Syria, Palestine, and all parts of the Levant; but the Romans considered the Egyptian and Cretan anise to be the best, especially for medicinal purposes. The product of Southern Europe is now looked upon with favour. Among the ancients, anise seems to have been a common pot-herb in every garden. Although it is less used in medicine by the moderns than by the ancients, it still retains its former reputation as an excellent stomachic, particularly for delicate women and young children. The Romans chewed it in order to keep up an agreeable moisture in the mouth, and to sweeten the breath, while some Orientals still do the same. Some of the Persian poets have sung the agreeable qualities of the anise, and a modern ballad of Rome compares the slender grace of a young girl to the anise.

Anise is an annual plant growing to the height of one foot, carries a white flower, and blooms from June to August. The seeds are imported and used in large quantities on account of their aromatic and carminative properties. The distilled plant, when used in blossom, yields a sweeter and more grateful tincture than can be obtained from the seeds. Anise is extensively employed by the confectioner for the purpose of flavouring comfits and cordials. The anise-seed cordial of the shops is a compound of alcohol, anise-seed, and angelica. The oil is obtained by distillation from the seeds, and though habitually mixed with a great many cattle medicines, and regarded by the farmers of former generations as one of the most potent drugs, it performs scarcely any other office than the communicating of an agreeable fragrance. The Chinese cultivate it for the seasoning of dishes; and the Japanese employ bundles and garlands of it in the ceremonies of their heathenish superstition. Its appearance, when out of flower, as well as when in bloom, is decidedly ornamental.

"Dead Man's Gulch."

THE following incident occurred during the early days of the Californian gold-fields, and is characteristic of the state of things that existed amongst the diggers at that time. A miner had died in a mountain digging, and, as he was much respected, his acquaintances resolved to give him a "square funeral," instead of putting the body in the usual way in a roughly-made hole, and saying by way of funeral service: "Thar goes another bully boy under!" They sought the services of a miner who bore the reputation of having, at one time of his career, been "a powerful preacher in the States." And then, Far Western fashion, they all knelt down, while the extemporised parson delivered a prodigiously long prayer. The miners, tired of this unaccustomed opiate, to while away the time, began, digger fashion, fingering the earth that had been taken from the grave. Gradually looks were exchanged; whispering commenced and increased, until it became loud enough to attract the attention of their parson. He opened his eyes and stared at the whispering miners. "What is it, boys?" Then, as suddenly his eyes lighted on the sparkling scales of gold, he shouted: "Gold, by jingo! and the richest kind o' diggin'—the congregation is dismissed!" Instantly every man began to prospect the new digging, our clerical friend not being the least active of the number. The body had to be removed and buried elsewhere, but the memory of the incident long lived from the name given to the locality, for "Dead Man's Gulch" became one of the richest gold-fields in all California.

Household Gardening.

WHENEVER the weather is mild, and the ground dry enough to work freely, planting may be done, both of fruit-trees, flowers, and bulbs, but never attempt this work when the soil is in a wet mortar-like state. It is undoubtedly wise to plant as early in the autumn as possible, especially in the case of flower-roots of all kinds of hardy border plants and bulbs, but in practice circumstances always arise, preventing work being done at the exact time, and when this time passes many persons think it is no use planting at all.

TULIPS FOR POTS AND BEDS.

The earliest kinds of Tulips that were placed in pots in September and early October, as was advised, must now be withdrawn from the plunging material, and placed in the windows of rooms or on the shelves of greenhouses. These plants of the dwarf yellow, scarlet, white, and striped Duc Van Thol varieties, may be had in bloom at Christmas, and beautiful they are then when well grown, as may be seen by an inspection of the Christmas flower-markets.

When the pots are first uncovered, the growth of the plants will be an inch long, and almost white, as they will necessarily have become blanched by the absence of light; but the pots will be filled with roots, and thus the object of covering them will have been accomplished.

On first placing the blanched Tulips in the room or greenhouse, they must be shaded from the sun for a time, must, in fact, have several days of twilight. This can be easily managed by covering them with paper funnels, allowing these to remain until the growths assume a green hue, when they will endure the light, and cannot, indeed, have too much of it for ensuring stout leaves and fine flowers.

The roots of these, and all kinds of bulbs that are fairly starting into growth, must always be kept moist, not saturated, but still never dry; and although care must always be exercised in watering, yet it will be easier to err in giving too much than too little moisture, if the pots are packed with white fleshy fibres.

Later Tulips than the above may still be potted, placing three or four bulbs in a pot five inches in diameter across the top, and just covering them with soil, which should be free and good, yet containing a liberal admixture of sand or gritty matter of any kind.

As was advised for Hyacinths, stand the pots on a layer of ashes, either in the open air or a cold frame, and cover them six inches deep with cocoa-nut fibre refuse, ashes, or sawdust, the former being the best, and there let them remain for a month; by that time they will have produced roots and commenced growing, when they must be withdrawn and treated as described for the earlier sorts.

EFFECTIVE VARIETIES.

There are both single and double Tulips that, potted now, will be strikingly effective in due time; the singles will flower first, and will be succeeded by their more massive congeners.

In selecting varieties, we will only name a few of the most distinct and inexpensive, for, as a rule, the longer the list of names the less useful it is to the majority of readers.

Beautiful single kinds are Pottelbakker, white; Vermilion Brilliant, rich scarlet; Chrysolora, yellow; Cottage Maid, delicate rose; La Belle Alliance, glowing crimson; Keizers Kroon, scarlet and yellow; and Prosperpine, rich rosy purple. Of doubles, the following trio only need be named: Tournesol, scarlet and yellow; Rex Rubrorum, deep scarlet; and La Candeur, pure white. These are very large and handsome; the last-named being the latest, and always admired when seen in its best condition.

PLANTING IN BEDS.

The same varieties, both of doubles and singles, are amongst the best that can be employed for beds, and when grown in masses they have a brilliant effect in the spring.

Tulips like a sunny position and free generous soil. Let the beds, therefore, be forked well over, and at least a foot deep, otherwise the water will not drain rapidly away from the bulbs, and stagnant soil they abhor.

In planting, it is best to draw drills six inches apart and three inches deep; then scatter in them some sand or gritty matter of any kind, and on this place the bulbs six inches apart, sprinkle more sand over them, then level in the soil. They will then be covered two inches deep, and may be expected to grow satisfactorily. If holes are simply made in the soil with a stick, water accumulates in them and endangers the decay of the roots.

DOUBLE AND SINGLE NARCISSI.

Bulbs of these beautiful flowers may also be planted now, and are sure to succeed if the soil is in good condition. There are many varieties, indeed far too many for enumeration, and only a very few of the most distinct and inexpensive will be recommended. Those persons who may require more kinds can safely leave the selection of them to a vendor, after stating the number required or the amount to be expended in their purchase.

POET'S NARCISSUS.

This charming single ivory-white flower with its crimson eye is a favourite with everybody, and to meet the public demand for flowers in spring plants have to be grown by the acre.

For this purpose they are planted in rows under fruit-trees in market-gardens in the Thames Valley, and the orchards are thereby rendered additionally remunerative. Sometimes the trees are fruitless, but the ground is never flowerless in the season, and these lovely Narcissi are brought to London in cartloads.

This is suggestive, as it shows that these flowers will grow where many others would fail, and this is a great advantage to owners of gardens large and small.

Plant the bulbs five or six inches apart, either under trees or in the open, and if the soil is moderately fertile they will increase in size and numbers, and continue producing flowers year after year. The roots should be covered three or four inches deep, and not be disturbed in digging the beds or when planting summer flowers.

DOUBLE WHITE NARCISSUS.

Flowering later than the preceding, of which it is a variety, this affords a most welcome succession of handsome blooms. These are two or three inches or more in diameter and equal in beauty a large Gardenia or small Camellia. Many of our readers have probably never seen them, or if they have, did not know the name of what they may have admired in the flower-markets in the month of May. If in future they see large handfuls of double pearly-white fragrant flowers at the period named, they may know it is the double Poet's Narcissus, also if they have gardens they may grow it for themselves. Plant now as above directed, and plants and flowers are sure to follow.

THE GOLDEN NARCISSUS.

The typical example of this section is the fine old double Daffodil that for years has been the brightest flower of spring in thousands of cottage gardens and gentlemen's pleasure grounds.

Bulbs only need planting in clumps of half-a-dozen roots or so in each, and covering five inches deep to ensure a display of flowers, and if the roots are never disturbed the plants will spring up yearly for a generation, perhaps for a century.

Equal to the above—indeed, in the estimation of many persons, far surpassing it in beauty—is the large single Trumpet Narcissus. It grows and flowers with great freedom, and is also highly effective in pots in the greenhouse. A few bulbs should be tried by all who admire large golden flowers in their gardens in April.

THE TWO-COLOURED NARCISSUS.

Tastes, of course, vary, but in our opinion there is not a variety in cultivation more beautiful than the one known as Narcissus Bicolor Horsefieldi. The first specific name—bicolor—indicates that the flowers are two-coloured, the last—Horsefieldi—being the name of the raiser, Horsefield, Latinised. The large cup of the flower is clear yellow, and the spreading sepals, that appear like wings, ivory-white. This kind is very striking grown in pots, and not less so in the open borders of the garden. Being scarce the bulbs are a little more costly than the others, but the price is not prohibitive. Let those who have the means to do so try a few bulbs of this fine variety.

THE POLYANTHUS NARCISSUS.

As its name implies, this flowers after the manner of the Polyanthus, that is, produces a straight clear stem, surmounted by a cluster of flowers. These are small, about an inch in diameter, and range in number from six to twelve, or more, in each head. The colour varies too, one being white, another yellow, but the majority have white sepals and yellow cups.

These kinds are largely grown in pots, and a few plants in a house not only add to the beauty, but fill the air with fragrance; but though grown in pots the bulbs are perfectly hardy, and may be planted in beds the same as the others above referred to, the present being the time for both potting and planting.

JONQUILS.

These are also Narcissi, but so dissimilar from the others as to command a distinctive name. They are among the most bright, elegant, and hardy of the genus, and are adapted for gardens in town or country. Their leaves are small and rush-like; their flowers also small, borne in small bunches, bright golden yellow in colour, and delightfully fragrant; there are double and single varieties, but the latter are the more elegant; and withal, single flowers are more fashionable than doubles nowadays. These pretty, cheerful Jonquils are usually planted in clumps, from six to twelve bulbs being placed together, disposed about an inch from each other, and covered four inches deep. Provided the soil is well forked and the sub-soil broken up, so that the rain passes away freely, they require no further care, but will go on flowering and increasing year by year, if they are not disturbed in digging the ground. We planted a number of roots twenty years ago, and now flowers can be cut in quantity every spring, and are particularly acceptable for room decoration.

PROTECTING PLANTS.

Let everything that is tender be made safe against frost; only half hardy plants can be kept in cold frames, and these must be well covered with mats or other convenient material, and never forget that frost passes through the wooden sides of the frame if these are exposed to the weather.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTION.

LUDWIG wishes to know if the following "Sonnet," by Alfred Tennyson, which appeared in "Friendship's Offering," 1833, has ever been reprinted in any collection of the author's poems?

Check every outflash, every ruder sally
Of thought and speech; speak low, and give up wholly
Thy spirit to mild-minded melancholy;
This is the place. Through yonder poplar alley,
Below the blue-green river windeth slowly;
But in the middle of the sombre valley,
The crisped waters whisper musically,
And all the haunted place is dark and holy.
The nightingale, with long and low preamble,
Warbled from yonder knoll of solemn larches,
And in and out the woodbine's flowery arches
The summer midges wove their wanton gambol,
And all the white-stemmed pinewood slept above,
When in this valley first I told my love.

ANSWERS.

BUSY BEE.—We do not know of anything that will remove the gold paint. You had better send the frames to a good gilder. There is no reason why the black stain should show through if the re-gilding is properly done.

COCKNEY TOM.—1. Very few of the events in which St. Botolph is said to have played a part belong to the sphere of history, and it is difficult to discover the cause of his extended popularity. It has been surmised that he was a patron saint of seamen, and that his name indicates the character of a boat-help. In a "Life of St. Botolph," written or embellished by John Capgrave, and included in his Nova Legenda (London, 1516), we learn that Botolphus and Adolphus were two noble brothers, who, in early life, were sent into "Old Saxony" to be instructed in monastic learning. Botolph there became acquainted with two sisters of an English king named Ethelmund, who, at their wish, allotted to the monk a piece of barren ground, on which to build a convent. Like other marshy spots, in which the ignis fatuus abounded, it was thought to be infested by malignant spirits. These were soon, however, put to flight, and a convent, on the model of the house in which St. Botolph had been reared, was planted in the midst of their domain. It perished under Edmund (941-946); but the relics of St. Botolph, which had been enshrined in his own foundation, were preserved, and afterwards translated in the time of Edgar (959-975), through the efforts of St. Ethelwold. The head was sent to Ely, and the body equally apportioned to the royal cabinet of relics and the abbey church of Thorne. 2. We do not know of any such "Popular" Edition. The late author's copyright not having expired, no publisher can issue the books in another form. 3. We cannot tell you. 4. If fresh, the fruit stains can be removed with milk and salt; but if old, salts of sorrel will be required.

DOPS.—Many thanks for your letter. What you say does not, however, alter our opinion, and we must continue to believe that character cannot be truly delineated from handwriting. We consider that, as an amusement, it is dear at two shillings.

G. S. H.—"Auctioneer's Manual," by Allnutt, 4s.

HASTINGS.—Apply to the Commons Preservation Society (E. W. Fithian, Esq.), 1, Great College Street, Westminster. We do not suppose you have much chance of success, unless the Local Government take it up.

MARY.—Alfa is a kind of grass used for paper-making. It is the North African name for Macrochloa arenaria and its fibre, one of the varieties of esparto, which is grown chiefly in Spain and Algeria.

MUMBO JUMBO.—1. Hot ginger drink may be made more palatable by the addition of a little citric acid or lemon-juice. Very nice non-alcoholic beverages can be made with "Beckett's Fruit Syrups," which are called "Winterine." "Winter Punch" is delicious, and is made by simply adding boiling water to the syrup, which is like a liqueur, having an agreeable warmth and delicate fruit flavour. 2. "And many strokes, though with a little axe, Hew down and fell the hardest timber'd oak."—King Henry VI., Part III., Act II., Scene 1.

Q. L. B.—The pudding you require is called "Friar's Omelet," and is delicious. It generally turns out well. Make six moderate-sized apples into stiff sauce, sweeten with powdered loaf sugar, stir in two ounces of butter, and, when cold, mix with two well-beaten eggs. Butter a tart-dish, and strew the bottom and sides thickly with bread-crumbs; then put in the apple sauce, and cover with bread-crumbs to the depth of a quarter of an inch; put a little dissolved butter on the top, and bake for an hour in a good oven. When done, turn it out, and sift sugar over it.

SOPHIE.—We can only recommend you to take your work to the shops where such things are sold. If you are clever, you will, no doubt, get employment, but, if otherwise, there are too many second and third class competitors for you to have much chance.

Puzzles for Prizes.

RULES.

1. Answers should be written on one side of the paper only, and should be posted so as to reach the office, 24, Great New Street, Fetter Lane, E.C., by the first delivery on the Tuesday after date of publication. Envelopes must be addressed, "The Puzzle Editor," and each answer must bear the nom de plume of the writer legibly written on the top of the first sheet.

2. A First Prize of TEN SHILLINGS and a Second Prize of FIVE SHILLINGS will be awarded each week to the best and second-best answers respectively to the two Puzzles set. The Puzzle Editor reserves, however, the right of withholding either the First or Second Prize, or both, if, in his opinion, the answers received should not come up to the required standard of merit.

3. No winner of a First Prize will be eligible for another Prize during the same quarter. A winner of a Second Prize will be eligible for another Second Prize in the same quarter, but not for a First Prize.

4. Every Prize-winner must consent to send his or her name and address for publication.

5. The Puzzle Editor's decision is to be taken as final.

PUZZLES.

1. An Adaptation of Shakespeare.

This is a competition of a somewhat novel kind. The plot of a play in which the following characters take part is to be written: Hamlet, Ingo, Romeo, Benedick, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Touchstone, Falstaff, King Lear, Portia ("Merchant of Venice"), and Imogen. The dramatic personæ must retain exactly the same characters as Shakespeare gave them, though their positions in life may be altered according to convenience. Lear need not be a king, nor Hamlet a prince. The accidents of birth and place may be entirely set aside; but the plot must be constructed with personages corresponding in character to those mentioned. Nor must the play be a mere series of incidents thrown together at hap-hazard. It must be, as far as it is in the writers' power to make it so, a character-study, a work of art; in which some circumstances rise naturally from the characters of the persons who appear in it, and other circumstances, in their turn, react upon the dramatic personæ. In short, the dramatic method of Shakespeare must be followed as closely as possible. The answers must be kept as short as may be.

2. A Threepenny-Bit Puzzle.

Draw on a piece of paper a circle the exact size of a threepenny-piece. Commencing at any part of the circumference begin to write the Lord's Prayer in consecutive rings gradually approaching the centre. If this can be done easily and the whole of the Lord's Prayer with the final Amen can be squeezed in, proceed to add the full name and address of the writer, and any other words which can be introduced. This is a test of eyesight and steadiness of hand. A watchmaker's magnifying-glass held in the eye, and a hard pencil with a fine point, will be found necessary implements. In examining the answers, legibility, and the number of words introduced, will be the two points considered.

Prize Winners in No. 132.

1st Prize, 10s., "Atlas" (Miss E. Herdman, 33, Sterndale Road, West Kensington).

2nd Prize, 5s., "Ethel May" (Mrs. E. T. Bixby, 8, Hamilton Terrace, Ebner Street, Wandsworth, S.W.).

The Winners of Equal Prizes in No. 129, were J. Lowres, Esq., 27, Queen Anne Road, South Hackney ("Abracadabra"); Mrs. E. T. Bixby, 8, Hamilton Terrace, Ebner Street, Wandsworth, S.W. ("Ethel May"); Mrs. Alfred Campion, The Ferns, Derby Road, Watford, Herts ("Acacia").

The Charade Word-Square has not been correctly solved by every contributor. The answer is:

Q	U	E	S	T
U	N	D	E	R
E	D	U	C	E
S	E	C	T	S
T	R	E	S	S

OUT OF THE RUNNING.—The following Prize-Winners come under the conditions of Rule 3, for thirteen weeks from the date of the Number in which they gained a Prize: No. 121.—1st Prize, "Achilles"; 2nd Prize, "Comus." No. 122.—1st Prize, "Midnight Oil"; 2nd Prize, "Stella." No. 123.—1st Prize, "Zyx"; 2nd Prize, "Comus." No. 124.—1st Prize, "Ferdinando"; 2nd Prize, "Ambrosia." No. 125.—Equal Prizes, "Frensham," "Ryland," "Maidblume." No. 126.—1st Prize, "Hookwood"; 2nd Prize, "L. C. L." No. 127.—1st Prize, "Manhattan"; 2nd Prize, "Maidblume." No. 128.—1st Prize, "Irish Exile"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 129.—Equal Prizes, "Abracadabra," "Acacia," "Ethel May." No. 130.—1st Prize, "The Arabs"; 2nd Prize, "Alice." No. 132.—1st Prize, "Atlas"; 2nd Prize, "Ethel May."

Answers have also been received from—Alice, Acacia, Ambrosia, Adam, Aberystwyth, Achilles, Attaché, Abracadabra, Alert, Bosco, Bertha, Congo, Cackle, Emma Jane, Eureka, Elton, Ellen, Hop o' my Thumb, Iolanthe, Lorelei, L. C. L., Mary, Me, Majolica, Mumbakull, Mayflower, Mona, Olive May, Queen Bobba, Quex, Ryland, Snap, Starling, The Arabs, Zigzag.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—ATTACHE.—Prizes are given every week. ACHILLES.—Many thanks for your Puzzle. We have often given Puzzles based on the same idea. EMMA JANE.—We are sorry your name was omitted in the list of contributors. We received your answers and duly considered them.

Odds and Ends.

DOHERTY, a former Chief Justice of Ireland, used to tell a good story of his posting days. He was going circuit in a post-chaise, and at a dangerous part, where the road skirted a descent, one of the horses, which had been behaving wildly all the way, began kicking furiously. Much alarmed, Doherty called out, "This is outrageous. I don't think that horse has ever been in harness before." "Bedad, your lordship's right. He was only took out of the field this morning." "And do you mean to tell me that you have put an unbroken horse to my carriage?" "Sorra a sight of the leather he has ever seen till to-day. And if he brings your lordship safe to the fut of the hill, the master says he'll buy him."

AN artificial baby has been invented by an ingenious Yankee for the benefit of those travellers who wish to scare away people from entering a carriage which they would like to keep to themselves. This "travelling necessity," as its inventor calls it, is so ingenious that it would deceive the most experienced mother, and is manufactured in three styles for various purposes. No. 1 costs £2, and "is so thoroughly irritating that it would keep away the most placid and loving individual." No. 2, for £1, emits "lamentable, intolerable, but intermittent cries;" and No. 3 is a capital imitation for 10s. Further, the inventor undertakes to repair the machinery gratis.

MANY years ago one of the Parisian theatres came under the management—or at least the proprietorship—of a rich native of the Ottoman Empire, who, nevertheless, kept a keen eye on the accounts. Among the items of expenditure was one of three francs a week for meat for eight or ten cats kept to protect the canvas scenes, etc., from the ravages of the rats. This item was promptly disavowed by the Turkish proprietor, who wrote upon the margin of the bill the following dilemma: "If the cats eat the rats, wherefore the meat? If they don't, wherefore the cats?"

A WELL-KNOWN actor had a horror of street-music. On one occasion the "waits" played before his house at midnight, and waited on him next morning. They were ushered into his room. "Well," said the actor, "what do you want?" "We played before your house last night," said the musicians. "I heard you," was his reply. "We are come for our little gratuity," said the melodious invaders. "Why, bless me," said the sufferer, "I thought you came to apologise."

AN authoress of some celebrity in her day once asked Dr. Johnson to give an opinion upon a work she was just going to publish, observing: "If it will not do, I beg you will tell me so, as I have other irons in the fire, and should you think this not likely to succeed, I can bring out something else." The doctor having turned over several pages of the work, returned it with the following laconic observation: "Madam, I would advise you to put this where your other irons are."

DANTE lived very poor and an exile at Verona, on a small pension from Prince Scaliger. At the same court was a buffoon who lived magnificently. "How happens it," said the latter to Dante one day, "that with all your genius you remain so poor, while such a blockhead and fool as I am abound in all things?" "I should be rich, too," said the indignant poet, "had I your luck to find a prince with a character so like my own."

ADÈLE is a splendid cook, but it is evident that she cannot content everybody and his father. The other evening madame went into the kitchen and found the gas-stove lighted. "Why, Adèle, do you light your stove at this hour?" "But I have not put it out since morning." "Why, girl, are you crazy?" "No; but madame is always complaining that I use too many matches."

A LADY who thought "something was the matter with her heart" sent in great haste for the family physician. After making a solemn examination, he said: "There is no danger, madam: your heart beats normally. Its beat is iambic. Were it trochaic or spondaic, there would be cause for alarm, but iambic is the normal beat of a healthy heart." The lady was much comforted.

"SEE here, sir!" exclaimed a grocer, bristling up with righteous indignation, as the milkman made his morning call, "I should like you to explain how the chalk that I found in my coffee-cup this morning got there." "Don't know, I'm sure," answered the milkman, "unless you sweetened your coffee with the same sugar you sold me yesterday."

A GENTLEMAN visiting a school had a book put into his hand for the purpose of examining a class. The word "inheritance" occurring in the verse, the querist interrogated one of the youngsters as follows: "What is patrimony?" "Something left by a father." "What would you call it if left by a mother?" "Matrimony."

IN one of the leading clubs, two prominent members were discussing the peccadilloes of another member. Said one: "That fellow deserves to be expelled. He has broken every rule of the club, save one." "Which rule is that?" asked the other. "That which forbids feeing the servants," was the answer.

DOING one's very best is one's simple duty. Anything short of this is a shame to any man. There is never a fair excuse for doing fairly well—if doing better were possible to the doer. Not how much you do, but how well you do it, is the true measure of success in any line of action or purpose.

IF money be not thy servant it will be thy master. The covetous man cannot so properly be said to possess wealth, as that it may be said to possess him.

SINGULAR that the word miser, so often expressive of one who is rich, should, in its origin, signify one that is miserable.

IF a man knew as much about himself as he does about his neighbour, he would never speak to himself.

EDUCATION begins the gentleman, but reading, good company, and education must finish him.

LADIES of fashion starve their happiness to feed their vanity, and their love to feed their pride.

NOR for herself was woman first created, nor yet to be man's idol, but his mate.

A CERTAIN country squire was the most uncalculating of mortals in money matters. He began to build a house, but his original design grew, with wing on wing, until it flew away with all his cash capital, and more too. He was in debt to architect, carpenters, and masons, and for everything about his new dwelling. One bright morning in March, as he leaned meditatively over a fence, looking towards the Aladdin palace, a stranger passing by asked: "Sir, to whom does that handsome edifice belong?" "That," said the squire, with a sparkle in his eye, "is just what I am trying to find out."

THE Spanish ambassador one day entered the room in which Henry IV. was on all-fours, with his little son on his back. The king stopped, and, looking at the ambassador, said to him: "Pray, sir, have you any children?" "Yes, sire, several." "Well, then," said the king, "I shall complete my round."

FATHER DOOLAN to Irish turf-man, half tipsy at mid-day: "Pat, Pat, this will never do! You must really go and take the pledge at once." Pat: "Then, bedad, yer riverence, I will require to part wid mi ould pony, for not a fut will he stir past a public-house until I pay it a visit."

A CYNICAL old bachelor, who firmly believes that all women have something to say on all subjects, recently asked a female friend: "Well, madam, what do you hold on this question of female suffrage?" To him the lady responded, calmly: "Sir, I hold my tongue."

THE ringing of the curfew-bell was resumed at Stratford-on-Avon on the night of September 11. One of the interesting features of this revival of an ancient custom is the fact that the curfew is rung upon the bell which tolled at Shakespeare's funeral.

"JOHN, what do you do for a living?" "Oh, me preach." "Preach, and do you get paid for it?" "Sometimes me get a shilling, sometimes two shillings." "And isn't that mighty poor pay?" "Oh yes; but it's mighty poor preaching."

IN his commonplace book, Boswell relates the following: Lord Eglinton said to his brother and heir, Colonel Montgomerie: "If I live, Archie, I'll take care of you." "Thanks," replied the colonel; "and if you die, I'll take care of myself."

A YOUNG lady the other day presented herself to the librarian of a public library, and enquired if "An Idle Clergyman" was in. Somehow things had got mixed. It was finally evolved that the book she desired was "A Reverend Idol."

A GREEK philosopher was asked what he thought was the proper time to dine. "Sir," replied the ancient, "the proper time for dinner, with the opulent, is when they choose; with the poor man, when he can."

THE zodiacal sign for the opening of winter is a goat. The goat is a hard butter, and hard butter is almost always the sign that the weather is cold.

SLANG is always objectionable. Instead of saying "A dead give away," we would advise you to say "A posthumous donation."

A Sorrento Love-Story.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

"WILL the signora buy the bird—the uccellino? He sings well—so well!"

So whined a lad—a big lad—in rags on a Sorrento road one spring afternoon. What a handsome boy he was! how well-fed, straight, and strong! and yet he whined. Beggars about Naples will whine, though they will laugh in a moment, and will pour manifold blessings on you if you bestow a soldo upon them, and the spirit of Neapolitan beggary extends quite as far away from the city as Sorrento, to speak within even unlikely bounds.

He held an unhappy thrush in his brown hand, and twisted round a finger was one end of a bit of string, whose other end was tied to the bird's leg.

He let it fly a little way.

"A good bird," said he, dropping the whine; "un buon uccello, signora. Will she buy?"

"Buy!" cried an English lady in virtuous indignation. "No—certainly not! You are cruel—far too cruel; you are the third boy I have seen this afternoon selling birds."

"Sì, sì, signora; those are my brothers. We catch the birds and we sell them."

"That is your trade, is it?" And the lady looked round.

What a lovely scene was about her! The fresh, spring green was about all the fields; the road, mounting higher and higher, wound in and out through orange and lemon gardens, their golden fruit shining in the blaze of the burning sun; the sky above was one still dome of motionless blue; the fair sea—the Bay of Naples—was one moving sheen of dancing blue and silver as the spray sprang aloft and eddied white and wild at the foot of the rocks. Away to the left, out of the sea rose clearly the grottoed island of Capri; straight across the bay were the distant and half-misty little Procida, sheltered by the round, stronger, bigger Ischia; to the right circled the white houses, and heights, and castles of Naples. Ending all these rose the funnel-shaped peak of Vesuvius, soiling the blue of the summer sky with an ever-rising cloud of pale smoke.

More and more white houses clustered carelessly round the foot of the dangerous mountain. All was far enough away for the dirt and beggary to be hidden. One only saw the beauty and the picturesque loveliness and grace; one seemed to breathe an atmosphere of poetic music and tender delicacy of form. Who ever thought of the fire-destroyed cities of old, or of the buried hundreds who a thousand years ago were dashed out of their careless lives into a hideous burning grave? So it is; one lives on and never thinks. To-morrow the very same doom may come again.

The English lady was thinking very much in this way as she walked quietly along. She knew Sorrento quite well, but she had some young people with her who did not, and they were rambling ahead of her and getting flowers. What thousands of flowers were everywhere! fragile spring flowers, hiding in the lush grass; one bank rosy with nodding cyclamens, then a hollow blue with forget-me-nots, poppies flaunting scarlet, and buds of roses bulging out thick and green, waiting for a few more suns to bid them awake. Mulberry-trees were in plenty, grown for their leaves, upon which the silkworms—they make half the trade of Sorrento—thrive. A knot of young men and girls were stripping a tree of the leaves for the purpose of feeding these wealth-making creatures. A ladder was against the tree, and a girl was high up.

Her olive-green skirt was short enough to show a pair of brown bare feet; the sleeves of her grey cotton bodice hung loose, and showed strong brown hands and arms; an orange handkerchief was pinned round her neck, above all was a brown laughing face.

"You, Pasquale," she cried, "go and strip that tree. We do all the work and you look on."

"Sì, sì," laughed the lad, "of course I look on when you are up there to look at. There is plenty of time."

"Yes, always plenty of time. You are too lazy for me. Go!" She flourished an arm, then, steadying herself on her ladder, she unpinned the orange kerchief, and, seeing the sun was high and scorching, she put it over the curly black head and tied the corners of it in the nape of her neck. One's head has to be taken care of down in the fiery south; one's body may go, but one's head—cover it from the sun.

"There are some foreigners," said the lad; "they are rich. I will ask for a soldo."

"You!" again cried the girl; "you know it is forbidden. Padre Luca will come to you, and they do say that some day one will be put in prison for begging."

It is true; at Sorrento civil and religious authorities are beginning the Augean work.

"Bah! some day," and Pasquale strolled away, getting another girl to go along with him.

Two English girls were just below him, the lady we have seen was just above him; which should he go to? The elder lady, because she was gentle-looking, and he thought she had given 'Cinto, with the bird, some money. 'Cinto had run past with his hands in his pockets whistling.

"Ah, signora, un soldo, un soldo. We are so hungry, so hungry," both he and the girl cried together.

They were dashed aside by the two English girls who were hurrying up. One had the thrush in her hand.

"Is it not a horrible thing," they burst, "tying up a thrush like this. We just bought it so as to free it. Have you got a knife to cut the string, auntie?"

No, the lady had not.

"The bird must be freed," said one girl hotly, "and there is no untying the knot. Take care, you'll break the creature's leg."

But Pasquale had a knife, and it was not the first bird he had helped to free. Neither was it the first bird he had captured, as very probably in half an hour he would re-capture this poor, frightened, half-maimed one.

"You have been taken in," laughed the lady, as she watched the operation and saw the bird fly with his broken wing a short distance, then hop, then try to fly again. "It is useless trying to free birds here. You must not buy them; that is the only way to cure the boys' cruelty."

"I don't believe it!" cried the girl, who was full of impulse.

"Nevertheless, it is true, Mattie." How quietly the lady spoke! "You know it is true," and she spoke in Italian to Pasquale.

"Sì, signora, sì. The signora knows well the boys will do it. I did it myself when I was young!" What virtue shone in the lad's handsome brown eyes. "Will the signora give a soldo? We work, but ah, the maestro gives us so little."

"I think I know what the maestro gives," said the lady gently. "Besides, I never give to anyone who begs. I will help those who work, but I will not help a beggar."

The girls and she had met just beneath the mulberry-tree. The girl upon the ladder was known to these English people.

"Lina Fresco," said the lady, "how are they all at home? You have got work at last."

"Yes, signora, yes. For three days I have been here." She flushed rosy red. "Are those the signorine who will see the Sorrento work, the English signorine you spoke about?"

"Yes, and we are going to-morrow, or the next day, to Signor Garboni's workshops, to see how it is all done. Do you think there is anybody there who will care to show us over?"

"Signora!" exclaimed Lina. She set her heels firmly on a rung of the ladder, leaned her back against its upward slope, and clasped her hands with a vivid action. "You know it all, signora," she cried, "ah yes, you know it all. And I will see Petrino to-night, and I will tell him to be ready; it is he who shall show the signorine everything—yes, he."

"Is it Garboni's work the signora will see?" cried the lad Pasquale.

Everybody was standing near everybody else, so to speak, and there had been no hush over either Lina's words or those of her English friend.

"Garboni's work is not of the best; is there not that of the Cavaliere San Monti? It is there that my father works, he would devote himself to the signorine if they would go to him; the signora will permit me to lead her?"

The unthinking grace of the lad's action of head and hand cannot be reproduced in words. He was an Italian, of the people—that will suggest much.

"No, no," the lady shook her head. "I have promised Lina."

"All for that Petrino," sneered Pasquale. "What good is he?"

Love is a fire, and down in Italy it sets tongues to say wild words.

"What good?" the second girl, Rosetta, cried hotly. "More good than there is in thee, Pasquale. Lina chooses him before you."

"Does she? I say she does not. Will I not kill him? Will I not—"

The lad gave a short sharp cry of rage.

"Ha, ha, ha!" Rosetta flicked her thumbs, flung up her arms, and twisted round in a mocking dance.

Rosetta would have Pasquale for her lover, and Pasquale would have Lina, there was the whole sum and substance of the scene.

Lina was not lacking equal fire.

"What are you, you Pasquale, that you talk of hurting Petrino? He is strong, he will not be killed by you. Can he not fight? Ah, you are hateful to me!"

She clapped her hands together, then as sharply flung them over her eyes, and burst out crying.

"Petrino mio, Petrino mio! and I have brought thee to this. Why did I not dissemble? why did I not hide my love for thee? Go, you Pasquale, go, idle, lazy, you beg—go!"

She flung her arms out wildly, then dashing round, set to work plucking mulberry-leaves.

"What a rage!" said one of the English girls. "Do they mean what they say? It is not safe to live amongst them."

"It is nothing," said the lady quietly; "in a few minutes they will be friends. I have no fears for Petrino's life," she laughed gently, "but I wish Pasquale would see fit to admire Rosetta. She is a little monkey, and she has a spite against 'Lina.'"

So they went on talking, and they at last got to an old monastery high on the hillside, a monastery with a history, and about which clung old legends and old customs.

Presently they turned, and strolled home as the sun fell. Purpling shadows clothed the hills, ribbons of gold and crimson floated from the sky down on to the darkening waters of the bay, heralds of the sunset which as yet was far enough off. Fisher-folk were singing from the boats below, children and boys and girls were singing on the hills above, assuredly they were a light-hearted people.

'Cinto was on the road again, trying to sell another bird he had caught to some other strangers as the ladies passed along.

There was no hurry, and things came in the way, as things often do, to push aside one's projects. Miss Daly went hither and thither with the girls; for example, they went for two days over to Capri, and stayed ten days instead; they saw many lovely places, and well—to sum all up in a few words, the visit to the manufactory of Sorrento carved work was put aside for nearly three weeks. Neither did they see 'Lina Fresco much during that time—when one is out from one's hotel from early morning until nightfall one naturally misses many a sight of familiar and more stationary faces.

However, things had not been at a standstill.

Pasquale had nursed his anger, and he had declared to himself—nay, he had done more than this—and he had flung fiery words before Rosetta, about the vengeance he would wreak on Petrino for stealing 'Lina.

"Stealing 'Lina!" taunted Rosetta. "How could he steal from you what you never had? 'Lina never cared that," she snapped her fingers, "for you—never will! She is so good, so industrious, so wise; do you suppose she will have anything to say to an idle, lazy fellow like you? No, no, not at all! Get to work if you want her."

"You, talking of work!" retorted Pasquale.

"Yes, me, me! Do I not know the worth of a man who works? No need for me to work—no, I am not going to be married, but, there, if you want 'Lina Fresco you had better go and work. Lazy, you always were lazy—next, you will want the bread eaten for you."

"Will I?" he muttered.

Nevertheless, either taunts, or love, or jealousy made him act, and he did get work at the Garboni manufactory. Not being skilled he was far below Petrino, whose hands could do the best and most delicate work.

So things went on.

Then one day, a ten-lire note was lost from Signor Garboni's own desk. Men had been in and out, and not one more than another could be suspected. All were searched.

The note was found in Petrino Vali's box of tools.

Petrino was sent away.

He was known to be saving money for his wedding; but he was honest. Well, the most honest fail. However, having been so honest they did not punish him, but sent him away.

All this came to the knowledge of Miss Daly only on the day when she and her nieces went to see the work done. She had openly asked if a workman, called Petrino Vali, might show her round as she knew him and his people.

There was no workman in the place called Petrino Vali.

Pasquale sprang forward—so handsome, so clean, so neat he was; such a new, transformed Pasquale! And he it was who told the history.

"And 'Lina Fresco?" asked Miss Daly.

"Ah, the poverina!" sighed he. "She weeps, and she does not speak much; but, can she wait for a man who does not work, and who is—is a thief?"

"I do not believe it of Vali," said Miss Daly decidedly.

"No, signora, one would not believe it," answered Pasquale with serenely quiet virtue. He shrugged his shoulders, however. "But," said he, "what can one say? He hid the money there with his tools—yes, there!" and he dramatically threw out his hand, and pointed to a box in a corner.

"Poor 'Lina!" moaned the girl Mattie.

"The signorina is so good," exclaimed Pasquale, leading them out of one room to another; "it will console 'Lina if I tell her. But do not let the signorina grieve, it will pass away—always it is so—'Lina will forget in time."

Did 'Lina forget?

Not at all. But the fire in her died out, and instead of blaming anyone or rebelling, she simply sat still and waited. These words must, of course, be taken metaphorically, for she worked on, and when the gathering of mulberry-leaves was done, she began other work. She set up as a washerwoman for the hotels, and Miss Daly helped her on. But as to forgetting—there was a look in the girl's grave face which said she would never forget.

People looked askance at her because she too did not turn her back on Petrino; what honest girl would be betrothed to a thief? What else was Petrino?

'Lina heard—people of her class do not veil their words; what they think they say, and if they feel scorn they certainly show it. So of course 'Lina knew what was thought about her, and, taking to herself all her strength, she never answered back a word, but went on her way silently.

Time went on, and seeing she was so quiet, Pasquale, trim and gay, went to her as a lover. He was nearly as well-to-do as Petrino had been.

Then 'Lina was no longer quiet. How her dark eyes flashed, how her lips trembled, as they poured out angry and cutting words. How she scorned him, how she taunted him with wishing evil—she grew hot and unguarded—with acting evil against Petrino. She scarcely knew what she said, she accused Pasquale of taking her lover from her—how she hated—hated him for it! She declared he was himself the more likely thief. He it was who had ruined Petrino—he it was who had driven Petrino away.

The hot words poured forth like a stream of burning lava, to take a simile from the locality—they terrified, they subdued the gay and confident Pasquale.

He went away from her quite pale, and with his handsome head bent.

Had she, in her righteous anger, happened to hit upon the truth?

Vali had gone away, and this had made 'Lina very sore. She would have had him stay in Sorrento, and live down the evil tales that had gone abroad. So often women are in this way more courageous than men—she could not persuade him to think as she did, and he had gone, gone to try for work, any work at Castellamare. Perhaps he would have to go farther, even to Naples if the ill news clung to him. She had no power over him, and a long time went by without knowing what was happening.

There were the communal schools, and 'Lina could read and write, also Vali could do some little in that way, but, ignorance was about them, and they neither of them thought of there being much possibility of hearing of each other. Ignorance, certainly, kept 'Lina from devising any means of clearing Petrino by legal enquiry.

No; she and he must wait.

So she washed, and he became porter at the Castellamare railway-station.

The summer had followed on to the spring—nay, who could tell which day had been spring and which was summer? However, the figs were swelling round, and fat, and luscious on the sunny hills of Sorrento. Crowds and crowds of English travelling folk had left, and were leaving those fiery southern lands. Miss Daly and the girls, her nieces, were going too; one day they went to say good-bye to 'Lina Fresco.

"We shall see Petrino at Castellamare; what shall we say to him for you, 'Lina?" asked Mattie.

"Say, signorina? What is there to say? I wait. That is all—we—he and I—we wait. Petrino is honest, he never took that note. He steal a note of ten lire!" The girl's face flushed.

"It is not likely—"

They had waited long enough, Miss Daly thought, so what did she do? She was energetic, and she knew Italians, she spoke Italian well, and she could say the right words of appeal to an Italian's sense of justice.

Well, no time was lost. Signor Garboni saw what she wanted; if Petrino Vali were a protégé of hers, he had been a good workman of his, far better than the gay, showy Pasquale.

He made enquiries; he had a long talk with the first man of law in Sorrento. No one ever knows until they see that it is done, how law can discover secrets, and can turn appearances of one sort quite inside out, as one might say, so that the appearances bear quite another character.

The fates were propitious; just at this very time a merchant of valuable hard wood, such wood as one uses in the Sorrento work, went to Garboni's. He had not been there for many weeks, nay, it so chanced that his last visit had been on the morning of the very day whose afternoon saw Vali, the head workman, accused, convicted, and dismissed.

Naturally, Signor Garboni having his head full of Vali and his affairs, spoke about them to Maestro Bullini.

"Gran Dio!" cried the seller of wood, "and I was here and saw it done! Done with the impudence of Messer Diavolo himself. Ha, ha! The fellow is a genius of a thief!"

"Is he?" returned Garboni grimly. "I want no such geniuses here."

"That is quite another thing, signor, quite another thing! This rare wood now! I have not shown it you before; it will make an innovation in your work—look! pale green. I offer it to you first. Is not your custom larger for me than that of the Cavaliere over the way?"

"Bah! deceive San Monti, if you can; I know it. Is it not pear-wood, steeped in—in—"

"Tchu, tchu, tchu!" and Bullini threw up his arms, "and I thought no man but I had the secret! You will not tell?"

"Not I," loftily said Garboni. "Clear up my secret, and I will let yours alone. How do you mean the theft was an impudent theft? What did you see?"

"Simply this. One of your men walked coolly up to your table, opened a box, and took out a note. As he came along he twisted it about in his fingers, the villain, just as if he had been sent to fetch it by the signor himself."

"He did, did he? He was not sent by me. Do I send men to my cash-box? Do I ever leave it unlocked?"

"You had done so that day," said Bullini sturdily.

"Yes, I had. I remember my wife wanted money, and I carried it into the house to her, leaving my books open and my box unlocked—for three minutes."

The fat little merchant shrugged his shoulders. "Three moments were enough, it seems," he said philosophically.

"He was a tall, thin man, in a blue blouse," began Garboni; "a man with a long head and close-cut hair. They are trying to make me believe he never did it, just because he had always been honest before."

"Chè, chè!" broke in Bullini before his customer had half finished. "Nothing of the sort; nothing of the sort."

"How! What do you mean?" Signor Garboni drew himself up rather haughtily. No man likes to find himself in the wrong; a clear-headed business man, too, such as he was.

"Per Bacco! but you are wrong, signor. My man was no long sword of a man, but a strong-limbed rascal, an Apollo of a man. Nay, he was but a lad, I'm thinking, but he had the features of a god; aye, and the curls of Bacco himself!"

"Ha!"

"Truly, truly," and Bullini nodded his round head stolidly. "I would know him again among a hundred."

"Would you?"

"Ah, that would I."

"Follow me, then, and when you see your man walk up to him, and make some remark about his work."

Bullini gave a little chuckle. What Italian, even be he but a seller of valuable woods, is there who does not love a little finesse?

Three minutes after he had set his hand on Pasquale's shoulder.

"Ah, my lad," said he, "your work is quick, quick; too quick to be delicate. Where is Vali? He was the man for the delicate work."

Pasquale's brown face paled.

It was found out that Pasquale had put the note amongst Vali's things from pure jealousy. What he tried for, however, he never got, for Lina had never for an instant swerved from her faith in Petrino.

Pasquale was dismissed, and immediately he gave up work altogether. He and the gay, lazy Rosetta were a pair; they went off together, and they may be seen going about Naples selling flowers, selling fruit, singing—doing all sorts of things; never doing any steady work.

There was a festa that day, and early in the morning there had been a grand procession. Many priests from other places came in, and as to the number of candles that were alight, who could count them?

Mattie, the English girl, tried to count, and she was stopped; her sister pulled her aside.

"There they are," whispered Nell.

"Who?"

"The bride and bridegroom. They are too early, they will have to wait till all this procession is over. What sillies to come so soon!"

"Better than being too late," smiled Mattie.

There they are, a party of seven. An old brown man and woman, Lina's father and mother; then a young man and his wife, Petrino's brother and sister-in-law; next Lina's sister, glorious in a scarlet skirt and pink bodice, and with the roundest and largest of red-gold rings in her ears, a white handkerchief, with lace on it, was pinned across on her breast—surely she was grand that day!

Petrino, too, how sober, but how glad he looked! He was a bridegroom to be proud of, so tall and straight, so well-clad in his brown-cloth suit; how well, too, did the glistening ends of his neckerchief become him, all of blood-red silk—real Sorrento silk.

Lina was the prettiest of brides. Her brown face was bent—what bride is not a little shy and bashful?—but she walked along proudly. Had she not a right to be proud? She had held out bravely against half the town, and she had conquered. Of course she was proud, and she forgot her shyness, and talked with her English friends as they all saw the priests and the choristers, and the banners and canopies, go round and round the church.

"That is the end, signorina," she all at once said, and she gave Mattie a little clutch on her arm. "That is the end, they will all go through that door. Tell me when Padre Luca comes out, signorina. Tell me, will you?"

"Padre Luca? Oh, I know," nodded Mattie. "When he comes, he comes to—to—for the wedding!"

My Secret.

I HAVE a secret none must know,
I carry it where'er I go;
I hear it carolled by the birds,
But it is never told in words;
'Tis far too sweet for telling so.
Yet all the world it seems has guessed
The secret hidden in my breast,
Or why should everything seem strange?
What is there that has power to change
The sad to gay, the worst to best?
Ah no! the change must be in me,
With other eyes the world I see
And feel its beauty. Ask you whence
I gained this new and precious sense?
That is my secret; let it be!

His Own Guest.

(A SERIAL STORY.)

CHAPTER XXX.

No. 127, Broadway, New York, was one of those huge emporiums which of late years have sprung up in the capitals of the civilised globe, where anything and everything seems capable of being bought or hired.

Matters had prospered exceedingly with Messrs. Ridge, but although in flaring gold letters they announced upon their handsome plate-glass windows that they changed money, bought or sold stocks and shares, treated for the purchase and sale of lands, dealt in diamonds, were open to buy old artificial teeth, had the choicest assortment of fresh and dried fruits, were agents for the best known wine and spirit merchants in Europe, and could furnish an hotel or a cottage from garret to kitchen at a few hours' notice, yet the business that had been the keystone to their fortunes was now kept carefully in the background.

They had found that customers—their wealthier ones, especially—did not care to meet friends or acquaintances at a private-enquiry office, and having heard them give some such ostensible reason for their presence, as that Messrs. Ridge had a house put into their hands for sale, or knew of some one who wished to part with some rare old china, the thought struck them, why should they not have for sale the very things mentioned? Thus from an office their business grew into a store, and many a case of wine was ordered, and many a valuable bit of jewellery bought, owing to these chance meetings in the handsome building.

The gilded inscriptions upon the windows, which were intermixed with the arms of various countries and such announcements as "Ici on parle Français," and "Man Spricht Deutsch," served to veil, in great measure, the goods that were piled within, and to whet the appetites of the passing connoisseurs in china, armoury, old coins, rare furniture, or gorgeous Eastern stuffs; forcing them to enter if they wished to have a more complete view of the coveted article.

The firm of W. and F. Ridge consisted of two brothers, William being the elder and Francis the younger. In spite of their somewhat rigid rules, and of the questionable nature of some of the transactions in which they embarked, they were both liked by their large staff, and as a commission on all sales effected was given to the employés, there were few houses more sought after by the commercial youth of New York than theirs.

About the same time as Lady Meredith was debating as to the wisdom of giving her entire confidence to her new friend and ally, Gordon, Messrs. Ridge were closeted in their plainly-furnished office, discussing together two cablegrams received from England the previous day.

It was rarely that the brothers gave their joint attention to any individual subject, their respective services being in too general a demand; but whether there was a flavour of "Auld lang syne" in the matter before them, or whether, like Captain Skooter, they foresaw the making of money out of the Meredith secret, there they certainly both were discussing with no small amount of interest and energy not only the message sent by Colonel Skooter, but also one which had followed closely upon its heels from Gordon, who had also seen the advertisement.

"I felt sure," said the elder brother, "that something was queer about that first reply."

"Surely the sender cannot be the fellow who was mixed up in the notorious mine-swindle?"

"Why not? Maybe he thinks his name is not so well known, or that Ridge and Company is not so knowing a firm as it is."

"Anyhow, you think that the second message comes from Tom Meredith himself?"

"I do; but let me hear it again."

Francis Ridge took up the despatch which Gordon had sent, and read:

"T. M., alias Smith, may be communicated with as Mr. Gordon, at Meredith Court, Farehurst. Cable reply."

"Rum start that, a fellow living in his own house under an alias," commented the reader.

"Rather. But we've met with a good many rum starts in the course of our experience, and it's my opinion he's the real Simon Pure. It's an odd coincidence, and if we make anything out of this last job, quite a providential one, that three times the affairs of this young man have come to our knowledge."

"Three?"

"Yes, don't you remember? First, his stepmother set us to report upon his goings-on, then came the affair of our agent recognising him on board a vessel at sea, and now the death of Fletcher brings him to the front again. For the first job we sent in a smartish account, which Lady Meredith paid without demur, then her ladyship gave us a handsome present, and now——"

"Now do you think we shall clear the expenses of our advertisement even?"

"I think Fletcher's death will be as profitable to us as though we had insured him in one of the best New York offices."

Fletcher, in whom will have been recognised the evil genius who had wrought so much mischief in Tom Meredith's life, had, after many fluctuations of fortune, found himself a porter in the warehouse of Messrs. Ridge and Co. He had been injured to death by the falling upon him of a bale of goods, and, during a period of delirium which followed the accident, had talked a great deal about an altered cheque, a letter, and Tom Meredith. It was during one of these attacks that he had received a visit from the senior partner, who instantly recognised the name Fletcher so repeatedly uttered. Prior to his death his faculties became clear, and on being asked the meaning of his words, and whether he had anything upon his conscience which he wished to reveal, he told Mr. William how he had altered a cheque which Tom had given him for six pounds to sixty, how fear of detection had caused him to flee the country, and how he had, in a fit of remorse, written to exonerate his friend and beg his forgiveness. No reply had been received, and the fear had grown upon him that his letter never reached its destination. Having, however, obtained employment, he feared to reveal his address, and so, until the fatal accident, he took no further steps in the matter.

A memorandum of their clerk's death, and of the confession he had made, was entered in the private books of the firm, but nothing else was done at the time, a busy one with them, as they were then largely increasing their business, and it was not until some years afterwards, when searching back for some other matter, the senior partner's eye fell upon the entry, and made him come to the conclusion that the expense of an advertisement for the wrongly accused man was worth risking.

Now came the question how much they should reveal or how much keep back, and after a long and exhaustive discussion between the brothers, it was decided to put Gordon, alias Tom Meredith, in possession of the whole matter, and trust to his generosity as to the amount of the reward.

The reply cablegram ran thus:

"Man in our employ named Fletcher left declaration of altering cheque of Sir F. M.'s from six pounds to sixty. Wrote exonerating son years ago. Full particulars on receipt of proof of identity."

The draft made by the elder brother was copied on to a telegram-form by the younger, who also entered it in the private memorandum-book.

In reply to the summons of the bell, a clerk entered the room.

He was a dark, good-looking Frenchman, with small hands and feet, was dressed in the height of New York dandyism, or as it would now be called, dudeism, had his hair iron-curled, and his moustaches liberally pomaded.

Messrs. Ridge and Co. had employés of all nationalities in their service, and had an unwashed pig-tailed Chinaman, instead of the dapper little Frenchman, answered their ring, they would have been in no wise disconcerted.

"Here is a message, M. Ernest, to go off at once," said Mr. Ridge, senior. "It is entered in our book, and you will, therefore, have nothing to do but hand it into the office in its sealed envelope."

The clerk bowed, and withdrew with the paper which contained such news of import to the dwellers at Meredith Court.

"Having disposed of telegram number two, what are you going to do, brother, about number one?" asked Mr. Francis.

"Do? Answer it also, but how I have not quite decided."

"We shall get nothing from that quarter."

"Nothing in the way of coin, but I shall have the pleasure of disconcerting a rascal who nearly took me in with those Cortez Mine shares."

And so the answering of Colonel Skooter's message was put off for the moment, but for the moment only.

CHAPTER XXXI.

In her own apartment Lady Meredith was awaiting with no small degree of anxiety the appearance of the man who had so won her confidence, that she had resolved to trust him in all things except in that of the fraud of her stepson's death at sea. Such an opinion had she of Gordon's honourable disposition, that she felt his knowledge of such deceit would inevitably lose him to her as an ally.

No, she would remain silent as to the action she had taken in that business, and repeat her conviction that the individual who claimed to be Thomas Meredith was an impostor, and strive to alienate Gordon's sympathies from the reported dead Tom, by showing him in the light of an ingrate, a forger, and one totally unfitted to have ever been the head of an old and honoured family.

Punctual to his appointment, Gordon left the dinner-table, but was delayed in the hall a few moments by meeting with Edith, who, her arm linked in that of Mary's, was en route for the library in search of some books. Evidently an understanding had been come to between the two young ladies, and Mary was looking brighter than she had done for some days, in spite of what Edith designated as "Charley's sulks."

"And wouldn't you sulk," Mary had said, "if someone who had liked you, and whom you——"

"Worshipped in return."

"For shame, Edith! Whom you liked in return, suddenly became cold and disagreeable, and let you think someone else was being preferred to you. Wouldn't you sulk?"

"I don't think I should ever care sufficiently for anyone to do that," replied Edith with a toss of her well-shaped head.

"Suppose Mr. Gordon was to flirt with someone," said Mary.

"I should enjoy the fun. Then you admit having flirted with that delectable creature, Colonel Skooter? Mary, I'm ashamed of you."

"No, no; I didn't do that, but I let Sir Charles——"

"Oh, Sir Charles, is it now? Hoity-toity! you'll be expecting me to call you her ladyship next."

"Edith, I wish you would not tease; I wanted to say that I let Charles——"

"That's good, but Charley would be better."

"That I let Charles think I had not rejected the offer of becoming Colonel Skooter's wife. I had promised Lady Meredith I would lead her son to believe he must not think of me. But then, Edith, you were even worse; I heard you say you would never marry except to become Lady Meredith."

"Neither will I."

"What do you mean?"

"That's my secret, little one. You shall know some day, but in the interim were I in your place I should chase away from Charley's brow and voice those sulks which you seem to think the prospect of having Edith Pennington for a bride instead of Mary Ray fully justifies his indulging in. Seriously, Mary, you ought to try and make the poor fellow look a little less unhappy."

"Edith, I dare not; I promised Lady Meredith, to whom I am under a heavy debt of gratitude, that I would not stand between him and his welfare."

"Which welfare means marrying an heiress, which heiress means me; but as I am not going to marry him, where is the welfare which you would stand between?"

It was at this point of the conversation that Gordon met them.

"What is the subject under discussion?" he asked.

"The fable of the dog in the manger," said Edith. "We are discussing a young lady who, though she doesn't want a youth of her acquaintance to marry anyone else, won't accept him herself."

"Does he care for her?"

"She fancies so."

"Oh, Edith!"

"Does she care for him?"

"That depends—different people see the same thing in different lights. He has asked her for her love, and she talks about a fortune."

"Don't mind what she says, Mr. Gordon; if you knew her half as well as I do you wouldn't, I'm sure. Once she gets into a teasing mood she's dreadful."

"Forewarned, forearmed; when she's in one of those moods, I shall know how to behave."

"How's that, sir, pray?" demanded Edith.

"Do as I am about to do now,

"Run away,
And live to fight another day."

With which words Gordon laughingly kissed his hand to the girls, and left them. As he approached the door of Lady Meredith's room the smile faded from his face, and was replaced by an expression more in accordance with the serious work that lay before him.

On his entry, Lady Meredith installed him in the most comfortable armchair the room boasted.

"I have asked you here this evening, Mr. Gordon, to tell you of the difficult position in which I am placed, and to beg you—the occasion given—to be my friend and ally."

She held out her hand gracefully towards him. A plump fair hand, on which shone one valuable gem. It was a hand a young girl might have been proud to own.

To its owner's surprise Gordon did not offer to take it.

Mystification and surprise were Lady Meredith's first feelings—a belief that he had not seen her gesture; the next—

"From the short conversation on the subject of my stepson this afternoon, Mr. Gordon," she said, "it appears you know something of the sad business. It has been a terrible trial to me, I can assure you."

Gordon bowed an assent to the assurance which her ladyship sought to strengthen by wiping her eyes with a pocket-handkerchief of texture about as stout as a cobweb.

"You also know a little of his affairs," she went on.

"Yes, a little."

"That he altered a cheque which Sir Frederick, the most indulgent and kindest of fathers, had entrusted to him, to a considerable sum larger than it was drawn for?"

"I did not know that."

"There can be no doubt such was the case. I can show you the incriminating document."

She spoke with such an air of conviction that Gordon began to think she really did believe her stepson guilty of the fraud; but if so, why had she suppressed Fletcher's letter?

He had received the American telegram immediately before meeting Mary and Edith on their way to the library.

She drew a small, curiously-carved sandal-wood box which was on the table towards her, and opening it, took out the forged cheque.

"See," she said, "here is the evidence of Tom Meredith's guilt. Is it not clear?" she went on, handing the document to him.

"And this bit of paper," thought Gordon, "is what has kept me from my birthright. I have only to destroy it, and what charge can be brought against me? Why should I hesitate? I have suffered already for a crime I did not commit. Yet, stay; such an act would be even more foolish than wrong, since this document will serve to confirm the declaration of poor Fletcher."

Lady Meredith was growing impatient at his silence.

"It is clear, I hope," she insisted.

"Your ladyship hopes?" Gordon exclaimed in simulated surprise.

"You misinterpret my meaning. My question is, Is not this cheque convincing of Tom Meredith's dishonour?"

"As convincing as the memorial-stone in the church is convincing of Tom Meredith's death," Gordon replied.

The answer was so unexpected that Lady Meredith turned white, and her hand shook so that the next paper she took out fell from her fingers on to the floor at her feet. It was the letter she had received from him but a few days before, claiming the estate.

He stooped to pick it up, and handed it to her, but did not offer to return the forged cheque. In spite of his mental arguments, he felt loth to part with it.

Again Lady Meredith sought to reassure herself with the belief that the simile Gordon had used was, like his ignoring the hand she had offered him—accidental.

It nevertheless seemed to make the telling of her story more difficult.

"Have you no other papers?" he asked after a moment's pause.

"Several," she replied, taking sundry bills and I O Us, which Sir Frederick had paid for his son, from the box. "I do not think; however, they will help us much."

As the evidence of his own recklessness, of his father's long and severely-tried kindness, lay before him, Gordon's heart seemed to soften towards the woman whom his father had so loved, and he could not but admit that he had given the young wife cause to dread and dislike him.

"I think, Lady Meredith," he said, "these will help us to come to a conclusion. Look," he said, comparing one document, taken at hazard from the rest, with his own letter sent from London.

"The writing is very like," she regretfully admitted.

"Like! It is identical. Believe me, the man who wrote the one wrote the other."

"Surely," she said in great agitation, "surely, Mr. Gordon, you are not going over to the enemy?"

"Most men, Lady Meredith, are their own enemies. No man has exemplified the truth of that saying more than I in my life have done. I am going over to my own cause now, and in that sense am joining my own enemy as well as yours."

"You are speaking in enigmas."

"I will do so no longer. I am Tom Meredith, my lady!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

HAD a thunderbolt fallen at Lady Meredith's feet she could not have been more surprised and agitated.

"You—you!" she gasped. "It is impossible!"

"It is true. Look at my features, listen to my voice. Surely both must be familiar to you now that their identity is pointed out. Stay, let my signature speak for me."

He took a pen, and across one of Lady Meredith's dainty sheets of note-paper, headed with her monogram, signed his name—"Tom Meredith."

It was as though his words had fallen upon the paper, and been retained as evidence in his favour.

"I see it all now. I have been duped, deceived! But if you are Tom Meredith, you dare not proclaim yourself, with a crime hanging over your head?"

"Of which crime I alone possess the proof," he said, holding up the cheque.

"Yes, you are Tom Meredith," she said, "no other man would have stooped to gain his end by such trickery and falsehood as you have shown. Give me back that paper, it is mine!"

With her head thrown proudly back, and her graceful figure drawn to its full height, Lady Meredith advanced towards her stepson to retake the cheque.

"Nay," he said, stretching out his hand and bringing the strip of paper within a few inches of the flame of a candle which was burning upon a table, "let us be just; if I am guilty of trickery, who has driven me to it? Did you not say you would use every means to keep me out of my inheritance! Do you think it likely that I, who have lived half my life under the suspicion of a crime I never committed, will not destroy its evidence now I have the chance?"

"You dare not, it is mine."

"No, as the heir of my father, mine."

"You the heir of Sir Frederick! Who will believe you?"

"Who? You do, and the world will; my proofs are irrefragable."

"Let them be as powerful as they will, they cannot prevent my branding you as a forger; yes, even the destruction of the cheque will not save you. The bankers who were consulted in the matter are still living, and can—nay, shall, confirm what I say."

"I shall not destroy the cheque, Lady Meredith; I have a better way of clearing my good name than that."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, and so have you."

"I am again at a loss to understand you."

"Do not feign ignorance of what I mean, but for this one act on your part, I could forgive the past and say 'Let us be friends.'"

"Friends! I will show you that, though you seemed to value my friendship so long as it aided your plans, you have underrated the power of my hate. You think to come here as a thief, under a false name, and snatch away our possessions and cheat my son of his title, but I tell you no; so long as the paper you hold in your hand exists, you shall not. If you destroy it, then your title shall come to you smirched and disgraced. Do you think the world will sympathise with one who by trickery has succeeded in destroying the evidence of his guilt? I tell you I love my son more dearly than life, and you will learn what my power is when you are forced to fly the country for a second time, scorned by all, and branded as a felon."

"For my father's—your husband's sake you dare not do it."

"Dare not proclaim the crime of a guilty man? I dare, and will."

"The suspected crime of an innocent man, of one whom you know to be innocent, Lady Meredith. I repeat you dare not."

"I know to be innocent! You are joking."

"Can you tell me you believe Tom Meredith guilty of the crime you impute to him?"

The impressive tones rather than the words of the question astonished the stepmother.

"On my soul I believe him guilty," she replied, "and why should I not?" she went on. "His extravagant habits, his bad companions, the cheque, his flight—"

"And on the other hand?"

"Nothing but his own denial."

"And the confession of the real offender, Lady Meredith."

"What confession?"

"The one conveyed in a letter to me which you suppressed."

"I suppressed? It is false."

There was the ring of truthful denial in her words.

"If I could only believe so I might forgive all," Gordon said.

The words, meant to be conciliatory, caused their hearer's anger to flame forth afresh.

"You forgive! You!" she cried. "You come here to rob your father's son of the house and possessions which for years he has thought were his, and then, forsooth, offer to forgive and forget. What new fraud, what new deception is this you are trying to palm off upon me in the matter of the imaginary letter?"

"Not imaginary, Lady Meredith, but one that was sent to me here, although I never received it. Thank Heaven, however, it is not now necessary to prove me innocent, for its writer, although he is dead, made further confession. I will be more generous to you than you have been to me, and say that I do believe in your assertion that you know nothing of a letter in which the man, William Fletcher, owned to being the alterer of this cheque, and which letter was addressed to me."

"In which of your aliases?" asked her ladyship contemptuously.

"In that of my rightful title, Sir Thomas Meredith, I assume. Since it has not reached your ladyship, I assume it has been lost."

During Gordon's reply to his stepmother's taunting question, old Watts had entered the room with a message saying Colonel Skooter had received an important telegram and wished to see her ladyship in the drawing-room.

"How on earth can the man's telegram concern me?" thought Lady Meredith. "Say I will be with him in a few minutes," was her reply.

"Watts looked very odd and upset, he scarcely seemed capable of delivering his message," Gordon thought.

He would have been still more surprised had he seen his behaviour on getting outside the room.

The old man staggered against the wall for support, and pressed his withered hands against his forehead as though trying to recall something.

"Addressed to Sir Thomas Meredith—but not lost, not lost, only mislaid," he muttered feebly.

Never Alone.

(A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS.)

CHAPTER I.

THE first person to tell me the news was Mrs. Denny.

This was scarcely to be wondered at, seeing that by common consent Mrs. Denny was looked upon as news-purveyor and gossip-monger in chief to our little community.

She was a widow, rich, and childless. She had lived in Eccleby for more than twenty years, and I verily believe she knew everybody in the town and for a circle of a dozen miles round it. She had a pretty basket-carriage with a pair of ponies, which she drove herself, and I seldom missed seeing her, unless the weather happened to be very bad indeed, in the course of my morning or afternoon round among my patients. If I did not see Mrs. Denny herself, I was pretty sure to see the basket-carriage waiting at someone's door, and then I knew that she was not far away. Dear, dear, what a tongue the good woman had!

On this particular afternoon Mrs. Denny drew up her ponies and beckoned me with her finger. I crossed over and shook hands with her.

"As a matter of course you have heard the news, Dr. Bland?" she said.

That was Mrs. Denny's way—to assume that you were acquainted with some particular morsel of news, when all the time she knew quite well that it had not yet reached your ears. An irritating way, I called it.

"To what news in particular do you refer, Mrs. Denny?"

"Have you not heard that Mr. Muncastle is coming home at last, and that he is going to settle down at Bewleigh?"

No, I had not heard, and my looks must have betrayed the surprise I felt.

"I have it on the best authority, or I would not venture to mention such a thing," continued Mrs. Denny. "And quite time, too, that he did settle down."

"Perhaps he is going to give a mistress to the old house. Men generally do settle down when they get married."

"N—no, I fancy not. At least, I have heard of no such arrangement. Besides, Mr. Muncastle must be too old to marry."

"Are men ever too old to do foolish things? Mr. Muncastle cannot be more than fifty."

"Well, I hope with all my heart that he is married. Then, perhaps, we shall have a little more life and gaiety in the place, and goodness knows we need them badly enough."

With that Mrs. Denny gave me the tips of her primrose gloves, flicked up her ponies, and was round the corner in half a minute. I have no doubt she had a longer round of visits to pay that afternoon than I.

I always liked to have some scrap of news to take home. My sister had been an invalid for years, and rarely stirred out of doors, and the narrowed interests of her life made a little gossip about any of our friends or neighbours more welcome than it might have been under happier circumstances.

"It will be fifteen years on the 2nd of next October, since the late Mr. Muncastle died," was my sister's first comment when I told her Mrs. Denny's news.

I may remark that Barbara had a most tenacious memory, and was a perfect epitome with regard to dates of all kinds.

"The present Mr. Muncastle came to his cousin's funeral," she went on, "but only stayed at the Hall for two days after that event. There had been some quarrel in the family, and he had not been at Bewleigh since he was a boy."

"If I remember rightly," said I, "some considerable time elapsed before he came near it again."

"Two years and a half, and then he only stayed for ten days."

"It must have been on that occasion that he came to consult me. He was troubled with insomnia, if I recollect rightly."

"He was; and I remember the description you gave of him when you came to dinner. You said he was a saturnine-looking man, tall, lean, and dark; that he spoke no more than was absolutely necessary, and seemed to be of a very reserved disposition."

Barbara's words recalled Mr. Muncastle vividly to my recollection. I remembered feeling at the time that he was one of those individuals with whom it seems next to impossible ever to become on familiar terms.

"He has been at Bewleigh once or twice since then, has he not?" I asked.

"Only twice, and on neither occasion did he stay more than a few days."

"What can have been his motive, I wonder, for deserting his home in the way he has done?"

"Mere eccentricity, maybe; or, perhaps, an inordinate love of travel, and a perpetual craving for change of scene."

Tidings of Mr. Muncastle had come to hand in a casual sort of way on several occasions. Now he was reported as being in Egypt; at another time he was heard of among the Rocky Mountains; anon there came tidings of him from Japan. One could never tell when or where he might be expected to turn up next.

All this time the old Hall had been left in charge of servants, the windows of its reception-rooms being closely shuttered, and all the stately old-fashioned furniture sheeted up in brown holland. The beautiful gardens, however, had always been carefully tended, and their produce in flowers, fruit, and vegetables sent off by railway to Covent Garden for sale. Two days' notice at any time would see both the house and grounds fit for the reception of their owner.

The news of Mr. Muncastle's proximate arrival created quite a flutter in the tepid circles of Eccleby society. We had had no such excitement since Squire Kynaston's daughter eloped with her father's groom, and we did not fail to make the most of it. Of course, the one great question was: Is Mr. Muncastle going to bring home a wife, or is he not?

Mammas with eligible daughters, who lingered unaccountably on their hands, hoped with all their hearts that he was still a bachelor; while others, like Mrs. Denny, trusted that he would bring with him a wife who would infuse a little more life, spirit, and gaiety into our somewhat stagnant coterie.

When, one day, three van-loads of modern furniture came down from London, and the rumour spread that a suite of rooms was being specially fitted up for a lady, the mammas were ready to give up the case in despair, while Mrs. Denny and others like her were proportionately radiant.

Then, a few days later, we heard that Mr. Muncastle had fixed the following Tuesday for his arrival.

Tuesday came in due course, and I am afraid to think how many ladies, who were fortunate enough to have windows that faced the road leading from the railway-station to the Hall, sat watching beside them all day long, and how many friends dropped in in the course of the afternoon to keep them company.

But the evening waned and darkened, till at length the street-lamps were lighted, but no Mr. Muncastle had put in an appearance. He must have been detained in town another day, and would doubtless arrive on the morrow. But, when the morrow came, we heard that he had arrived by the last train on the previous evening long after most of the worthy townfolk were in bed. We all felt as if we had been defrauded of something.

"Did I not tell you that Bewleigh would have a mistress at last?" asked Mrs. Denny with a smile of triumph. It was the afternoon of the day following Mr. Muncastle's arrival; and she had stopped her ponies as usual in order to speak to me.

Now it was I who had first suggested to Mrs. Denny the notion which she had just endeavoured to palm off as her own, but for the moment I let that pass.

"If I remember rightly, Mrs. Denny, you did say something about Mr. Muncastle bringing home a wife," I answered a little maliciously, "but I am not aware that he has done anything of the kind."

Mrs. Denny opened her eyes.

"Do you mean to say that the lady he brought home with him last night is not his wife?"

"She is certainly not Mrs. Muncastle," I replied, "because her name is Mrs. Dare. She is a widow, very handsome, not more than thirty years old, I should say, and yet her hair is snow-white."

For an instant or two Mrs. Denny could not speak. It was the first time I had known her to lose, even momentarily, that faculty so dear to her sex.

Taking advantage of the opportunity, I smiled, lifted my hat, and passed swiftly on my way. I heard afterwards that Mrs. Denny did not reach home to tea that afternoon till quite an hour beyond her ordinary time.

The way in which this news had come to me, and come so quickly, was very simple. Among my poorer patients was an old woman named Mary Vann, who had been bedridden for a couple of years.

Medical skill could do nothing for her, but I used to call in and see her once or twice a week, and send her a bottle of some harmless mixture now and then, so as not to let the old lady think she was being neglected. Mary Vann had a grand-daughter, Nancy Vann, who was parlour-maid at the Hall. On the morning following Mr. Muncastle's arrival, Nancy having been sent into the town on some special errand, had stolen five minutes, or it may be ten, to look in at her grandmother's and tell her the news, and leave her her weekly packet of snuff. Half an hour later I was listening at second-hand to all that Nancy had to tell. Thus it fell out that for once in a way I was able to steal a march on Mrs. Denny.

Although Mr. Muncastle came to the neighbourhood as an entire stranger, he need not have long remained so. His ancestors had lived at Bewleigh for centuries, and the fact that he lived there and was a Muncastle, would have sufficed to give him the entrée to the most exclusive county circles. We heard of one great person after another—I mean great in the eyes of us humble Eccleby folk—as having called and left their cards at Bewleigh, but we heard of no response to these well-meant attentions on the part of Mr. Muncastle, and, before long, it was given out that the state of his health was such as to imperatively demand the most absolute privacy and repose.

"If his constitution is so much out of repair," said Mrs. Denny to me one day, "how is it that one never hears of a doctor being seen up at the Hall?"

This was a question that I could answer no more than she. In any case it was quite evident that the coming of the master of Bewleigh would add no new element of liveliness to the doings of our little town. We might talk and wonder, but that was all.

And talk and wonder we did. There was much that might well cause us to do both, if all the scraps of news which reached us from the Hall might be accepted as authentic. A great part of the old house still remained shut up, as it had been since the death of the previous Mr. Muncastle. The present owner occupied a suite of rooms in one wing—the wing which had the pleasantest outlook from its windows. Mrs. Dare, who, by-and-by, we learned was a daughter of Mr. Muncastle's only sister, had her own rooms no great distance away. No one could have been more regular in his habits than Mr. Muncastle. Every morning after breakfast, unless the weather was at its worst, he and Mrs. Dare walked out together for a couple of hours in the park or gardens. In the afternoon they rode or drove, exploring the country in every direction for miles around. Later on uncle and niece dined together, and after dinner came music and chess, at both of which Mrs. Dare was thoroughly proficient.

We were not long in noticing that Mr. Muncastle was never seen abroad unless he was accompanied by his niece; neither was Mrs. Dare ever seen beyond the precincts of the park except in her uncle's company. They were invariably together when seen in public.

I met them several times in the course of my country rounds. I should have known Mr. Muncastle anywhere, although I had not seen him for a dozen years. He was a man not readily to be forgotten.

His hair and beard, which had once been black, were now grizzled by advancing years. His long, thin, brown face looked thinner and more eager than of old. But there was the same anxious, restless look in his eyes, which seemed to belie the thin lips and firmly-set mouth that I remembered so well. There was the same tall, lean, well-knit figure that I had noticed a dozen years ago. Me he had forgotten, or, if not, he did not choose to recognise me.

Nancy Vann had said that Mrs. Dare was a handsome woman, and Nancy was right. And yet her face was a sad one, with unmistakable lines of trial and suffering on it, lines such as no after years of happiness could altogether erase. And then that mass of snow-white hair, which formed such a strange and marked contrast to her large, dark, melancholy eyes and well-defined eyebrows, what right had it on the head of one who was still so young in years? There must be some strange story, perhaps some terrible romance of real life, to account for such an anomaly. It was a problem that interested me, but one that I was powerless to solve.

The fact of Mr. Muncastle never being seen out of doors except when accompanied by his niece, seemed to bear out in some measure a certain startling piece of information which gossiping Nancy Vann brought one day and retailed to her grandmother.

It was well known that when Mr. Muncastle came to Bewleigh, he brought with him two sedate, taciturn, middle-aged men, brothers, named Ephraim and Gared Strong. No one seemed to know the precise positions in the household occupied by the brothers. They dressed in black, and wore pumps and white ties, and all they seemed to do was to wait personally on Mr. Muncastle; and yet a man, however exigent he may be, can hardly need the services of two valets.

So carefully, however, were the ordinary servants at the Hall excluded from Mr. Muncastle's private rooms, that it took inquisitive Nancy Vann, with all her spying and listening, more than three months to ferret out the mystery that lay hidden behind those doors.

When she had discovered it, if she had been a discreet girl she would have held her tongue. But Nancy was not discreet. She told her grandmother, and the old woman told me.

I made a point of seeing Nancy the next time she walked down from the Hall, and of trying to impress upon her the necessity for keeping silence with regard to her master's affairs. Although she promised readily enough that she would do so, I felt that I might almost as well have spoken to the wind; and, indeed, two days later I had the same information imparted to me as a secret by two different people. In a little while everybody in the town was talking about it.

It appeared that for some reason best known to himself, Mr. Muncastle had an insuperable objection to being left alone for any length of time. Mrs. Dare was rarely far from his side between breakfast and the hour for retiring for the night.

After that the brothers, Gared and Ephraim Strong, took it in turns to watch by their master till morning came round again.

Mr. Muncastle slept on a small camp-bedstead, and one of the brothers sat in a large wicker chair at the opposite end of the room. A lamp was kept burning all night, and it was part of the watcher's duty never to sleep at his post. What the consequences might have been had he failed to keep awake, none of us, of course, were in a position even to guess.

I little thought at the time that what was a mystery to so many people would in a little while be a mystery to me no longer.

Mr. Muncastle had been at Bewleigh some eight or nine months. When one night, about half-past ten, a mounted messenger knocked at my door and told me that my services were required immediately at the Hall.

"Who is ill?" I naturally asked. "Not Mr. Muncastle, I hope?"

"No; it's Ephraim Strong. He was taken bad this morning, and he's been getting worse ever since."

I ordered my gig to be got ready, and half an hour later I was at the Hall.

Mr. Muncastle in person received me.

"I am sorry to have been compelled to summon you at so untimely an hour, doctor," he said; "but poor Strong, one of my servants, is so ill that he quite alarms us, and he is certainly much worse than he was a couple of hours ago."

"With your permission, I will see him at once," was my reply.

I was ushered into the sick man's room, and a brief examination showed me that he was suffering from a severe bronchial attack, combined with symptoms of inflammation of the lungs.

I told Mr. Muncastle what was the matter, and said that if he would let his groom ride back with me, I would at once make up some medicine, and that I would be at the Hall again early in the morning.

On my second visit I found no improvement in my patient, and on the third day, Thursday, he was decidedly worse. I began to have forebodings as to the result. On Friday, however, there was a considerable improvement, but Saturday brought a relapse, and on Sunday the poor fellow died.

Mr. Muncastle was much affected. All through the illness he had shown much sympathy and concern.

"He was as good and faithful a servant as any man could wish to have," he said. "I shall miss him far more than I can tell anyone. I am thankful that his brother is still left to me."

We were pacing up and down the terrace which overlooked the flower-garden as he spoke. The events of the week had served to bring us closer together than a year of ordinary intercourse in all probability would have done. He seemed to have taken rather a liking to my society, and I usually stayed and had half an hour's chat with him after leaving my patient.

I found him much less reserved and altogether more sympathetic than I had somehow been led to expect. He had seen a great deal of the world, was widely read, and could talk well on almost any topic that might be started. What motive could such a man have for leading the life of a recluse?

No one could see much of Mr. Muncastle without making the acquaintance of his niece. I found her to be a refined and accomplished woman, but with some underlying sadness so deeply implanted in her nature that at length it had become a part of herself. It looked out at you from her eyes; you could see it in the downward curve of her lips; you heard it in her voice like a faint, faraway echo; even in her smile there was a lurking sorrow.

"I wish you would come up at your usual hour to-morrow, doctor," said Mr. Muncastle as I was about to take my leave; "and put your stethoscope in your pocket. Now that nothing more can be done for poor Strong, I think you had better give me an overhauling."

"Certainly, if you wish it, Mr. Muncastle."

"I do wish it. I have long known that there is something radically wrong with me. Hitherto I have foolishly shrunk from ascertaining the truth. I will be a coward no longer."

"I trust we shall be able to prove that your fears have no foundation in fact," said I.

He shook his head as he pressed my hand, and bade me good-afternoon.

Although I had spoken cheerfully, as we doctors are generally bound to speak to our patients, I had little doubt that Mr. Muncastle was right in his surmise. His hollow cheeks, the sunken circles round his eyes, a certain nervous depression of manner which he never seemed able to fling off for any length of time, had already warned me that there was something amiss with him, either mentally or physically. It might be that after so many years of wandering, and of almost incessant change of scene, the quiet and seclusion of his present mode of life were having an injurious effect upon him. When one has used oneself to tonics for years it is not always wise to leave them off at once, and resort to sedatives in their stead.

My interview with Mr. Muncastle next morning lasted upwards of an hour.

"Well?" said he interrogatively when I had put away my notebook and taken off my spectacles.

"You are certainly far from being in such a state of health as I should like to see you in," I replied. He had begged that I would deal frankly with him in the matter, and I intended doing so. "For one thing," I went on, "I should recommend an immediate change of scene."

The ghost of a smile flickered across his worn face.

"I felt sure you would recommend that," he replied. "Nevertheless, with all due deference to your opinion, you must allow me to say that I do not think any change of scene would benefit me in the least."

I bowed. Possibly he was right.

"Of course my heart is affected?" he asked after a moment's pause.

"I cannot deny that it is, but not, I think, to any serious extent. I see no cause for any present alarm."

"I am not in the least alarmed, neither should I be if the affection were twice as serious as it is."

"Is it not possible," I said, looking him steadily in the face, "that your present low state of health may have its origin in some mental disturbance rather than in any physical derangement?"

He bit his lip, and evidently hesitated before answering.

"Upon my word, doctor, I almost think you are right," he said at last. "In fact I am nearly sure you are. If you have five minutes to spare let us take a turn on the terrace."

We went out by way of the French-window, and walked to and fro in silence for a little while.

Then my companion turned to me, and said abruptly:

"Doctor, you are old enough to have had considerable experience. In the whole course of that experience did you ever meet with the case of a man who was haunted?"

I was somewhat startled by his question, but strove to hide that I was so. A little time was needed to consider my reply.

"I expect that most of us are haunted in one way or other," I answered guardedly. "Some people are haunted by recollections of a wasted youth, of a misspent manhood, of friends alienated, of love cast carelessly aside. We are all haunted at times by the faces of the loved ones whom we have lost, and it is well for us that we should be."

"That is not at all what I mean," he replied. "Have you never heard of men who have been haunted by one particular face or figure which has persistently appeared to them time after time for months, or it may be for years?"

"I have both heard and read of many cases of optical and other delusions very similar to the kind you speak of. But, then, we medical men know them to be delusions—or illusions, if the word please you better—something projected from the patient's own mental retina—that and nothing more."

"In this world, who shall say where reality ends and illusion begins?" asked Mr. Muncastle. "It seems to me that just now I am walking and talking with you, but that may be merely a delusion on my part. How can I assure myself, as a matter of fact, that you are anything more substantial than a projection of my own mental retina?"

He laughed a little bitterly. We took a turn or two without speaking.

"Is it not possible," he asked presently, "for what you would term a mere illusion to assume in the course of time in the mind of the person who is subject to it the proportions of a terrible reality, and as such, influence his life to a far greater extent than any of those common troubles that flesh is heir to would be likely to do?"

"That such is undoubtedly the case now and then cannot be denied. The victims of hypochondria, or by whatever name we may choose to call it, are often to be pitied far more than the world wots of. I once met a man whose fixed belief it was that he had inadvertently swallowed a small snake, which was growing bigger day by day inside him, and must eventually kill him. Who can tell what agonies of mind that man went through?"

It seemed to me that Mr. Muncastle had the air of a man who was longing to make a disclosure of some kind, but who yet had a shrinking dread of doing so. All I could do was to let him take his own course in the matter.

"Doctor," he began after a little while, "a few minutes ago I asked you whether you had ever met with the case of a man who was haunted. I am a haunted man. Call it by what name you will—mental delusion, hypochondria, what not—it is to me a most grim and terrible reality."

He spoke with a sombre earnestness that could not fail to carry conviction with it.

"May I ask the nature of the appearance—for I presume it to be an appearance—to which you are subject?"

"I am haunted by one figure and by one only. Day or night I dare never be alone for any length of time without its presenting itself before me."

"Have you been afflicted in this way for long?"

"For something like a dozen years. At first only intermittently and at rare intervals, then by degrees more frequently, and for the last five years constantly, whenever I am alone."

"Is the appearance which thus forces itself upon you, that of anyone you have ever known?"

Mr. Muncastle's sallow cheek became a shade sallow. He glanced quickly round as if half expecting to see someone following us. Then taking me by the sleeve he said:

"The appearance is that of a man with whom I was acquainted many years ago—of a man whose death lies at my door."

He sighed, and walked slowly on with bowed head. Suddenly there was the sound of footsteps. We both turned. Mrs. Dare was coming towards us from the house.

"Not a word," said Mr. Muncastle in a low voice. "Come up on Thursday, and I will tell you more. I can keep my secret no longer. I must reveal it to someone."

Presently I took my leave.

A Generous Giver.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

It was a winter evening. The fire burnt with a brightness that indicated frost without, and reminded one of the cheerless suburban streets, with their bare trees and endless rows of railings, touched with rime, and glistening in the darkness, and by the contrast increased the sense of warmth and comfort within.

A pretty girl sat by a table; a young man near her reading. Quite apart from them, some distance from light and fire, sat a woman knitting. She worked busily, her fingers moved swiftly, even when she was gazing at the couple by the table. She had a quiet thoughtful face, with a look of resolution upon it that made it unlikely that she would fail to carry out any plan she had decided upon. There was more sorrow than happiness in her eyes, except when they rested upon her companions; then they would grow full of deep satisfaction, and a smile would illuminate her countenance and give it strange pathos and beauty. At such moments she seemed a being that must fascinate and command all men; but it passed, and she was only a gentle and rather sad woman, no longer young, who had learnt that life is full of loneliness and unspoken trouble.

The young man finished his story, and put the book down.

"I do like that," said the girl. "I should like to be a fairy godmother, and dispense good gifts all round. I do like a cheerful ending."

"Yes, it's comfortable," said the young man.

"And I do like comfort in everything," replied the girl, drawing herself a little more to the fire, and looking delightedly into its warmth. "They all had everything they wanted; could anything be better than that?" she continued, referring again to the conclusion of the tale.

"I expect not," replied the young man.

But the listener in the corner knew that the fulfilment of desires is not always the best thing for the wishers.

"I shall never be tired of Cinderella," continued the girl. "I delight in the turning of the mice into horses, and the pumpkin into a chariot. I wish I could turn these chairs into ponies, and this table into a carriage."

"What for?" asked the young man.

"For you, of course, simpleton. I should like you to have everything good, and beautiful, and comfortable," and she laughed lightly. "I wish I could turn these leaves"—and she fluttered the pages of the book—"into bank-notes for you."

"Ah, that would be useful, indeed," he cried. "That would make all things straight; there would be an end to this weary waiting; we could be married then."

"That would make you so glad," she said, looking up at him, as he stood beside her, with a wistful tenderness in her bright face.

"It would make me joyful, my darling, and you too, I hope," and stooping he kissed her.

The clicking of the knitting-needles never ceased, and the worker in the corner heard and saw, and was content.

"Sit down, and tell me what you would do with the money," said the girl demurely.

He drew a chair close to hers and sat down beside her. They had left the table and moved nearer to the fireplace; but the woman in the corner could still see them, and take pleasure in the fresh beauty of their youth, and in their honest, hearty love for each other.

"What should you do with it?" again asked the girl.

"Become partner in Sowerby and Sons, merchants. My father has heard of a good opening there."

He spoke regretfully. It is hard to see the thing that would just suit you go by, because you have not the power to put out your hand and take it.

"How much would it cost?" she asked, and the knitting-needles were silent for a moment, so anxious was the worker to hear the answer.

"Some thousands, and I can never get them, so what is the use of thinking of it? We must be poor people, Nellie. Are you afraid?"

"No, never afraid with you!" and the earnest look in her eyes spoke the truthfulness of her heart.

And the knitting-needles clicked merrily, merrily. An idea had come into the knitter's mind, and she was working it out, clearly, swiftly, to the rapid movement of her hands. Her thinking went with a lilt, like a merry rhyme, and when her conception was finished her heart was beating wildly with triumphant joy.

Meanwhile, the young people continued talking of their future, speaking of the modest home that would content them, of the happiness of being together, of the prosperity that comes at last to those who are brave enough to be prudent and self-denying, and to hold the opinion of the world of small account.

Then their converse grew more tender and confidential, their voices sank almost to a whisper, and did not reach the knitter.

Her mind was so occupied by its own jubilant thoughts that she did not heed them, but when her excitement had calmed down, and her idea had merged into a steady resolution, she heard Nellie's sweet voice saying:

"My aunt is thinking hard; hear how fast her needles click!"

"How good she is," replied the young man earnestly. "I think she is the best woman that ever lived—a saint, an angel."

"Your guardian angel," said the girl.

"Yes, that is it," he replied. "Even from the first she took charge of me, watched over me, protected me, almost from myself," here his voice was full of solemn emotion, "and led me by the hand in the right path, even until she brought me to you. God bless her!"

"God bless her!" echoed the girl.

The woman in the corner heard the blessings and rejoiced, and her soul was lifted in thankfulness.

She rose and went towards the others, saying:

"It is supper-time, young people."

"Oh, aunt, how industrious you have been, and I have done nothing," said the girl.

"You have made two people happy, Nellie—Sydney and myself," replied the aunt with great tenderness.

Nellie's aunt, Anne Stornton, was an orphan, and Nellie was her only relative. She was thirty-six, and it was said that she looked old for her years. There were certainly silver threads in her dark-brown hair, and crow's-feet at the corners of her sad eyes. She was thin, and stooped slightly, and her dress was plain to dowdiness.

Two or three years before this, she had been very different. Then she was upright as a pine-bole, the smooth brownness of her hair was perfect, her eyes were soft, not sad, and often bright with joy, her cheeks were rounded, and there was something of the fresh beauty of youth in the delicate fairness of her complexion and the plumpness of her hands. She was always exquisitely dressed, not discarding bright colours, but using them with so subtle a knowledge of the harmony of tints that she and her apparel made a perfect whole.

She lived then, as now, in a house in a south-western suburb of London, only, instead of Nellie, she had an elderly lady as companion. The house was her own, and she had lived in it many years with her mother, her father having died when she was a child.

She had reached the mature age of thirty-five without receiving an offer of marriage, which is not surprising, as it is only in a very exceptional case that a man proposes without feeling nearly certain that his suit will meet with acceptance; and as Anne had not cared for anyone, she had never given the necessary encouragement.

One autumn day, the son of an old friend of her mother called upon her. He had come to learn business in a merchant's office, and was quite a stranger in London, so had no friends.

He was tall, broad, and strong, with amber beard and moustache; but in his frank blue eyes, and the healthy colour of his face, was a boyishness that charmed Anne into a great liking for him.

He was so frank, so simple and kind-hearted, and so gentlemanly, that as time passed her liking grew, and she was very kind to him. He was lonely in the great city, so far away from all his relatives, and came often to Anne's house, and got into a way of telling her of everything that happened to him—the little mistakes and annoyances of the business day, the news in the letters from home.

And when these topics failed, he would speak of his hopes and wishes. And Anne had for all he said interest and ready sympathy

Sometimes her greater knowledge, and larger experience of life, caused her to lead his mind to a wider range of thought; he followed gladly, docile as a child to his teacher. Sometimes the little dining-room was turned into a school, or temple of discussion, she and Sydney taking opposite sides of an argument; and she would urge him to hold his own with all his strength, because it was desirable that a man should be able at all times to speak clearly, fluently, and to the point; and she doubled and rounded upon him with such nimbleness and dexterity, that it really was a difficult intellectual feat to keep steadily to his own opinion. When he stumbled and wavered, she, metaphorically, picked him up and put him on his feet again with good nature. And when he went straight on to the end, and was triumphant, she gave him most cordial approval.

Whether they were agreeing or disputing, whether they were merry or depressed, they both found their happiest time in being together.

Winter and spring passed with unusual pleasantness to Anne, and one day in early summer, she found herself anxiously watching the clock, because Sydney Canton was a quarter of an hour late.

She was startled. She blushed crimson, she was no girl to whom her own emotions could have no meaning; and she stood self-convicted of loving Sidney Canton. A thrill passed through her, a soft rapture possessed her. She seemed to have a fuller life, a more complete existence.

She revelled in her new possession of a great love, the most divine gift of womanhood. She exulted. Her life could never be barren, her heart empty, both were filled with the fulness of a great joy.

It was shining in her face, she knew.

Would he see it? He must not, it should be hidden.

A note was brought, saying Mr. Canton was very sorry that he could not keep his appointment, but would be with her the next day. She was greatly relieved. She would have time to become accustomed to her new self, her perfected, her completed self, she phrased it. In her exultation of spirit, it seemed to her that a woman does not know the real capacity of her nature for delight, until she loves. She might have said for sorrows either; but her sorrows were afar off in the future, and she saw them not. She was happy—grandly, superbly happy. Already she was thinking what good gift she could bestow upon him who had given her this happiness.

She went into the garden, her countenance glowing with delight. She trod the earth, but her head seemed in the heavens, far above all littleness, difficulty, or tribulation, in a world of grandeur, goodness, and peace.

It was borne in upon her, that out of her abundance she should give largely, that she should pour out her love like water, or like wine, in full libations, when blessings must fall on him for whom they were made. To give, to give! was the cry of her grateful heart. In the most ecstatic hour she ever lived through. To give, was still her thought when the ecstasy was past.

The exaltation of spirit died out, as must all such excitement, but for many years, in dreams in the silent night, she lived through that hour of supreme joy, and walked in her garden seeing nothing that was actually there, yet seeming to have full vision of things magnificent. And sometimes the desire of her heart would pass into words, and she would be awakened by her own voice crying: "Give, give!"

The next morning she was very calm, her face was gentle and quiet as ever, her soul was full of steadfast happiness, but her mind was clear, and she sat down to an honest contemplation of her position. She loved Sydney Canton, that she admitted frankly. She was not a woman to use subterfuge with anybody, even herself. She loved him, and would love him always; there was a stubbornness in her nature that made change almost impossible to her. He did not love her; then a doubt, the colour rushed to her face, she clasped her hands together, her lips were set, her face grew white, a hard voice she did not recognise for her own said:

"It must not be."

And then she knew that the gift she must give him would be his own free heart. If he loved her, his love must be crushed back until it died.

There could be no marriage between them. She was more than ten years his senior. She would be an old woman when he was in his prime. And then in mind, in heart, in knowledge, and experience, she was many, many years older than he. She knew, with a wisdom she never doubted, that a man does not want a guide, teacher, and philosopher in a wife, but only a loving, helpful, sympathising woman. That he must not look up, but be looked up to. That the responsibility of having to think and act for the good of others would strengthen Sydney's character, and make him self-reliant. But if he married her he would continue to submit himself to her guidance and direction, so there could be no growth of mental stature, he would at best be but a weak, kindly man, until the knowledge came to him, as it must inevitably come, that he had married an old woman—something of a schoolmistress; then he would love her no more, might even dislike her, in spite of his respect and esteem, and look back to the first year of their friendship as a time of phantasmal happiness that had lured him on to misery.

This must never be. She would love him secretly, silently, but with a sweet hopefulness that there would come a time when she might be able to do something that would be greatly to his benefit.

That very day the change in her appearance began. There was a little less gentleness in her face, a little less elegance in her apparel.

When Sydney knocked at the door her heart beat fast, but it was reassuring to know, by a glance at the mirror, that her face was pale. Sydney's eagerness to explain why he could not come the day before was a comfort to her, because it relieved her from the necessity of making more than a trifling remark, until she had become accustomed to his presence, in the awakened state of her feelings towards him. Then she was able to talk in her usual kindly fashion, but with an older voice, and an older manner.

Suddenly she was keenly conscious of the agony of her voice, and of a prim stiffness in her demeanour, and she thought: "Am I really growing old all at once, or am I overacting my part?" and she looked at Sidney and saw a puzzled expression on his face. She smiled. His countenance cleared at once, and he said:

"You were dull without me yesterday?"

"Not exactly," she said. "I cannot expect always to have you here so much."

"I missed you awfully," he said. "I can only feel happy here," and the look came into his eyes that she had resolved must not be there. "Can you not love me a little, Anne? May I call you Anne?"

Bravely she put aside her great delight, and said with steady voice:

"You may call me Anne, if you put 'aunt' before it. I am accustomed to be called Aunt Anne, and like it much. You shall be my nephew Sydney, and I will love you very much. We are just of the right ages to be aunt and nephew, and shall soon come to believe that we are related."

She looked steadily at him. His face grew sad, his eyes looked dull. She thought, was it possible he imagined she was laughing at him?

"I hoped—I meant——" he said.

She put out her hand, saying:

"Will you not have me for your aunt? Do. I am lonely. I shall rejoice to have you for a nephew; it will make me so happy."

He put out his hand slowly; he looked uncertain, bewildered; he could not resist her appeal, yet, had he not meant something quite different?

Anne grasped his nerveless hand and shook it cordially.

"We have made a good bargain," she said cheerfully. "I promise to make an excellent aunt, and I am sure I shall be proud of my nephew."

"I think I must go now," he said.

"Do, it is a beautiful afternoon for a walk."

They shook hands again; as he turned from her she said:

"I am sure I am already quite proud of such a fine stalwart fellow for my nephew. Good-bye, Sydney."

"Good-bye—Aunt Anne."

"Brave boy," she said to herself; "I am glad to hear those words from your lips at last."

She stood by the window watching him go out of the gate. He went with heavy steps and did not look up and lift his hat to her with sunny smile, as was his wont.

"His dream is rudely dispelled," she thought, "but a brighter one will come to him that shall endure." And she hid her face in her hands and wept.

In ten days Sydney Canton came again, and after a few meetings their intercourse drifted into its old friendliness, only a little subdued. Anne's sober dress and sober speech, sometimes a little didactic, made her a good representative middle-aged aunt. But she was always on her guard; she felt that there was a tiny spark which the least weakness on her part might fan into a flame. And when at last she believed that it was wholly extinguished, she was weak from anxiety and watchfulness, and she decided that she must go away and be at rest for a time.

One morning, nearly three months after she had understood her own heart, her companion told her that she looked strangely altered and aged, and she was glad. Her friend continued that she had lost her taste in dress, and her cheerfulness, and must be ill. She admitted that she was not well, and would have change, and before she had told Sydney of her plans, a summons came for her to visit her only sister who was ill. She was away three months, during which she wrote to her nephew Sydney, and received letters from him. She nursed her sister through a long illness, and followed her to the grave, then brought her orphan daughter home with her to be her charge for the future.

She came back to her home a grave sad woman, with hair touched with grey, but she never regretted what she had done.

As the niece, Nelly's, grief for her mother's loss passed away, she and Sydney became fast friends, and Anne took to sitting apart in the background, and leaving them to entertain one another. She watched their growing love, while yet it was all unknown to themselves, and she said to her restless heart, that it would be well that they should marry, they were well-suited to each other in age and character, and when they told her that they were betrothed, she gave them the kindest wishes and congratulations, and prayed for their happiness far into the night.

CHAPTER II.

A FEW weeks after the evening on which Nellie so emphatically expressed her preference for a cheerful ending to stories, Sydney Canton entered the dining-room of Anne Stornton's house, when she was sitting there alone.

"I have such good news!" he cried.

"Good news!" she echoed; "I am very glad. I will fetch Nellie."

"You will never guess what it is; it is glorious!"

"I am very glad, but Nellie must hear it first."

She went up the stairs, a great joyfulness in her heart, that lit up her face, and shone in her eyes. The hand she rested on the banisters trembled visibly, and there was a curious vibration in her voice as she said softly:

"Sydney has good news, Nellie; come and hear it."

Then the two went down, and as they reached the dining-room she motioned Nellie to go in advance, because she knew that with her before his eyes, Sydney would give little notice to herself, and she wished more than ever to keep in the background.

The young man caught the girl in his arms and kissed her.

"Darling," he cried, "I never thought to be so happy in all my life, never believed it possible anyone could be so wild with joy. Something so good has happened—almost as good as your turning the leaves of the book into bank-notes;" and he looked at her with proud admiring fondness as if she had done this great thing for him. "I am rich, Nellie; I can be partner with Sowerby and Sons; some one has left me money."

Nellie could not speak for joy, she lifted up her bright face, the lips trembling, the eyes full of tears. He kissed it again.

"You shall be happy, my love, my love!"

She nestled close to him, a little overcome by the great news. As he stood with his left arm clasped round her, he put out his right hand towards Miss Stornton, and said with impulsive tenderness:

"Dear Aunt Anne, I should like to do something for you, too; you have been so good to me."

"You are doing everything for me," she said cordially, as she pressed his hand. "You are going to take entire charge of Nellie, and leave me free to carry out my old fancies."

"You have fancies?" he said with an incredulous smile. "Why, you are the wisest woman I ever knew."

"Ah, but I have whims and oddities as well as other people, and one of my whims is to travel. When you and Nellie are married, I am going away."

Anne had not thought of this before, but now it seemed to her the most natural thing for her to do, and the best.

"You hear, Nellie!" he said.

"Everything wonderful is happening to-day," the girl replied, as she sat down flushed and radiant.

"Yes," he answered.

Anne went to her usual seat in the corner, and took up her knitting.

"You have not told us yet who left you this money," said Nellie.

"I am a bit bewildered with the news, and the hurry and delight," he replied, his face, figure, and voice full of abounding gladness. "Yesterday, I had a mysterious letter from a solicitor, one of the grandees of the profession, saying that he had money of mine in his hands, which he should be glad to pay over if I would call at his office at eleven this morning. I went. He is a nice old fellow. Said he had been so fortunate as to have the pleasure afforded him of paying over to me a considerable sum of money. That for the convenience of transfer, he gave me a cheque of his own, and would send a clerk up with me to cash it, when I could open an account for myself. And here is my banker's book," and he took one out of his pocket, and the two heads were bent over it examining it with great interest. The knitter in the corner had a sideways view of the two happy faces, and thought a little sadly that when she went away she would be little missed.

"Then I signed a receipt," resumed Sydney. "You know I am not always very ready with my tongue, Nellie, and I was just thinking how to ask for information about it all, when he said very blandly: 'I think our very pleasant little interview is over,' and a clerk moved towards the door to open it for me. 'But—but,' I cried, 'who gave it me?' 'I am not prepared to say that anyone gave it to you,' he replied with a smile. 'Left it to me, then?' 'Or left it you either,' he said; 'indeed, I do not much care to say any more about it, and I think if I were you I would be satisfied to have it, and not care where it came from.'"

"And what did you say then, Sydney dear?"

The knitting-needles were motionless, and the knitter listened eagerly for the answer to Nellie's question.

"I said I must know. 'Ah, then run over in your mind the people who are likely to have had anything to give you—that is the only thing you can do,' and he moved his papers as if he wanted me gone. I did as he desired, and I thought I had got it. 'It was Biggs?' I cried. 'Because I know he told me years ago I should come in for something in his will.' 'I am not at liberty to say,' he said, smiling. 'You do not deny it?' I said. 'I say nothing—absolutely nothing,' and his smile grew broader; 'but I am really very busy, and must beg you to excuse me.'"

"It was Biggs," said Nellie confidently. "How good of him."

"I suppose it was Biggs, for I cannot think of anyone else."

The knitting-pins moved swiftly again. The anxiety and wistfulness had passed from the knitter's face, and there had come upon it a look of serene happiness that gave it a soft rare beauty.

Sydney and Nellie came towards her, the girl saying:

"You think it was Mr. Biggs, auntie?"

"As likely as anyone else," she answered, looking at them with a radiant smile.

"How young and bright you look, aunt."

"The glory of Sydney's good fortune has reached me," she answered, and there was something of triumph in her gladness.

One fine day in early spring Sydney and Nellie were married, and when Anne saw them start upon their wedding-tour, she thought that her work for them was done. It was well that the duties of hostess constrained her to exert herself, or she might have given way under the sense of loneliness and uselessness that oppressed her.

On the departure of her last guest, who had stayed with her until evening, she sat down and wrote out an advertisement for the letting of her house furnished.

The next day she went carefully through all her possessions, deciding what little things she would take with her, and what should be given to Nellie. To Nellie, she said, but she knew in her heart that it was to Sydney she was giving. The quaint bookcase, the quaint cabinet, the chair that he said was the easiest he had ever sat in, and every little thing that he had admired by look or word, was put down in the list for Nellie, while only a few mementos of her parents, and a little statuette Sydney had given her, were in the one for herself.

Then she gave her attention to the completion of the furnishing of the house for the young couple. This, with the arrangements for letting her own, occupied her fully three weeks. Her tenant wished to come in at once, she wished to leave before Sydney's return, she dreaded a parting, and had a little fear that she might let herself be persuaded to remain in London, which would be inconvenient. So five days before Sydney and Nellie came home, she left the country.

Her old companion, who had been with her during the last week in her old house, went with her to the station, and afterwards told the young people how cheerfully she had started on her journey, in spite of her regret at not seeing them.

They settled down comfortably into the new life, and they did not greatly miss her, they were so occupied with each other. And letters came from her so frequently, with always some tender expression of regard for themselves, that lingered in their memory, and some bright bit of gossip, or vivid description of something that she had seen, that could be repeated to their friends.

Two years passed, and they had a new interest—a little Anne, and they had grown quite accustomed to have their best friend the other side of France. They were secure of her sympathy, and of her unfailing interest in all that concerned them, and it was pleasant to have dainty little gifts from over the sea, and to look forward to the proud moment of showing little Anne to her great-aunt. Years rolled on. Sydney grew very prosperous, and husband and wife never wavered in their love for each other. Another girl, and some years later a little son, were born to them, and their life was full of happiness.

About a month after she had left England, Anne Stornton took lodgings in a large seaport town in France. And when she had made her handsome rooms home-like with the few belongings she had brought away, with her, she went out and called at some of the principal schools, and said that she wished to give lessons in English. Her French was good, and her manner and appearance that of a well-bred woman. A look of patient sorrow in her fine eyes gave a refined pathos to her handsome face, and touched the hearts of the sentimental people into whose midst she had come.

She quickly obtained employment at two schools, but that was not enough, so she advertised to give private lessons, and by the end of three months she had sufficient occupation. By the end of the first year she had an established reputation as a first-class teacher of English.

She taught men and women, boys and girls, but she preferred the latter for pupils—she was always so fond of the young. Through giving lessons to their children, she became known to many of the best families of the neighbourhood, and made many friends. She was so well read, and so refined in her ways, that mothers were glad that their daughters should be with her, and take pattern by her.

As years passed these girls married, and Anne was a loved and welcome guest in many happy homes. She lived on always in the same simple fashion, putting by more every year for the support of her old age. She desired to be independent until the end, and worked gladly and steadily for this consummation.

When she had led this simple industrious life for ten years, a letter came from Nellie saying that she had heard that Aunt Anne was giving lessons, and that she was indignant.

Then she wrote carefully, and said that her income was less than it had been, and that she had not told them before, because she knew they would be grieved; that she was teaching, and greatly liked doing so—indeed, would feel quite lost without her usual occupation.

Sydney wrote her a kind manly letter, in which she took great pride, but she did not give in to his wish that she should henceforth share his home. She begged him in kindness to herself to let her go on peacefully in the old way. She liked her employment so much, and was so accustomed to it, that the relinquishment of it, even to be with him and Nellie, must bring her discomfort, even sorrow.

So she lived on in the same fashion five years more, much liked and respected; and then there came bad news from England. Something had gone wrong with the firm of Sowerby and Co., and Sydney Canton was ruined, and he was very ill.

Anne wrote to her employers and friends, saying that she was unexpectedly called from home, got a letter of credit from her bankers, and started for London the day after Nellie's sad letter had been received. She was wanted, and she went, with all her old dauntless promptitude, to do the best for others.

When she reached London the Cantons were still in their handsome residence, but would soon have to leave. Sydney was suffering from typhoid fever. Anne, who had seen some people pass away, believed she saw death in his face. He was overjoyed to see her. He told her of the failure of his firm. She encouraged him to hope that something might be saved. He had faith in the clearness of her judgment, and was a little comforted.

The children regarded her as a sort of beneficent protecting genius, who had come to put everything straight, and make life pleasant again, for had she not stopped mother's tears, and made father cheerful once more? They looked at her with love and curiosity in their eyes, and she felt that she could not love them enough.

Sydney got worse, the doctors spoke doubtfully of the issue of his illness. Anne sat with him one evening, while his wife and the nurse rested. He seemed to be dozing. She was thinking, and bravely taking up a new burden.

"Anne," he said softly, "Aunt Anne."

She went and stood beside him. His hair was brightly brown, he looked very young and handsome, although fever had made his face haggard and his eyes sunken. Her hair was grey, and she felt very old as she looked down upon him. She touched his hand, grown thin in two weeks of illness. He opened his eyes and gazed at her.

"Always the same dear kind face, and dear kind heart," he said. "How good you are to me and mine. In death there should be no reserve between friends," he tried to clasp the hand that touched his.

She pressed his in assent, her heart was too full of grief for speech.

"Anne," he continued with feeble voice, "a very strange thought has come to me of late years, it has come and come until I am forced to believe it is truth. I have not spoken of it, because I respected your desire for secrecy, but now all things may be made clear."

He paused to gather strength. She was as if turned to stone, but she could not stop his words even by a wish. After a pause that seemed an age to the listener, he said:

"You yourself gave me that money, Anne?"

She could not resist the appeal in his enquiring eyes.

"I did," she said softly.

Then there was a gleam of joy on his face.

"You loved me?" he said.

"With all my heart," she answered, and stooping kissed his brow, the first and last kiss that ever passed between them.

And then she knelt beside his bed.

"Noble woman," he said, "you have given me the most perfect happiness for fifteen years, and I shall have more courage to die now you are near me."

"You have been truly happy?" she said with radiant face.

"Ay, truly and fully. God bless you for it!" he answered.

"And now," she said, speaking as if she were inspired like a prophetess of old, "you must have no care, no anxiety for the future. Your wife and your children shall be my charge. They shall be all that you can wish—happy and honoured—and I have the will to compass this, and God will give me the power."

"I believe it, my trust in you is perfect."

"We shall meet in heaven, and you will tell me that I have not failed you."

"I will," he answered solemnly.

She drew the clothes a little closer round him. His eyes, soon tired with gazing, even at her dear face, closed. She knelt by the bed until the nurse relieved her watch.

Two days later he died.

Her strong courage supported the whole family in their bitter sorrow. She, with the help of her own trusty solicitor, settled all things. And a few weeks later, she took the little grief-stricken band to her home in France. Her friends gathered round her and were kind to them for her sake and their own. For the children were pretty and pleasant-mannered, and Nellie was very winning in the gentle dignity of her great bereavement.

Anne did well for them all, and for the little Sydney, her heart's darling, she procured a first-rate education, and he is now all that his father could desire, even as to prosperity.

The two girls are well married. Anne and Nellie live together, still teaching, still thrifty in all things, but comforted by the consciousness that when old age incapacitates them for work, there will be something to support them in independence.

At Midnight.

A SONNET FOR THE NEW YEAR.

WHITE fleecy clouds float slowly in a sky
Of perfect azure, frosted o'er with stars;
The cold clear moonlight lies in silver bars,
O'er forest, field, and meadow. Far and nigh,
The village clocks chime midnight, and are still;
A moment more, and all the wintry air
Is tremulous with music. Fresh and fair,
The clear wild tones peal out o'er vale and hill.
Ring on! sweet bells, and fill each heart with hope.
Ring on! and fan life's embers into flame.
Give to the narrower view a wider scope,
Give to the daily task a nobler aim;
Uproot life's weeds; sow fresh its barren fields;
Till all the wasted past a fruitful future yields!

The Editor's Note Book.

SINCE Lord Mayor's Day M. de Lesseps has been making a sort of royal progress through the country, and has been received with the utmost politeness by meetings of shipowners, Chambers of Commerce, and other commercial magnates. Many speeches have been made, and much mutual laudation indulged in. Nevertheless, the principal result of the tour has been to show, very distinctly, that the points at issue between the Suez Canal Company and its principal customers are too serious to be got over by any amount of polite speech-making.

AND I wonder whether M. de Lesseps and his son flatter themselves that we have forgotten the abuse which they heaped upon us during the Egyptian War, or the fact that they have uniformly figured as bitter and persistent enemies of this country. If they have laid this flattering unction to their souls, they have made a mistake which they will, in time, find rather serious.

FOR a Conservative, the Lord Mayor seems to have considerable zeal as a reformer, and, if he goes on as he has begun, upholders of some of the good old-fashioned City superstitions will have a lively time of it during the coming year. For one thing, to the great satisfaction of the Bishop of London, the Lord Mayor has, so far as his Mayoralty is concerned, abolished the custom of attending the City churches on Sunday in state.

No doubt this decision is for many reasons a wise one, but, unfortunately, it has been arrived at owing to Alderman Fowler's narrow Sabbatarian views and without any special regard to the common-sense side of the question. If the Lord Mayor's letter to his chaplain is to be taken as the rule of his Sunday life, I do not see how he can allow any Sunday work among his servants. On the whole, like many a man before him, the Lord Mayor has arrived at a wise conclusion, which would have seemed wiser still if the reasons for it had not been given.

ON the broad principles of Municipal Conservatism, however, the Lord Mayor is sound even to the point of obstinacy, and there is a fine old no-surrender and we-don't-want-any-argument ring about the speech in which, at the dinner of the Turners' Company, he defied the reformers all round. Here, again, the right honourable gentleman was not altogether happy in his arguments.

THUS he did not think that one Municipality for the four million inhabitants of London would answer, on the ground that a man who lived at Hampstead would know nothing about the drainage of Greenwich, and that an inhabitant of Norwood would be ignorant of the affairs of Tottenham. To show the absurdity of such a view as this, it is only necessary to imagine somebody endeavouring to show that a House of Commons is useless because the member for Aberdeen would know nothing about the drainage of the Isle of Wight, and an inhabitant of Hull would be ignorant of the requirements of South-West Lancashire.

SINCE the publication of this speech, Mr. Firth, M.P. for Chelsea, has pointed out that a man living at Hampstead might very well know about the drainage of Greenwich, seeing that both districts are at the present time drained on the same system and under the control of the same authority, but this is a detail which the Lord Mayor in his ardour for battle will probably look upon as of little importance.

As a sort of reply to the Daily Telegraph and Daily News, which keep on hammering away with praiseworthy pertinacity at the question of the habitations of the very poor in London, the Times has been dwelling with great complacency on an address recently delivered by Mr. Giffen, the President of the Statistical Society, in which that gentleman endeavoured, and not without success, to prove that the average condition of the working man has greatly improved in the course of the last twenty or thirty years.

THAT Mr. Giffen is right in the main, although, after the manner of statisticians, he endeavours to prove rather too much, few people will be bold enough to deny. But as a matter of fact his argument has no bearing on the question more immediately at issue. The fact of the improvement in the average condition of the working classes must not be allowed to obscure the other fact, that there exists in certain districts in London a population which is shamefully, scandalously, and dangerously overcrowded, and which, by reason of its own numbers, reduces the wages for such work as it is capable of doing, literally to starvation point.

THE Bishops of Bedford and Rochester, speaking at a Temperance meeting last week, seemed inclined to attribute all, or almost all, the misery of "outcast London" to the immoderate use of strong drink. The way to cure it, the former prelate said, is to abstain from the bottle. Put a poor man into a palace, said the other dignitary, and with strong drink he will still live like a brute.

THERE is a good deal of truth in this, although it is by no means the whole truth. There is a terrible amount of drunkenness among the inhabitants of the slums, but it must be remembered that a great many of the "outcasts" are too poor even to have any money to spend in drink.

ABOLISH every public-house in London, and you will remove a great temptation from a great many people—incidentally punishing a great many others at the same time. But will abstinence from the bottle have any effect on the price of slopsellers' work? Will the destruction of the publicans cause the wages of matchbox-makers to rise? Will the abolition of strong drink make it more possible than it is now to put twenty people into space which can properly accommodate five, or will it enable a man with six or seven children to feed them on wages which, with the strictest temperance in all things, can only fairly be made to do for two or three?

THE truth is that the question must be considered as a whole, and not piecemeal or from the point of view of the believers in particular nostrums. To make it the battle-ground of sects, and Isaacites, and party politicians, would be a trifle worse than leaving it alone altogether.

A GOOD many things were said at the meeting of the Women's Union of the Church of England Temperance Society—"Phœbus! what a name!"—which are calculated to surprise people who are in the habit of looking at things soberly and temperately (a habit rare among Temperance orators), but I think that the first prize is due to Dr. Norman Kerr. This gentleman, in his righteous wrath against grocers, confectioners, and railway licences, declared that many of his lady patients "took so much drink, that if they went out of doors they would not be able to walk straight."

I DO not know what sort of practice Dr. Norman Kerr enjoys, but, if his statement is to be accepted as literal fact, his patients must certainly belong to a very exceptional class indeed. I wonder whether they read the newspapers. If they do, I should imagine that Dr. Kerr will speedily find himself with even more leisure to address public meetings than he apparently enjoys at present.

THE annual farces of electing rectors to the Scottish Universities have been again performed, no doubt to the satisfaction of the students themselves, and, except in one instance, call for no particular comment. In the case of St. Andrews, however, it is noticeable that Mr. James Russell Lowell, the American minister, was brought forward as a candidate. It is possible that this nomination was intended as a protest against the preposterous custom of turning these elections into political contests. But if this was really the case, could not the young gentlemen of St. Andrews have found in their own country, or in England, some man of letters at least as deserving of the honour of their suffrages as Mr. Lowell?

THE proposal of the Metropolitan Railway Company to make a line under Hyde Park is interesting to the public principally on account of its bearing on the vexed question of the District Company's blow-holes, as the Government only abstains from opposing the new scheme on condition that no ventilating shafts are to be permitted. It would certainly seem that if the new line can be effectually ventilated without blow-holes, so also should that which runs under the Embankment likewise be able to dispense with them.

I DO not, I confess, put much faith in the Government stipulation. History usually repeats itself, and, in three or four years time we shall probably have the Company smuggling a Ventilators' Bill through the House of Commons, and justifying it by piteous appeals on behalf of the millions of people who narrowly escape suffocation in the Tunnel every year, and whose sufferings could be put an end to by the erection in the remote parts of Hyde Park, where they could interfere with nobody, of half-a-dozen or so of the structures which the architects of Railway Companies call elegant ventilating shafts.

A PARAGRAPH has been going the round of the papers to the effect that the sprat fishery off Deal has largely increased, and that a considerable industry has sprung up in the little town itself in the way of preserving the fish "like sardines." It would be interesting to know whether the preserved sprat is sold under its own name, or whether, after preservation, it becomes the sardine of commerce.

I AM afraid that the New York correspondent of the Standard is not fond of Mr. Irving. At all events his telegrams about the distinguished manager of the Lyceum are not worded in a particularly agreeable manner. Thus, in telegraphing last week to announce that ten thousand dollars' worth of seats had been booked for Mr. Irving's performances in Philadelphia, he added that this was equal to Mrs. Langtry's experience, and half as much as Madame Sarah Bernhardt's success. This comparison of Mr. Irving with Mrs. Langtry's "experience" as distinguished from Madame Bernhardt's "success" is very unkind.

Duggan and His Gang.

SOME eighty years ago, travellers by the stage-coach from Cork to Tralee might have seen eight skulls stuck on spikes on the roof of the market-house in the town of Macroom, in the barony of Muskerry.

The country people did not like to talk about these skulls. When questioned, they only said, "They were the murderers of Colonel Hutchinson," and no more could be got out of them. The skulls were a source of horror and disgust to the inhabitants of the town, for the heads had been put over the market-house just as they were when struck from the bodies to which they had belonged. They thoroughly cowed the people; and that part of the country, for many years after the event that gave rise to this spectacle, was the most peaceable district in Ireland; the fate of the murderers proving a most effective terror to evil-doers.

Colonel Hutchinson was an amiable and worthy man, who lived in a large and handsome house, standing in its own grounds, called Codrum, about a mile from the market-town of Macroom. Although belonging to what is called a "new family," he was much respected by the neighbouring gentry; the poor people, too, were fond of him, for to them he was always kind and charitable. His sister resided with him, and he had one man-servant. Although he was so popular, he was nevertheless an active magistrate; but notwithstanding this, no harm had ever been done to him or his property. It was his habit to sit up late at night, and the light in his bedroom could be seen burning at all hours. He was rich, and known to have much valuable property in the house, but he had never taken any extra precaution.

One morning, early in the summer of 1800, the neighbourhood was thrown into consternation by the report that Colonel Hutchinson had been murdered in the night. Some labourers passing to their work saw that the large kitchen window had been completely smashed, and going up to learn what had happened, they found the shutter broken in, the front door open, and the body of the unfortunate gentleman lying stiff and dead at the foot of the stairs, with a wound through his head. Shot dead, as was supposed.

None of the inmates could give any account of the matter. Miss Hutchinson could only say that she had been awakened by the noise of the breaking of the kitchen window, and the sound of several persons rushing into the house. In her fright she had left her bed, and hid behind a large press upstairs in a garret, and had not ventured out until long after all was quiet. Keen, the man-servant, stammered and looked very confused, but could give no information. He declared he was very deaf, and had heard nothing at all during the night. He was, of course, suspected and taken into custody; but nothing could be got out of him. All the neighbouring gentry belonged to the yeomanry corps—Catholics as well as Protestants—and they bound themselves by an oath not to rest until the murderers were discovered.

A large reward was offered for information that would lead to their detection. A remarkable feature was that, although a handsome looking-glass had been broken, and some furniture pulled about, nothing whatever had been stolen. At last suspicion fell on a man named Malachi Duggan. He was a farmer of the better class, but bearing a very bad character. In appearance he was the very type of a ruffian, of gigantic stature, and strong in proportion; his countenance was brutal and ferocious, and with a dash of cunning which made it all the more repulsive. When the officers went to his house to arrest him, they found him at home. He made no attempt to escape, and seemed, indeed, to treat the charge with much apparent indifference. On the road, however, he must have been anxiously considering his position, for when he and his escort arrived at Macroom, he offered to turn informer if he were assured that he would receive the large sum offered as a reward. His offer was accepted, when Duggan stated that on the night in question fourteen men, under his orders, assembled and went in a body to attack and plunder Codrum, but with no design of harming any of its inmates. Colonel Hutchinson was sitting up reading as usual, and, on hearing the noise below, he immediately went downstairs to see what was the matter. He found the hall filled with armed men, and seeing his own gamekeeper among them, he most incautiously exclaimed:

"What, you here, MacCarthy?" on which Duggan, the captain of the gang, at once called out:

"MacCarthy, do your duty."

The gamekeeper raised his gun, fired, and Colonel Hutchinson fell dead. The sight of his dead body filled the ruffians with such panic that they fled from the house, taking nothing with them. Duggan then gave the names of all the men who had been with him. A strict search was immediately begun, but the criminals, as soon as it was rumoured that Malachi had turned informer, took to the hills and concealed themselves—the country people, of course, assisting and hiding them. The county was at that time under martial law, and the Cork Yeomanry were a formidable body. They were determined the murderers should not escape, and they hunted down all those suspected of giving them shelter. One day they were on the track of some of the murderers; but the inhabitants of a mountain hamlet had assisted them and they escaped. Prompt measures were taken. The cabins were searched; every article of furniture was dragged out, piled in a heap, and set on fire; the wretched owners standing round, not daring to say a word. One of the soldiers, searching an outhouse, found a feather-bed carefully concealed. He was dragging this bed to share the fate of the rest, when the captain interfered, crying out:

"No, no; those wretched people have suffered enough; let us at least leave them the bed."

As he spoke a ball whizzed past, grazing his ear. Turning round, he saw a puff of white smoke over the brow of the hill behind them. Immediately he and two other officers galloped to the spot, feeling sure they had at last come upon some of the criminals. They only found, however, two peasants who belonged to the village, one of whom, exasperated at seeing the wanton destruction of their goods, had fired the shot. They were at once seized and dragged to the prison of Macroom. They were tried, not for firing on the yeomanry, but for aiding and hiding the murderers, and were condemned to transportation. The trial and sentence made a great sensation. When they were on board the hulks their relations and friends came in a body and offered, if these two men were restored to their families, that the whole county should join in hunting down the murderers and giving them up to justice. After some consideration this offer was accepted.

The men were pardoned and sent back to their homes, and the people of the county began to keep their word. The fugitives now led the lives of hunted wolves, and endured fearful hardships. Winter was approaching, but they did not dare to enter a cabin, for everyone was now against them. Some few contrived to escape to America, but the others wandered about the mountains, famished, hiding under rocks, and not daring to kindle a fire.

At length the people pretended to be friendly, and some villagers invited them to come to a supper in a barn, where they declared they would be safe. The miserable wretches, more than half-starved, came down the mountain, and, refusing to enter the building for fear of being surprised, sat down on the ground and began to eat voraciously. While so engaged, the peasants fell upon and disarmed them, and gave them up to justice. The trial came on at Cork. Duggan swore to them all, gave a circumstantial account of the murder, and seemed utterly callous to his own infamy. One of the culprits was actually a cousin of his own.

The prisoners were all convicted and sentenced to be hanged, their heads to be exposed on spikes round the market-house—MacCarthy, the gamekeeper, as the man who actually fired the shot, was to have his hand struck off and affixed above his head. They were ordered to be executed at Macroom, where they were conveyed, accompanied by the hangman, a hideous person, in an open cart.

The priests were removed when about half the journey had been performed, in order that the people, seeing them die without the consolations of religion, might be struck with greater awe. One of the convicts, quite a young boy, cousin of the gamekeeper, protested his innocence to the last, and it was the general impression that he was innocent, but that Duggan had sworn against him in order not to leave one of the family alive, who might take vengeance upon him hereafter.

When the cart with the wretched men arrived at a grove of trees at the entrance of Macroom, it was halted. A beam was laid between two trees, and two of the men were hanged at a time, one at each end; their miserable companions waiting their turn, and the people standing in silence around. When all had suffered, the hangman proceeded to carry out the remainder of the sentence, and the dreadful sight of the eight heads struck even more terror into the people than the execution.

Malachi Duggan, the captain of the gang and treacherous informer, received the reward which had been promised him and returned to his farm; he was quite brutalised, and had no feeling of shame. The first day on which he appeared at Macroom, he looked up to the heads and said: "Ha, ha! some of my soldiers are up there; the best place for the rascals."

He survived the trial many years, and, contrary to expectation, died in his bed at last; but his memory is held, even to this day, in the deepest execration in that part of the country. Of this there was a curious instance in comparatively recent times.

A gentleman, living some distance from Cork, had several servants, one of them a very nice young girl named Duggan, being a very far-away cousin of the horrible Malachi. There happened to be a dispute about some trifling matter on one occasion, when one of the other servants said to Duggan, "We shall really, miss, be obliged to call you Malachi." The poor girl did not answer a word, but that very evening left her place and set off to walk home to Cork, a distance of five-and-twenty miles, so disgraceful did she deem the imputation of belonging ever so remotely to the hated and treacherous informer.

The Family Doctor.

NEURALGIA.

THERE is, perhaps, no disease which produces such widespread suffering as neuralgia, for few people are so fortunate as to escape it altogether, and many are reduced by its tortures to a state verging on despair.

The word "neuralgia" simply means nerve-pain, and certainly the name is an apt one. For, whatever be its cause, its seat is in the sensory nerves—those nerves which carry sensation to the brain. Two most important kinds of nerves are distributed through our bodies—the sensory and the motor. They may be compared to numbers of telegraph-wires, all connected with the brain, which may be likened to the central telegraph-office. The motor nerves carry messages from the brain, which produce motions in our muscles, while the sensory nerves carry sensations to the brain. For instance, suppose a hot coal falls on the foot, the painful sensation rushes up by the sensory nerve, and immediately a message returns down a motor nerve which causes muscles to contract, and the foot is consequently immediately withdrawn. This is what, in the language of physiology, is called a "reflex action."

SYMPTOMS.

Since the seat of neuralgia is always a sensory nerve, excruciating pain is its unfailing symptom. It is almost invariably unilateral—that is, confined to one side of the body. It is intermittent, with irregular intervals. In some cases the pain recurs periodically. It may begin suddenly and as suddenly depart, leaving behind a grateful sense of relief. In many instances the pain darts from one place to another. There may be tender spots, where the sensation is as if a nail were being driven in. In old standing cases, a certain tenderness of the affected parts may remain, even during the periods of intermission.

In ordinary cases, as a rule, there is no external appearance of the disease, except, perhaps, a superficial redness, a slight muscular twitching, or an increased secretion of tears or saliva. But in rarer cases it may destroy hearing or vision, may turn hair grey and lead to divers complications.

CAUSES.

There are many causes which produce, or at least predispose to neuralgia. The most potent cause of its first onset is debility. It matters little how the constitution has been enfeebled. Anxiety, fatigue, worry, an enfeebling illness, may have been the predisposing cause. And the victim may remain to all appearance robust, while the nervous system is weakened or deranged. On the other hand, luxury and ennui produce enervating effects equally pernicious. In short, any depressing influence whatever may produce neuralgia, or aggravate it if it already exists.

Malarial disease renders the system very liable to be attacked by neuralgia. Cold and damp also act as existing causes. It may be produced reflexly by irritation, occasioned by decayed teeth, indigestion, or sudden mental emotion. It may likewise result from local injury, a nerve may be wounded and partly cut through, or it may be squeezed by some growing disease in a structure near which it lies. For example, the pressure of tight boots may cause neuralgic pains.

VARIETIES OF NEURALGIA.

Any superficial part of the body may be the seat of neuralgia, but certain parts or nerves are more commonly affected by it than others.

The fifth nerve is largely composed of sensory fibres, and has a wide distribution in parts of the head and face. Certain branches of this important nerve are, at special points, subject to neuralgia. The most commonly affected part is the eyebrow and the region adjacent. But there are many other spots about the head and face that are subject to excruciating pain.

Migraine or sick-headache, as it is commonly called, is another common form of neuralgia. The pain is on one side of the head, and sickness usually results. The sickness appears to relieve the pain, and it often happens that the patient falls into a sleep after it, from which he awakens, free from the acute pain, but with a stupefied feeling, and a sensation of tenderness about the affected parts. Excitement, heated rooms, and especially worry and mental restlessness, are the chief causes of this form of disease.

The chest and abdomen may also be the seats of neuralgia. The back, too, is not exempt.

Sciatica is the name given to it, when it runs down the back of the thigh, the nerve affected being a large one, called the sciatic nerve, running in that direction. This form is often very persistent, and may resist all attempts to cure it. Youth is generally free from it; it is apt to attack those between the ages of forty and forty-five. There is the usual tendency to tender points, whose situation varies in different cases.

Internal organs may become subject to neuralgia. When the heart is so attacked, the pain is accompanied by intense agony and a sense of suffocation. Colic is really intestinal neuralgia; the reflex cause in this case being undigested food.

PROSPECTS OF CURE.

It is difficult to foretell the course and end of a case of neuralgia.

If it be due to malarial disease, of not too long standing, appropriate treatment will soon cure it. The older the patient the worse the case, and a history of neuralgia in the family is always unfavourable.

Neuralgia is always most serious when it attacks those in the decline of life. Other important factors in the case are the patient's circumstances and surroundings, such as whether he be much exposed to cold and damp, and obliged so to continue. His social conditions are really most important of all. Neuralgia can never be cured amid worries and anxieties, or in those living among people who jar and irritate, while perhaps the worst condition of all is the idle, listless existence of so many well-to-do women. All these matters must be looked into, before any hope of a cure can be entertained.

TREATMENT.

The successful treatment of neuralgia is certainly the most interesting part of the subject, which sometimes baffles the most skilful physician.

There are two methods of treatment—the one where the means are directed to improve the constitution of the patient, and the other, the application of local remedies.

Every means of strengthening the body should be employed, and everything which tends to enfeeble it should be scrupulously avoided. Food should be nutritious and easy of digestion. It frequently happens that persons subject to neuralgia have a great objection to fats; and experience has proved that they derive great benefit by overcoming this dislike. If they cannot bring themselves to enjoy the fat of meat, they must, at least, be unsparing of the butter, and some can bring themselves to heartily relish the savoury though homely article called "dripping." Cod-liver oil, especially, and even olive-oil, is good. A more palatable remedy is Devonshire cream, which should be taken in gradually increasing quantities.

Outdoor exercise and plenty of fresh air are good, and it is well not to wrap up too closely. Entire change of scene and society will occasionally effect a complete cure. The patient should observe what tends to bring on or aggravate his pains, as this varies in every case, and should avoid such.

Many drugs have been prescribed for neuralgia. The beneficial effects of most are at least doubtful. Quinine is certainly efficacious in malarial neuralgia, in two or three grain doses three times a day. It may also prove useful as a tonic in ordinary cases. Other drugs may do good in some cases, but should only be taken at a doctor's direction and under his supervision. This warning specially applies to opium, which in the form of morphia, injected in small quantities under the skin, is often very efficacious. If the patient obtains relief from his medical attendant applying this remedy, he should not rest satisfied there, but should utilise his respite in fortifying his constitution against a return of the disease, otherwise this hypodermic injection will become a persistent and unwholesome necessity, gradually losing its power to lull the torture.

Ten minims of turpentine taken three times a day may give relief. It may be taken in milk.

Among local remedies, electricity must be mentioned as beneficial. It is best in the form of a continuous current, and not as obtained from turning the handle of a medical battery.

Counter-irritation effected by blistering agents or hot irons has been practised—a mustard-poultice may be equally useful. If the part affected be on the face where any kind of blistering is undesirable, a useful liniment may be made by getting a chemist to mix one part of chloroform with seven parts of olive-oil.

If all these remedies fail to give relief from tortures which are so intense that they cannot be endured during the length of time it must take to build up the constitution to throw them off, if indeed that were possible at all while such agonies were going on, then recourse may be had to surgical treatment. This consists of the nerve being divided. Some vary the operation by stretching the nerve, which occasionally gives permanent relief.

But the main points are to combat debility, to restrain worry and mental excitement, and to study the conditions which make for a healthy and happy life. This is better than to seek an insecure refuge in sedative and narcotic drugs. To hear some people speak, one would think "the nerves" had been given us for our torment. This is no more the case with them, than it is with our arms and our legs.

An Algerian Lion.

ALGERIA is, even to this day, infested with lions, to say nothing of panthers and other ferocious animals.

At the foot of the great mountain called Le Chaitla, seven or eight and twenty miles to the east of Batna, there are vast thickets of trees which form an excellent cover for the king of animals. He rarely leaves them except at night; and he then follows the numerous paths which cross them in all directions.

An Arab, one day, going to cut wood, hatchet in hand, was thoughtlessly following one of these paths, when, at a sudden turn, he found himself in the presence of an enormous lion. The animal, as much taken aback as the man, bristled his mane and uttered low growls; while the Arab, believing the lion about to attack him, brandished his hatchet with threatening gestures, a proceeding which could only serve to enrage the animal. In fact, the lion did advance; and then the Arab, mad with terror, dealt him a terrible blow on the head with his axe. Although stunned, the brute soon recovered and rushed upon its aggressor, and with his formidable jaw broke his thigh. The poor wretch's screams of pain, repeated by the echoes from rock to rock, seemed to have made the lion believe that he was surrounded by enemies, for he let go his prey and fled to his secret fortress. The unhappy man, in spite of his wound, profited by the short respite. With prodigious efforts he managed to haul himself up a tree, at the foot of which, the lion, soon discovering his mistake, stretched himself at full length to watch the victim who had just escaped him. But at last his friends discovered his situation and came to his rescue. Seventy or eighty Arabs, armed with guns and yataghans, halted about a hundred paces from the tree on which the poor fellow could hardly longer retain his hold. Among them was a famous runner, who used to run races with horses. "Fire all at once," he told them. "To attack you he will quit the tree. I shall then be able to get up it and support the wounded man until an opportunity occurs of fetching him away." A general discharge ensued. The lion, only wounded, rushed at his assailants, but, hurt as he was, did not succeed in catching one. He then returned to the foot of the tree, up which the nimble Arab had climbed, and was holding the patient in his arms half dead with pain and fright.

Meanwhile, after reloading, the Arabs came back determined to make an end of it. Forming a circle, they advanced within fifty paces, fired all at once, and again fled, pursued by the exasperated animal. Taking advantage of the moment, the runner slipped down the tree, bringing with him the wounded man, whom he hoisted on his back, and then hastened to escape. The lion, who had seen every movement, was on the point of seizing his prey a second time, when the poor man's two brothers, who had reserved their fire to cover his retreat, discharged their guns at the lion, who, this time seriously wounded, fell, but soon got up again. One of them then plunged his yataghan into his belly. The lion turned sharply upon him, and with one stroke of his talons and one bite of his jaw, killed him on the spot. Leaving this victim on the ground the Arabs accompanied the first sufferer to the village, where he also soon breathed his last. The survivor of the three then swore an oath that he would either kill the lion or that the lion should kill him. He then stripped himself of all his clothing, took two guns and a pistol, and went off, expressly prohibiting anyone to follow.

Arrived at the scene of the recent combat, he saw the lion lying on the ground, about ten paces from his brother's body, close to a copse of evergreen oak. The lion allowed him to approach to within twenty paces without seeming to pay any attention. The Arab took aim between the head and the shoulder, and fired. In two bounds the lion reached his enemy, who coolly stuck the muzzle of his second gun into the animal's ear and blew his brains out. Of course, the victor, after receiving hearty and loud congratulations, was carried in triumph to his tent. The probability is, that if the man who first encountered the lion had had sufficient presence of mind to have quietly stepped aside from the path, the animal would not have followed.

American Newspapers in the Far West.

THERE is not a town anywhere in the Far West without a local weekly, bi-weekly, or even daily paper. As it never happens that the whole community is of one mind in matters political, we generally find one devoted to the interests of the Democratic party, and a second to the well-cherished opinions of the Republicans—these two parties dividing social affairs and public and private life in "the Far West."

The first thing which attracts attention in the little, dirty-looking, ill-printed sheet, is its astounding personality, which is generally not so much directed against the other party, or even against the rival paper, as against the editor of it in his private capacity. Every Western editor's name is prominently printed at the head of his paper, and instead of talking as the Eastonville Gazette might, of our "contemptible contemporary, the Journal," the Western paper talks of "that low-lived hound, Cephas E. Slocum, who edits his miserable two-bit thing over the way."

Here is a description of the character and appearance of a San José editor as painted a few years ago by a rival journalist:

"He is a professional loafer, and may generally be seen round drinking-saloons, not only at election times, but for years after. He makes a game of politics, and plays as he would a game of short cards—a cut-throat monté. He wears his hair short—a style known as the 'fighting cut'—that he may always be ready for a scrimmage, and his adversary may take no undue advantage. The preponderance of his brains is located between his ears. His countenance is concave, and one, or both of his eyes, are usually 'in mourning,' from the effects of his last fight. He is 'powerful' in 'primaries,' where he votes early and often for his favourite candidates, succeeds, and calls the nomination regular. He can tell the difference between a whisky straight and a gin cock-tail with his eyes shut, and can snuff a treat two blocks off. He spends his money in riotous living, and makes it a point of honour never to pay an honest debt. He accepts office for the sake of stealings, and is loyal because it pays best."

There is no joke here; the man was perfectly in earnest, as none who knew the brace of worthies would doubt. Nothing can better illustrate this personality, as well as the dearth of local news, than the following, taken from a Nevada newspaper, the Virginia Enterprise.

"We observe that Brier, local of the News, has on a new coat. If we remember right, there was a dry goods store burnt out a short time ago, and that a number of coats which were put on the street for safety, after having been saved from the fire, were missing. Of course we don't intend to cast any reflection, or to say that Brier nipped any of them. Oh, no!"

Sometimes these personal pen-battles are a little more truculent. There was a well-known editor "out West," of the name of Prentice; Prentice was never known to be put out, and accordingly Mr. Smith (as we shall call him) of the Cleveland Plain Dealer made a fatal mistake when he penned the following: "Prentice is a liar, and we shall tell him so when we meet him!" Prentice thus replied in his next paper: "Ah! Will you, Mr. Smith? About that time there will be a funeral, and the Smith family will be the principal mourners!"

Probably, no one likes, when "running" for the honourable office of Congressman or State judge, to have it announced in a newspaper that, in an early portion of his career, he murdered his grandmother, and ignominiously buried her in the back-kitchen. Mr. "Artemus Ward," himself a quondam "newspaper man," exactly struck this nail on the head when he represented in the "controversy about a plank-road," this attack upon the editor of the Eagle of Freedom. The passage is worth quoting:

"The road may be, as our contemporary says, a humbug; but our aunt isn't bald-headed, and we haven't got a one-eyed sister Sal! Wonder if the editor of the Eagle of Freedom sees it." This used up the Eagle of Freedom feller, because his aunt's head does present a skinned appearance, and his sister Sarah is very much one-eyed. 'We have recently put up in our office an entirely new sink, of unique construction, with two holes, through which the soiled water may pass to the new bucket underneath. What will the Hell-hounds of the Advertiser say to this? We shall continue to make improvements as fast as our rapidly increasing business may warrant. Wonder whether a certain editor's wife thinks she can palm off a brass watch-chain on the community for a gold one."

As might be expected, such personalities occasionally lead to hostile encounters between rival editors, and between editors and their readers. Most frequently these consist only in a thrashing on either side, and probably few Western editors have missed having a difficulty of that sort at one time or another on their hands. In a scrap-book kept by Mr. B. Griffin, of Victoria, in the early years of California, such items as the following are not unfrequent: Collision between H. A. De Courcy, Esq., editor of the Calaveras Chronicle, and Mr. W. H. Carter; "Editorial Difficulty down at Santa Clara—Man Shot," etc.

The following story is told of a new editor who had come to a place which was infested by a gang of ruffians. Before his face was generally known, he attacked these men most violently in his paper. One day, as he was sitting in his office after the appearance of a particularly severe article, a stalwart individual, brandishing a whip, rushed in and enquired for the editor. Suspecting evil, he asked his visitor to be seated, and said he would call the editor, who had just stepped out for a minute. On his way downstairs he met a second individual, carrying a bludgeon, who likewise enquired vigorously for the editor. "Oh, sir, he is sitting in his office upstairs. You'll find him there." When he next peeped into the office, the two were belabouring each other with all their might, rolling over and over, and each fancying he had the editor in hand.

Teaching at Home.

ARITHMETIC. PART I.

NOT long ago I happened to be drinking tea with a large family of children, when the middle little girl—there is always a middle child in a large family, who serves as a link between the "big ones" and the "little ones"—when the middle little girl proposed the following question:

"I have got four sweets; and how am I to divide them between my three dolls?"

The "little ones" looked puzzled, and suggested various impossible answers, till presently the youngest of the party, who had somewhat the reputation of a dunce, and had not yet had lessons in arithmetic, remarked:

"You must give one and one-third to each doll."

The big ones, who had not condescended to show any interest about the dolls, and had been listening with calm superiority to the guesses of the little ones, were quite excited by this display of wisdom.

"Why, how did you know that, Henry?" "Hallo, Henry, who taught you fractions?" "How did Henry find that out, mamma?" were the questions heard on all sides.

Henry, unaccustomed to so much notice, and blushing, half with confusion and half with pleasure at the sensation he had produced, reflected in silence for a minute or two, and then announced his method:

"You think, and think, and think, and then it comes."

For the benefit of those who are unacquainted with juvenile language, I would explain that "it" refers to the answer of the arithmetical question proposed.

The little fellow had unconsciously hit on the true method of studying arithmetic—you must think.

If I had, in one sentence, to point out the distinction between the study of arithmetic and the study of language, I should reply that language is chiefly a matter of memory, and arithmetic a matter of reasoning. Of course this only expresses the subject in a very rough way, and applies chiefly to the colloquial knowledge of a language. Memory also helps us in the study of arithmetic, but it is so much more a matter of reasoning that, at any rate in the elementary stage, a very quick memory is sometimes a drawback, the pupil trying to recollect when he ought really to reflect.

In teaching arithmetic, people too often forget that it is a science, founded, like other sciences, on observation and reflection. With a majority of pupils it is the only exact science they will ever have the opportunity of learning; it is therefore the more to be lamented, when their one chance of scientific training is wasted by the incompetence of a teacher, who presents arithmetic to them in the light of a series of conjuring tricks—so many figures here, so many there, shuffle them about a little, and behold the result!

THE pupil has to remember a large number of rules (perhaps it would be more correct to say recipes, for the language of the arithmetic-book too often suggests that of the cookery-book), and as he does not understand the reason of what he is doing, he is unable to apply them intelligently, and can only work out sums when they appear in a shape to which he is accustomed.

I have known parents among the labouring classes and the little shopkeepers, whose own education had been neglected, express their surprise at finding their children, after years of school teaching, unable to perform the arithmetical operations needed in everyday life, and which the parents themselves had solved by mother-wit alone. Yet these same children could doubtless work out sums in multiplication and long division, gabble through their tables, give you interesting information about firkins and kilderkins, and even tell you what weights you should use, if you wanted to buy rubies or diamonds.

I DO not mean to say that this unintelligent mode of teaching is universal, but that there is far too much of it I am certain, from the number of times I have heard children ask: "Please, sir, what rule am I to do this sum by?" If anyone has doubts on the subject, let him try and find out how many fairly educated women can explain the reason of the method usually adopted in working a long division sum.

THE home teacher, or any independent teacher, has a great advantage over the national school teacher, in that he is not obliged to take his pupils along at any given rate of speed. Nowhere is this freedom of such advantage as in teaching arithmetic. Indeed, where it is decreed that a child of seven years old shall know so much arithmetic, that at eight years he shall know so much more, and so on, it is impossible for many children to learn intelligently.

BEFORE a child begins the formal study of arithmetic, or is put to work with numbers on slate or paper, he should have a certain amount of practical acquaintance with the subject. Anyone who has watched very young children will have an idea of the way in which the first ideas of arithmetic are formed.

A LITTLE child just learning to speak seldom uses a plural. He will say chair, chair, chair, to every chair in the room, or button, button, button, to every button on your dress. He looks at each object separately, and has not yet thought of adding them together, and speaking of them as chairs or buttons. His first step forward will be when he recognises a certain likeness between chair and chair, which does not exist between chair and button. Even yet, however, he will probably not employ the plural, but some other word, such as "more" or "another," or the nearest approach to such words as his baby lips can frame.

PERHAPS he is standing at his mother's knee when he makes his discovery. He has possessed himself of that object so dear to the infant mind, his mother's work-basket. She is watching him as he takes up a reel of cotton and, having duly examined it, sets it on the table beside him. He makes a fresh dive into the basket, and again brings out a reel of cotton, and shouts delightedly "More reel." He has made his first effort at addition, the little word "more" shows he has noticed a connection between the two reels of cotton, which he had not noticed between the several chairs or buttons; he is feeling his way towards a plural. At this point the mother probably steps in, and counts over for baby, "One reel, two reels;" or a little sister is playing in the room and gets tired of hearing him repeat, "More reel—more reel." "Why don't you say two reels, baby?" she calls out. "Here are three reels, and here are four reels;" and she arranges them for baby's contemplation, till he wearies of her airs of superiority, and makes a dash at the little heap, and sends them flying across the room. But none the less he has had his first lesson in arithmetic, and it will be well for him if all his future lessons are as judicious.

WHEN our baby has once learnt to count his two reels, he has acquired a better knowledge of arithmetic than some savage tribes ever attain to; other races never get beyond number three in their reckoning, though it is difficult to imagine how a five-fingered being can stop at that point.

THE various nursery-rhymes and baby games carry on the child's education. Nurse, as she puts him to bed, counts over the little toes while she relates the time-honoured history of the five pigs who went to market, or she holds up her fingers one after another to the rhyme:

One, two, three, four, five,
I caught a hare alive;
Six, seven, eight, nine, ten,
I let him go again.

THE games at ball or skipping, when the bigger children count how many they can keep up, all help the unconscious learner, till an ordinary child of five years old will generally be able to count up to twenty, though he may not yet have had any formal teaching.

MANY children, of course, can do much more than this, but I should be quite satisfied with the above rate of progress, for arithmetic is, above all others, a study where it does not answer to hurry. It is quite immaterial (unless you have the fear of the examiner before your eyes) whether your pupil learns multiplication at the age of eight or nine; the important thing is, that he should know what he is about, and not be puzzled, for instance, because he is given two figures to multiply together, and can't decide which should be the multiplier, and which should be the multiplicand.

WHERE a child shows a great aversion to the study, or appears to find unusual difficulty, it is very likely a sign that you have begun to teach him too soon. His mind may not be ripe enough, or his ideas about numbers may not be yet sufficiently advanced for him to get any good out of formal lessons in arithmetic. In such cases it is best to drop the subject for a time, and merely encourage or help the child, in an indirect fashion, to increase his knowledge of numbers.

Get him to count things over for you occasionally; perhaps there is some treasured toy, a puzzle, or box of spellicans, and you tell him to count the pieces as he puts them away, and make sure they are all there—let him share things among his brothers and sisters, deal out the dominoes or counters when they are playing a game.

AT the end of a twelvemonth try him again at his sums, and you will very likely be surprised at the difference that a year has made; the child learning as much now in six weeks as he would formerly have done in six months. Not only will he now learn faster, he will also learn better; you will find that you need to explain much less, and that your pupil will be able to find out much more.

THE first thing to guard against in teaching arithmetic is allowing your pupil to give an unintelligent "Yes" to your remarks. It is so easy for him to say "Oh yes, I see;" such a trouble for him to make sure that he really has grasped your meaning. And the misfortune is that when once a pupil has been allowed to get into an unintelligent method of working, it is next to impossible to get him out of it.

WHEN he has got the idea fixed into his mind that the object of arithmetic is to fill up a paper with neatly-worked sums in the most expeditious manner possible, he resents any attempt on your part to explain the principles by which he should be guided as a foolish waste of his time, and, instead of listening to what you say, is only wondering when you will leave off. Yet in no study is it more important for pupil and teacher to work together than in arithmetic. With patience and repetition, the most absent-minded or thoughtless child may be drilled into learning verbs and declensions, but it is hopeless trying to make him reason when he will not even give his attention. The mischief is so irreparable, when once committed, that the only thing to be done is to prevent its ever arising, and I would even defer a child's beginning arithmetic for years rather than teach him before he was mentally competent to learn it rationally, or let him have his young mind confused by an incompetent teacher.

I HAVE hitherto spoken only of the preliminary education in arithmetic, which a child obtains from his own experiences and the ordinary conversation around him, and which often enough, unfortunately, remains the only intelligent and practically useful instruction he ever receives on the subject. In another paper I shall hope to offer a few suggestions how best to carry on the education begun by those two most excellent teachers, Nature and Circumstances.

"A Gentleman."

TWO great errors colouring, or rather discolouring, severally, the minds of the higher and lower classes, have sown wide dissension and wide misfortune through the society of modern days. These errors are in our modes of interpreting the word "gentleman."

Its primal, literal, and perpetual meaning is—"a man of pure race," well bred, in the sense that a horse or dog is well bred. The so-called higher classes, being generally of purer race than the lower, have retained the true idea and the convictions associated with it, but are afraid to speak it out, and equivocate about it in public—this equivocation mainly proceeding from their desire to connect another meaning with it, and a false one: that of "a man living in idleness on other people's labour;" with which idea the term has nothing to do. The lower classes, denying vigorously, and with reason, the notion that a gentleman means an idler, and rightly feeling that the more anyone works, the more of a gentleman he becomes and is likely to become—have, nevertheless, got little of the good they otherwise might from the truth, because, with it, they wanted to hold a falsehood, namely, that race was of no consequence. It being precisely of as much consequence in man as it is in any other animal.

The nation cannot truly prosper till both these errors are finally got quit of. Gentlemen have to learn that it is no part of their duty or privilege to live on other people's toil. They have to learn that there is no degradation in the hardest manual, or the humblest servile, labour when it is honest. But there is degradation, and that deep, in extravagance, in bribery, in indolence, in pride, in taking places they are not fit for, or in coining places for which there is no need. It does not disgrace a gentleman to become an errand-boy or a day-labourer; but it disgraces him much to become a knave or a thief. And knavery is not the less knavery because it involves large interests, nor theft the less theft because it is countenanced by usage or accompanied by failure in undertaken duty. It is an incomparably less guilty form of robbery to cut a purse out of a man's pocket than to take it out of his hand on the understanding that you are to steer his ship up Channel when you do not know the soundings.

On the other hand, the lower orders, and all orders, have to learn that vicious habit and chronic disease communicates itself by descent; and that, by purity of birth, the entire system of the human body and soul may be gradually elevated, or, by recklessness of birth, degraded, until there shall be as much difference between the well-bred and ill-bred human creature (whatever pains be taken with their education) as between a wolf-hound and the vilest mongrel cur. And the knowledge of this great fact ought to regulate the education of our youth and the entire conduct of the nation.—Ruskin.

Household Gardening.

WITH December comes winter, not always sudden and severe, as the seasons vary, and the character of the weather is seldom the same in all districts; yet where sharp frosts have not occurred they must be expected and prepared for. Outdoors everything of a tender nature should have protection, and in the case of greenhouses means must be adopted for keeping out frost. In the open garden a wisp of litter wound round such plants as the lovely, tender Tea-Roses, will usually preserve them from injury, while a few handfuls of ashes or cocoanut fibre refuse placed over the roots of Carnations, Hollyhocks, Chrysanthemums, Fuchsias, and other plants liable to suffer by extreme frosts, will be of great service. Too commonly, persons are very active in making their plants "safe" after they have been injured. We would have them move in the matter a little sooner, and have everything in readiness for use when it may be needed, and thus disappointment will be averted, and plants saved that might otherwise be lost.

EXCLUDING FROST FROM GREENHOUSES.

Beyond all question the cleanest, safest, healthiest, and best method of effecting this is by a boiler, and warm water conveyed round the house in pipes. In fixing a boiler and pipes a few hints of guidance will be of service to many, for although a small apparatus may be obtained from any ironmonger, it is not at all certain that he will be able to fix it to work satisfactorily, as it is not all ironmongers even who have had the requisite experience. Many of them are very competent, but not all, and it is always of advantage to a purchaser to be able to perceive that what he is having done is being done properly.

BOILERS FOR HEATING.

There are so many different boilers in the market, and each is lauded so highly, that the inexperienced amateur is not a little puzzled in making a selection. We will endeavour to simplify the matter by stating that no one boiler possesses half, or even a tenth part of the superiority over another that is represented, and if there are ten boilers, each guaranteed to heat a given quantity of piping, no one will make a very great mistake if he chooses the cheapest, be it saddle, conical, tubular, or spiral.

A saddle boiler is just what its name denotes, a vessel for holding water arched like a saddle, the fire being made under the arch for heating the water. This is a plain useful kind and will burn almost any kind of fuel—coke, coal, or wood.

A tubular boiler consists of a number of hollow tubes, either arranged vertically or horizontally, the former being fed from the top—coke being the best fuel for them—the latter from below, the same as the saddle boiler. Both the above kinds, saddle and tubular, have to be set in brickwork, and a bricklayer will know how to set them.

A conical boiler is a simple double cylinder containing water with a space in the centre for fire, the fuel being placed in at or near the top and closed with a lid. Coke, or a mixture of coal and coke, is the best for heating this boiler, which is complete in itself and requires no masonry in setting. This is very useful and convenient for very small structures.

A spiral boiler consists simply of a pipe coiled round in the form of a screw, and the coil enclosed in a case of iron lined with fire-clay, the top of the pipe being connected with the piping in the house for conducting the water out of the boiler, this pipe in turn being joined to the end at the bottom of the coil for conveying the water back again. This is a very simple and efficient apparatus, and needs no brickwork. The fuel is put in through a lid at the top, and there is an ash door at the bottom.

All the boilers that are made, by whatever name they are called, belong to one or other of the kinds mentioned; the two latter—the conical and spiral—are usually the most convenient for small greenhouses from twelve to twenty feet long, the others for larger structures where they are likely to remain as fixtures for a number of years.

ARRANGING HOT-WATER PIPES.

The manner in which this is done is of far more importance than any mere shape of boiler. Water may be heated in any boiler under or around which a fire is confined, but we want the water to flow out of the boiler, circulate freely through the pipes in the house, and back again into the boiler to be heated again. That is the great desideratum, and it is easily effected.

Every boiler, no matter what its shape, must have two openings in the form of short pipes forming part of itself. One of these must be at or near the top, the other near the bottom; the farther these pipes are apart the better; the former cannot be too high, nor the other too low. If they are close together, or nearly so, reject the boiler, for it would be costly as a gift.

In placing a boiler its top must always be distinctly below the level of the pipes that are conducted through the house. A foot lower will do very well, but two feet would be no worse, while if the boiler happened to be ten feet down the circulation would be perfect. This is mentioned in case it may be convenient for having it in a cellar.

FLOW AND RETURN PIPES.

The pipe connected with that at the top of the boiler is called the "flow" pipe, because the water flows out of the boiler through it. This pipe is best to have a steady rise, say of an inch in nine or ten feet, to the farther end of the house; it is there turned by an elbow and brought with a steady decline or regular "fall," and connected with the opening at the bottom of the boiler. From the bend back to the apparatus the pipe is called the "return," because the water returns through it into the boiler.

Observe particularly that the flow-pipe should not have any sudden dips throughout its course, such as for passing under a doorway, as this would impede the circulation of the water, this, when heated, always having a tendency to rise because of its being lighter. Nor must the return pipe anywhere in its course be sunk below the bottom of the boiler, or there would be a decided obstruction to the free movement of the water.

AIR AND FEED PIPES.

On the very highest part of the flow-pipe in the house, a small air pipe should be fixed. Drilling a small hole in the pipe and inserting a peg will do, this to be withdrawn if there should be air in the pipes. When water follows when the peg is drawn out, all will be right, and the aperture must be closed. A small pipe with a tap in it instead of the peg renders the work more complete.

The feed-pipe is for keeping the apparatus supplied with water. The most convenient method is to have a small cistern that will hold a gallon or two, fixed above the boiler, an inch pipe passing from it and made to enter the return pipe close to the boiler. If this cistern be placed just on a level with the highest part of the pipes, in the house, or a little above them, and kept filled with water, that will be evidence that the pipes are filled too, and all will be well.

JOINING THE PIPES.

The cleanest and quickest mode is to get some india-rubber rings of the right size; place one of these round the end of a pipe, and push it firmly into the socket of the next; a water-tight joint will thus be made in a moment, and the aperture can be filled up, if preferred, with a little cement, which will make the pipes firm throughout their length. India-rubber rings are specially made for this purpose and can be had from an ironmonger.

There are other methods of arranging and fixing pipes, but the plan described is the simplest and best. Rightly carried out it is certain to prove effectual, and the entire apparatus will be absolutely safe.

The principle of heating indicated is applicable to the largest ranges of houses, containing, if need be, miles of four-inch piping, or to a miniature greenhouse or frame with its few feet of one or two inch gas-piping for conducting the water from and to the boiler.

A very small apparatus may be heated by gas where it is provided, or, failing this, with a petroleum stove or lamp; but in every case, whether the heat is communicated by coal, coke, gas, or oil, the fire is best outside the house, and this can generally be contrived by the exercise of a little ingenuity.

The subject under notice is one that exercises the minds of so many individuals at this period of the year, and is supposed by not a few to be so complex, if not dangerous, that we have endeavoured to make the matter plainer than it was before; and we are not without hope that those who think out the points as they read them, will find the process of heating a greenhouse as easy as A, B, C. We pass now to a totally different subject.

GRUBS IN GARDENS.

A correspondent, whose case we know to be a typical one, seeks information relative to the extirpation of "grubs an inch and a half long, something like a piece cut out of the middle of a worm, but dirtier-looking and browner." This is the larvæ of the crane fly, commonly known as the daddy-long-legs, the popular name of the grub being the "leather jacket."

This is one of the worst and most difficult to destroy of all garden and farm pests. It often takes possession of lawns and spoils them, the sheaths from which the insects emerge being seen protruding through the surface and the grubs are found in shoals. They devour every vegetable they come in contact with, and not unfrequently ruin entire fields of wheat.

In fields the natural enemies of the grubs are starlings; in gardens, fowls. The former birds should never be destroyed; and as for fowls, although they are generally a nuisance in gardens, there are times when they may prove beneficial.

By no departure from the ordinary time of sowing or planting, can the depredations of the daddy-long-legs be evaded. Lawns in which the grubs abound should be rolled heavily and frequently. The following mixture may also be tried by pouring it on the nests. If it does not kill the grubs nothing will without also killing the grass, or the plants they may be attacking.

A GOOD INSECTICIDE.

First dissolve two ounces of soft-soap in a gallon of rain-water, then mix in this thoroughly by violent agitation a small wineglassful of petroleum; next add a little water to two ounces of white hellebore powder and form a paste, and this dissolve in a gallon of water. Now mix the two solutions, soap-petroleum and hellebore, stirring forcibly, and pour on the infested parts. This will kill almost anything in the way of insects, while it acts slightly as a manure to the soil. But do not apply it when the sun is shining, but only in the evening, or on dull days.

GAS-LIME AND GAS-WATER.

Vacant ground, in which grubs abound, may be now advantageously dressed with gas-lime at the rate of two or three ounces to a square yard of surface, and forked in, mixing it well with the soil. This is an excellent grub antidote and also acts as a manure; but it must not be applied amongst crops, nor at the rate mentioned just before plants are inserted in the spring. It is readily obtainable at gasworks. Ammoniacal liquor, also to be obtained from there, mixed with five or six times its volume of water, and poured on the soil or grass is similarly beneficial; it is an excellent manure, while insects of all kinds detest it, and usually take their departure from ground to which it is applied.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

AGNES.—The first step you must take to qualify for a schoolmistress is to learn to spell properly. Do you know that although you describe yourself as "a nicely-educated girl," you have, in your short letter to us, misspelled three words—"military," "civilian," and "occasions"?

ATTACHÉ.—Your only chance is to take specimens of your work to the shops where such things are sold.

CUPID.—"That air and harmony of shape express, Fine by degrees, and beautifully less."—"Henry and Emma," by Matthew Prior, 1664-1721.

DICK SWIVELLER.—The poem you want is called, "Break, Break, Break," and is by Alfred Tennyson. It was written between thirty and forty years ago, and you will, therefore, see it cannot possibly have such an application as you suppose.

DOS AND CO.—A slip of the author's, of course. He apologises, but, at the same time, feels highly complimented by the very close attention you must have given to the story.

ENGINEER STUDENT.—The subjects of examination and marks awarded are: Arithmetic, 300; handwriting, 40; accuracy and intelligence in writing from dictation, 60; composition, 100; grammar, 150; French, translation into English, 100; French grammar, 50; geography, 100; algebra up to and including quadratic equations, 300; geometry—the subjects of Books I. to IV., and Book VI. of "Euclid's Elements," and the definitions of Book V.—300; total, 1,500.

E. T. N. A. J.—1. It depends on the nature of the disease; medical advice should certainly be sought. 2. Consult an optician. No doubt spectacles of a proper kind are necessary. 3. You could dye the wrap yourself, but whether one bottle of Judson's dye would be sufficient depends upon the size of it.

H. F.—1. You should wear leather wrist-straps or bands, which will afford support, and elastic anklets for the weak ankles. Avoid standing as much as possible; bathe the weak joints with salt and water, and apply gentle friction afterwards. 2. Enquire at University College, Gower Street. See "Dickens's Dictionary of London." 3. Apply to Effingham Wilson and Co. for a list of their publications. 4. We do not know of any better stylographic pen than that sold by Messrs. Waterlow. The cost is from twelve to sixteen shillings.

JARGE.—1. The best position for painting is a northern aspect. 2. The designation of private soldiers in the Royal Engineers. Formerly the non-commissioned officers and privates of that corps received the general appellation of the Royal Sappers and Miners, which is now no longer used. Their duties consist in building fortifications, in executing field-works, and in performing similar operations under the direction of their superior officers.

J. B. S.—We do not know of any fund available in the case. You will find in "Herbert Fry's Handbook of the Charities of London," particulars of all charitable funds and institutions.

J. S. (Glasgow).—The play was "No Thoroughfare," and was played at the Adelphi. We do not know if it was printed. Enquire at French's, 89, Strand. We do not answer questions of this kind by post.

LEONORA.—1. "Steff-ah-know-tiss," accent on first and third syllables. 2. The present fashion is a fork, but we prefer a spoon as more sensible. 3. Always, unless he apologises. 4. It would improve with practice; at present it is rather young.

LITTLE EM'LY.—We doubt whether any pope acted in this way. In any case such action was needless. The change was gradual, both the Jewish Sabbath and Christian Sunday (dies solis) being at first kept as holidays. The twenty-ninth Canon of the Council of Laodicea (about 370 A.D.) no doubt greatly promoted the exclusive observance of Sunday; and Gregory the Great (Bishop of Rome) issued instructions on the subject. For further information, see Hessey's "Bampton Lectures."

Puzzles for Prizes.

RULES.

1. Answers should be written on one side of the paper only, and should be posted so as to reach the office, 24, Great New Street, Fetter Lane, E.C., by the first delivery on the Tuesday after date of publication. Envelopes must be addressed, "The Puzzle Editor," and each answer must bear the nom de plume of the writer legibly written on the top of the first sheet.

2. A First Prize of TEN SHILLINGS and a Second Prize of FIVE SHILLINGS will be awarded each week to the best and second-best answers respectively to the two Puzzles set. The Puzzle Editor reserves, however, the right of withholding either the First or Second Prize, or both, if, in his opinion, the answers received should not come up to the required standard of merit.

3. No winner of a First Prize will be eligible for another Prize during the same quarter. A winner of a Second Prize will be eligible for another Second Prize in the same quarter, but not for a First Prize.

4. Every Prize-winner must consent to send his or her name and address for publication.

5. The Puzzle Editor's decision is to be taken as final.

PUZZLES.

1. Catechism on the Policeman.

Catechising is not now so much in vogue as a means of imparting knowledge as it was a few years ago. Everyone remembers "Magnall's Questions," "The Guide to Knowledge," and "Joyce's Scientific Dialogues," with their gravity, their stilted language, and their occasional odd turns of dialogue, so unlike the fragmentary conversation of everyday. This is the sort of thing that is now to be burlesqued in a "Catechism of the Policeman." Questions are to be asked and answers given concerning that functionary, his outward appearance is to be described, and an analysis made of his mental state, imparting to the whole as much humour of a whimsical kind as the writers have at their command. Answers are not limited in length; but the proverb about brevity and wit must be kept in mind.

2. A Poetical Acrostic.

The following confused lines are taken at random from one of Lord Byron's plays. When they have been arranged into their proper sense, the initials and finals, read downwards, will give two characters in the same piece:

1. E'er deepest the the mourn truth fatal must.
2. Me before fallen none and baffled have many.
3. Hour of that nor moment a redeem would.
4. Disclaim upon I strength my defy do.
5. Gadara Eros Anteros and at.
6. Fair me then thine come thus it for do let pledge.

Prize Winners in No. 133.

1st Prize, 10s., "Syd Gardnor" (S. G. Jarman, Esq., Grosvenor Villa, Wembdon, Bridgwater).

2nd Prize, 5s., "Medway" (R. H. Rook, Esq., 19, Clapton Square, Clapton, E.).

The Winner of First Prize in No. 130, was Miss C. Choe Bayley, The Wilderness, Ascot ("The Arabs").

The Single-Rhymed Alphabets are remarkably good, and among so many excellent specimens, especially minute criticism has been employed. Numerous verses have been rejected on the old score of defective metre, but a large number were perfect in this respect, therefore a further weeding was effected by the rejection of imperfect rhymes, and again by the putting aside of verses which disposed of the X line by a device such as Xcellent. Many alphabets, otherwise good, were disqualified on this account. Among the best may be mentioned "Atlas," "Amethyst," "Gloire de Dijon," "Warwickshire Lass," "Mary," "Barney," "Ethel May," "Anceps," "Crystal Palace," "Irish Exile," "Sporran," "Pericardium," "Cupid," "Eft," "Trehelig," and "Zozimus."

The Answer to the Arithmetical Charade is:

"Necessity is the mother of invention."

1. Orchis; 2. Hot; 3. You; 4. Vine; 5. Test; 6. Fen; 7. Sit; 8. Me; 9. Ne; 10. I.

OUT OF THE RUNNING.—The following Prize-Winners come under the conditions of Rule 3, for thirteen weeks from the date of the Number in which they gained a Prize: No. 122.—1st Prize, "Midnight Oil"; 2nd Prize, "Stella." No. 123.—1st Prize, "Zyx"; 2nd Prize, "Comus." No. 124.—1st Prize, "Ferdinando"; 2nd Prize, "Ambrosia." No. 125.—Equal Prizes, "Frensham," "Ryland," "Maiblume." No. 126.—1st Prize, "Hookwood"; 2nd Prize, "L. C. L." No. 127.—1st Prize, "Manhattan"; 2nd Prize, "Maiblume." No. 128.—1st Prize, "Irish Exile"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 129.—Equal Prizes, "Abracadabra," "Acacia," "Ethel May." No. 130.—1st Prize, "The Arabs"; 2nd Prize, "Alice." No. 132.—1st Prize, "Atlas"; 2nd Prize, "Ethel May." No. 133.—1st Prize, "Syd Gardnor"; 2nd Prize, "Medway."

Answers have also been received from—Acacia, Anceps, Amethyst, Ambrosia, Attaché, Azile, Abracadabra, Atlas, A Sleaford Herring, Alice, Azalea, Ayrshire Lassie, Auburndale, Barney, Bosco, Bo Bo, Baitabite, Chestnut, Charman, Castor and Pollux, Cricket Cap, Crystal Palace, Chutney, Chaos, Canada, Congo, Con, Cloutarf, Cupid, Cuckoo, Cœur de Lion, Cui Bono, Clock, Cintra, Dormouse, Dora, Echo, Ella, Emma Jane, Ethel May, En Avant, Ellart, Eclipse, Eft, Eve, Ernest Louis Napoleon, Esperance, Froggie, Gloire de Dijon, G. G. D., Try Again, Trehelig, Umbra, Veritas, Vernon de Montgomery, Wallington House, Warwickshire Lass, Wildfire, Wooden Spoon, Walm, Ximena, Yorkshreman, Zigzag, Zephyr, Zozimus.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—STARLING.—It is necessary, except under exceptional circumstances, to answer both Puzzles in order to gain a Prize. WARWICKSHIRE LASS.—We are sorry we cannot now refer to your verses.

Answers to Puzzles in No. 132 received too late from Dum Spiro Spero.

Odds and Ends.

JASON MAGNUS was a celebrated lawyer of Pisa. One day being engaged in a cause with another lawyer, of the name of Socin, and finding himself somewhat embarrassed by his adversary, he took it into his head to fabricate a law at the moment, which gained him his cause. Socin perceived the trick, and as he was not less cunning, he immediately overturned Magnus's reference by another not less precise. Jason, who had never heard of such a law, insisted that Socin should declare where it was to be found. "It is to be found," replied Socin, "in the next chapter to that you have just referred to." Lorenzo de' Medicis, who was present, much applauded this repartee, and the whole assembly was entertained by this novel kind of argument.

A COUNTRY squire, walking through one of his woods, met a labouring man just getting over the gate at the entrance to the wood. On a tree which overshadowed the gate was a board, on which was written, "No path." "Can you read?" said the squire to the man. "Ya'as; where do you s'pose I was born and bred, if I can't read?" "Well, as you can read, will you be so good as to tell me what you see written there?" "What I sees written up there? Why, I sees a great lie. It says, 'No path,' and, hang me, if there isn't as good a path as ever I seed—wide eno' for you and me to walk on at the same time." Landlord, confounded, walked off without saying any more.

A COMICAL incident, caused by the absorbing interest of a piece, occurred not long ago in the performance of the play, "Mankind." One of its scenes is a coffee-house, the separate compartments of which are occupied by various people. Here two villains abstract from its lawful owner a will, which is immediately afterwards snatched from them, through a window, by a woman. One night when the woman appeared at the window, intent on this purpose, the villains were startled by receiving from a sympathising spectator in the pit a warning, in a thundering voice, to "look out for the old ooman."

THE miseries of a poor verbal memory are great. The Rev. Arthur Mursell says that his own father was one of the most impassioned and powerful extempore orators he ever heard; but he had a bad verbal memory, and "after working us up with a splendid passage of unprepared and impromptu eloquence, he tried to close the sentence with the text, 'Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other.' But the words escaped his recollection and he said: 'Mercy and truth are met together; and—and—and two similar sentiments have kissed each other.'"

THE boy that wears a watch is an important character. At school he is envied and in the street he is respected. None of the boys grab him and throw him down, for they might break his time-keeper. He has a way of twisting the chain when he talks, and of looking at his watch when he hears a railroad train, and saying twelve-ten, or six-five, or eight-sixteen. The other boys stand round and regard him with admiration. He grows up and probably goes to college with a distinguished air, but in a few years he pawns his watch with a man who, as a boy, often stood round and admired it.

THE following characteristic story is told of the commander-in-chief of the French army in the Crimea: Some years ago Pelissier, on parade one morning, got angry with a sous-officer of a cavalry regiment, whose tenue seemed to him very defective. He abused the man most violently, and cut him across the face with a whip. The man seized one of his pistols, and endeavoured to fire at his commanding officer; but the pistol missed fire. Pelissier, swearing a fearful oath, but otherwise quite calm, said: "Fellow! I order you a three days' arrest for not having your arms in better order."

An old maid died recently in Norway, leaving a will in which she directed that her estate be divided into six equal parts and distributed to her six discarded lovers, who are all poor. In explanation of this bequest, the deceased left the following upon record: "These lovers either courted me for my money, which they may now have, or else they loved me, and for that reason they shall have the money, because I disbelieved them."

A LITTLE bright-eyed boy, upon hearing his father read the story of Joan of Arc, was greatly moved by her sad trials; but when the part was reached where she was about to be burned to death at the stake, the poor little fellow could not contain himself any longer, but sobbingly clutched his parent's arm, and with big tears running down his plump little cheeks, cried, "But, pa, papa, wh-e-re were the police?"

EDWIN JAMES, examining a witness, asked him what his business was. He answered, "A dealer in old iron." "Then," said the counsel, "you must, of course, be a thief." "I don't see," replied the witness, "why a dealer in iron must necessarily be a thief, more than a dealer in brass."

THE town of Chartres was besieged by King Henry the Fourth of France, and capitulated. The magistrate of the town, on giving the keys, addressed his majesty: "This town belongs to your highness by divine law and by human law." "And by cannon law," replied the king.

AN hotel-keeper charging a traveller three times too much for bad accommodation, "What will you do when you have killed the goose that lays the golden egg?" said the grumbling traveller. "Wait for another goose," said the unabashed landlord.

"My dear," says Rattler, at the tea-table, looking up from his evening paper, "this French-China trouble looks serious." "Yes," answered Mrs. Rattler, "Bridget broke the handle off the sugar-bowl to-day, but I didn't think you would notice it so soon."

MR. GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA regards it as one of the luckiest and most merciful things that can possibly happen to a man that he should be almost invariably unlucky at cards. His own remembrances of poker are brief, but full of acute anguish.

A GOOD bourgeois, with his wife on his arm, cries out to a cartman: "Why do you beat your horse so cruelly?" "Because I haven't got any wife."

WHEN Mr. Ruskin says that a couple should court seven years, he fails to state who should pay the expenses.

SOME of the superstitions about Irish brides are amusing. It is an ill omen to rise before the sun the marriage morning; to dream of the croaking of a raven, or to see the shadow of his wing flit by in the sunshine; or to hear the knock of an invisible hand, which, however, should be listened for; or to note a winding-sheet in the candle. It is still more ominous to meet a red-haired woman on the 1st of May if the wedding is to be the following month, or to tread upon the poisonous beetle, whose death bodes fire or pestilence, or to speak with her lover before meeting him in church; and there are many other equally mysterious saws that are not very alarming because there are as many favourable omens on the other hand to counteract them.

WHEN M. Roland was presented to Louis XVI. on his appointment as Minister for one of the departments of State, the simplicity of his apparel excited the surprise and indignation of the Court satellites, who, deriving from etiquette their sole importance, believed the State depended on its preservation. "Oh, dear sir!" said the master of the ceremonies, with a countenance of alarm, whispering to Dumourier, and glancing at Roland, "he has no buckles on his shoes!" "Oh, shocking!" re-echoed Dumourier, with comic gravity, "we shall be ruined and undone."

WHEN Sothorn was in Philadelphia a lady in his company, who played a very minor part, gave herself an extraordinary amount of airs at rehearsal. Sothorn ordered a bill to be printed with the lady's name starred in large type, "supported by the following ladies and gentlemen:" and then followed the names of the company, ending up with Sothorn's in the smallest type of all. The bill was hung up in the theatre, and the young lady's pride came down several pegs.

"WHAT's that crowd about?" asked a stranger, as he noticed a stream of visitors going into a fashionable residence. "It's a silver wedding," obligingly replied his informant. "What's a silver wedding?" "Why, a chap's been married twenty-five times, and he's a celebratin' of it."

AN East End gentleman takes no interest whatever in the prevailing dog show. He says he has one of his own at home. His wife has a temper, and he and the children rarely pass a day without an exhibition of "Ma's tiffs."

A QUAKERESS said recently to a friend, in reference to the Quaker formula of marriage: "It is true I did not promise to obey when I was married; but I might as well, for I have had to do it."

"I AM afraid," said the Duke of Buckingham to Sir Robert Viner, "that I shall die a beggar." "At the rate you are going on," said Sir Robert, "I am afraid you will live one."

A GENTLEMAN asked Dr. Johnson why he hated the Scotch? "I don't hate them, sir, neither do I hate frogs, but I don't like to have them hopping about my chamber."

A CERTAIN duke was much addicted to the bottle. On a masquerade-night he asked Foote to suggest a new character to go in. "Go sober," said Foote.

Ursula.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

"Oh, Ursula, I am so glad that stupid lesson is over at last, I thought Herr Schultz would never stop, and you looked so aggravatingly interested in his wanderings. Two are company and three are none all the world over, and I think if it were not for the pleasure of learning with you, you dear old stupid, I should prevail upon my stern parent to allow me to discontinue the study of the German language. It is so slow, and I am so lazy."

So saying, Lilian Beauchamp threw herself back into the comfortable depths of a cushioned wicker chair, and surveyed her friend, who was industriously packing away the German books into a pretty little bookcase which filled one corner of the room.

"I suppose we were five minutes over our hour," said the last-mentioned girl meditatively, "but I wouldn't give up German, Lily, for all that. You'll get over the drudgery in time, and then think of the delight of reading 'William Tell' as Herr Schultz has been reading it to us this afternoon!"

"I'd rather forego that delight, Ursie, if the attainment of it is to render me so perfectly exhausted as I feel at present. Let us hie to the shade of the big oak, and perchance there we may find your swain, impatient, I have no doubt, to view once more your many charms, and study my stupidity."

At the beginning of her friend's remarks Ursula had still looked meditative, so meditative indeed that Lily had despaired of her words ever reaching her apparently-befogged brain, but the magic mention of George roused her, and, holding forth her hand to help Lily to rise, she said:

"Ah yes! George was to come, we were to play tennis, you and I, against him. I am quite ready, Lily; let us go at once."

Briskly, as she was bidden, Lily extricated herself from the enchanting chair, and the two girls passed out of the French-window on to the upper terrace of the old Manor House. Indeed they were bonny girls both; Ursula Lascelles "tall and stately," dark-haired, dark-eyed, looking straight ahead; Lilian, leaning on the strong arm, golden-haired, blue-eyed, willowy, not nearly so tall as her companion. To them, ere they had proceeded many steps from the house, advanced George, the swain before-mentioned.

"Ah, girls!" he called out, "I thought you must be asleep. Aunt Hannah and I have exhausted every topic of conversation, and are both tired of each other and ourselves. You must come and enliven us."

"Enliven you!" said Lilian, "I think it is Ursula and I who want enlivening after an hour and five minutes such as we have just passed through."

"I think I should like tea," murmured George; "may I run back and order it to be brought to the oak, Ursula?"

"I will go," she said, and turned back, nor did he offer to go with her as a lover might be supposed to do, but instead, in most unloverlike fashion, walked slowly on with Lilian, and, arrived at the oak, threw himself down in an easy attitude at Aunt Hannah's feet.

"You look tired out, George," said Aunt Hannah; "has that small walk been quite too much for you?"

"Quite too much, auntie, and for me, too," replied Lilian; "it is much too hot for tennis this afternoon, I am sure."

"It is very pleasant here," lazily responded George.

It was pleasanter still when, ten minutes later, tea was brought, and Ursula completing the group, dispensed it, with the accompaniment of great red strawberries deluged with cream, to her friends.

The summer sun glinted through the boughs of the trees; it was very delightful there in the shade. Beyond them the tennis-lawn lay in all its dazzling brilliancy; indeed it was too hot to think of playing until the cool of the evening.

When people are lazy, and have tea to drink and strawberries to eat, they are pretty certain to be silent and absorbed in doing and thinking as little as possible. It is therefore an excellent opportunity to explain a little who these people are.

Aunt Hannah, or Miss Morris, is Ursula Lascelles's aunt, sister to her mother; she lives with Ursula, and has done so since her father's death, one year before this time. Ursula's mother, who was Dora Morris before she married, was younger than Hannah by some three years; they both loved the same man, Hubert Lascelles, Hannah intensely and absorbingly as was her nature; Dora dearly, and with demonstration. Hubert chose the latter, not witting that Hannah's love was his; he wanted a wife, and saw that Dora liked him, and so they were wed.

When Ursula was nine years old her mother died, and her father, who was somewhat of a sybarite, did not trouble to marry again. He cultivated art, and made a companion of his small daughter, and also of his old college chum, Charles Dacre, to whom he presented the living of Dowthwaite, which lay in his gift. In George we see Charles Dacre's son. The friendship which existed between Hubert Lascelles and Charles Dacre was very great; they were both men of poetic temperament and rather impractical, and from the earliest days of Ursula and George, the children were encouraged to be much together, George's mother having likewise died very young.

It is almost needless to tell what plans were made for their future, plans in which Ursula and George figured as boy and girl lover, later as man and wife. The two most conveniently fell into these plans. George, as a boy, had not any great individuality of character; Ursula had; the consequence being that where Ursula led, George was perfectly willing to follow. It seemed quite a matter of course to him that Ursula should one day become his wife; so that when Mr. Dacre had talked to George and Mr. Lascelles to Ursula, the two met quite quietly, and George said, "I suppose, Ursie, we were always meant for one another. Do you love me?" and she answered, "Yes, George," and no more was said about it. It was in Ursula to throw her arms round George and kiss him, for she loved him truly, and she loved love; but she did not, because George did not appear to wish it. Certainly he did kiss her, but that was at parting in the evening when he had bidden Mr. Lascelles good-night, and quite in his ordinary and customary fashion—nothing different.

So matters had progressed. George had gone to Oxford; Ursula had lived on her life with her beloved father, until death snapped the chain, and he was taken. She then turned to George for comfort, and the young man gave it to the best of his ability. Ursula magnified that ability, and made a hero and ideal of her future husband, and so we find her at the present time in a perfect dream of happy love, not looking for much outward show, which, indeed, she did not get, but taking much for granted, and perfectly contented with the state of things as they were.

Ursula's friend, Lily Beauchamp, is the only one we have not mentioned. She is a new friend, one whom Ursula has not known for more than six months, and almost the only girl-friend she has ever made. She lives with her father, General Beauchamp, in the house not far from the manor, called Dowthwaite Hall.

It is a bonny place, this village of Dowthwaite, very peaceful, very lazy-looking, lying in a valley with mountains on three out of four sides; four miles away is a market-town, very conveniently placed for getting to any part of the country, and on one of the great rail highways.

The Manor House is situated on the slope of a hill half a mile from Dowthwaite; it stands in its own park, famous in those parts for the magnificence of its trees, where trees are rather scarce, and overlooks the village. It is all very still just now, only the wood-pigeons coo, and bees hum loudly, and Aunt Hannah's knitting-needles click, as her fingers move rapidly in the common work of most north-country folk. She is watching the young people without seeming to do so, and wondering how the great battle of life will go with them, whether they will be worsted in the fight, or whether they will be victorious.

Presently upon the still air comes the sound of the gong.

"The dressing-bell," says Ursula; "I had no idea we were so late. We shall get no tennis, Lily; but it is very hot, and we will have an early game in the morning if George can come."

George signifies his willingness to do so, and the trio, arms linked, Ursula in the middle, George and Lily on either side, walk to the house, followed by Aunt Hannah.

It is useless to ask George to stay to dinner; he has read nothing at all that day; he must go home. He does so accordingly, and as far as their ways lie, he and Lilian go together. Down the long avenue they walked, and as they went they talked gaily of tennis, and balls, and what not. When they parted, George held Lilian's hand in his own rather longer than was needful for the careless good-bye which he uttered, and which she returned, and then they separated.

General Beauchamp was in the garden waiting for his daughter, having just returned from magisterial duties in the county town. Lilian greeted him with much affection; they were sincerely attached to one another, and Lilian as the only girl in a large family of boys, all out in the world, was much valued by her father. She told him she would soon be down to dinner, and tripped gaily up to her bedroom, where she sat down in a low chair, and, wonderful to relate, presently burst into tears. This piece of behaviour on Miss Beauchamp's part was surprising, to say the least of it, but the reason was not far to seek. He—the reason was a he—was at that moment sitting at ease in his so-called study, enjoying the fragrance of his cigarette—not very worthy, I should say; but somehow girls think little of worthiness in the object of their affection, and in graceless George two girls had centred their foolish adoration. Lillian certainly did not love him as Ursula did; she lacked the fervour of her friend. And then, of course, she knew that her love was hopeless, and that was why she wept; but he had pressed her hand tenderly, and though she would die rather than take him from Ursula, she thought he, too, was not quite contented.

But then, she reflected, he ought to be; nowhere was there a better, dearer, nobler girl than Ursula, and she cast about in her own mind after severe cogitation and much reproach directed towards herself, how she could see less of George and Ursula, not in a way that should be noticeable, but wisely and generously. She thought, and very sensibly, that if such a course could be taken, her own peace of mind would be ensured, as far as might be, by the knowledge that she had never worked her friend woe, and perhaps in time she should overcome her love. She had read in books that this was very possible. Thus did she reason with herself.

Ursula passed the evening very peacefully, and, unruffled by any thought of trouble, she sang to Aunt Hannah:

“Our life, our life is like a curious play.”

And Aunt Hannah, as was her wont, knitted, and thought, and wondered how her niece's life would turn, for in her she saw herself, only more intense and more absorbed in the love which surely would live away.

It must have been in answer to Lillian's resolve that next morning she fell and sprained her ankle, just after breakfast, when she was running to open the windows for her pet pigeons.

“This,” she thought, “will save me, because, of course, I shall have to keep very quietly in my room for some time; that is what the doctor will surely say.”

But she was mistaken; the words the doctor did use when he had succeeded in reassuring General Beauchamp, who was very apt to rush at melancholy conclusions, and had given it as his opinion that she would not be able to set her foot to the ground for at least three months, were the following comforting ones:

“You will do very well now, Miss Beauchamp. Plenty of cheerful society and judicious care will see you as right as ever in less than a month.”

So the general sent forthwith to Ursula and Miss Morris, begging them to repair at once to the sufferer's couch side. Through the park sped Ursula, treading lightly, looking a very vision of loveliness in her white morning-gown, her dark hair gently wafted by the breeze. She bore in her arms the great German dictionary. To her mind it would help to amuse poor Lillian to look out the words for next week's translation, and of course Herr Schultz would give the lesson at the Hall instead of at the Manor House, and so the sooner the books were transplanted thither the better it would be.

“Lily, my pet!” she cried as she entered the morning-room, and knelt by the poor little maiden with ankle bound and swathed, “I am so sorry. General, all your parquetry must come up. Who knows that I may not be its next victim? Don't fret, my flower,” she continued, “you shall not waste your sweetness on the desert air; though you are to lie still, we will make the time pass as quickly as may be.”

“How?” asked Lily, smiling rather anxiously.

“Don't look so piteous, my dear. Why, easily. We will reverse the order of things, that is all. George and I will have tennis here, and you shall laugh at our bad play and applaud our good; it will be better here than on my lawn. Then he shall read to us while we work, just as he does there, and Herr Schultz shall come here for our lessons. We shall be very happy, at least as happy as we can be with you laid by, and if General Beauchamp does not like our so disturbing him, he shall retire to quiet and Aunt Hannah at the House.”

General Beauchamp was profuse in his protestations of delight at the programme; Lily shrugged her shoulders prettily at mention of the German, and vouchsafed no comment on the George arrangement.

“You have made the best of this sad accident, my dear Miss Lascelles, with your usual thoughtful kindness,” said the general with old-fashioned gallantry; “nothing could be better than the plans you have just proposed.”

Miss Morris soon afterwards arrived, full of sympathy for the invalid, over whom she mounted guard, for the child's head and ankle were so painful that entire rest for the time was in reality a necessity. But the next day she was much better, and that and many days following it, passed as Ursula had decreed. Every day she came, and as she came of course George came also, nothing loth. In the long sweet twilight Ursula sang the songs which Lillian loved; nothing melancholy, nor even sad, for such brought tears to the sweet blue eyes, and so were to be avoided; but she sang the old English ballads and some Scottish ones that are ever welcome, though so hackneyed and well known.

George, standing half in, half out of the long French window, gazed down unseen upon Lillian, and meditated. His agitation when he heard of her accident had been unfeignedly real, but no one witnessed his (to anyone else) unaccountably anxious dismay, for he was in his study when the note arrived from Ursula. Much as he loved, or fancied he loved Ursula, an entirely new feeling had crept up within him with regard to Lillian, a feeling which he certainly fostered.

Aye, wakin'! O! wakin', aye, and wearie;
Sleep I canna get for thinkin' o' my dearie;
When I sleep I dream, when I wake I'm eerie,
Rest I canna get for thinkin' o' my dearie.
Aye, wakin', O!

Thus sang Ursula, but Lillian moved restlessly, so she chose another song, and George quietly passed out of the room into the dusk of the evening. He paced the quiet garden, lighted only by the light of stars, and mechanically entered the little arbour in the rosery, where he sat and meditated, wondering aimlessly what could possibly happen to smooth his path, which now was becoming rather tortuous. He was forced to admit to himself that he loved Lillian more, and in a very different manner to that in which he loved Ursula, and as well, he had the proper feeling to acknowledge that under these circumstances he could not marry the one, loving the other. But he did not see his way out of his troubles.

Finally, and after severe thought, he determined that he would seek an interview with Lillian, and to her unfold his grief, firstly, however, discovering from her whether she reciprocated his affection.

Lonely night comes on, all the lave are sleepin',
I think on my bonnie lad, an' blear my een wi' greetin'.

Lillian Beauchamp certainly did not gain much rest that night, for George, before he escorted Ursula home, contrived to give her a little note, in which he begged her to grant him a short private interview the next morning. It was over this note of his that she “bleared her een wi' greetin'.” “Aye, wakin', O!” the plaintive melody sounded still in her ears, while she thought and thought again of George, “her bonnie lad.” But still her resolve remained unshaken. She determined that she would so show him the error of his ways that he would soon return to his faithful Ursula.

Early on the following morning, after breakfast, and soon after Lillian had been settled on her couch near the window, he came, and was ushered into the morning-room. The servant stayed to arrange the outside blinds in order that the sun should not shine with too great strength on his mistress's eyes, and, as he lingered, George remarked to Lillian that Ursula and her aunt were driving into Penryn that morning, and would be glad to execute any commissions that she might have. Lily replied that she would think about it, but that just then she really thought she wanted nothing. When the door closed behind the servant, her heart beat fast, for George, moving to the sofa, bent over her, and said:

“I think you must know, Lillian, why I have asked you to see me this morning. Do you not?” he added, as she did not speak. “Then I will tell you why. I can sum up my whole tale in three or four words. I love one woman with all my heart, and I am engaged to marry another. Oh yes,” he continued as she looked up at him half-frightened, “and I am sure you must know, my darling, that it is your own sweet self whom I love. I cannot keep up this wretched farce any longer. I don't know whether you care for me, but whether you do or not, I cannot endure the present state of things with Ursula. Ah, Lily, do help me,” he cried; “you must love me; do you, dearest?” Here he paused for her to speak, and she, ignoring his last appeal, replied, her voice trembling with nervousness, but still true to her purpose:

“George, you say you cannot keep up this state of things with Ursula, but you must do so. Don't you know, cannot you see how deeply she loves you, how all her life has been wrapped up in you, since she lost her father? I will not let you say one more word to me. I am sorry I have heard so much, but you have asked me to help you, and that I will do to the best of my power. You will be going back soon to college. Let us say no more of this miserable matter. Go back; you have been too long amongst us women-kind, and when you return at Christmas you will love her; you will have thought of her, and remembered how good she is, and how much you are to her, and you will grow to feel that she is the same to you.”

Hopeful words, and spoken by a true friend, but unfortunately not very practical, for love is blind and goes very much where it lists, often without any apparent rhyme or reason. George looked very melancholy as he listened to Lillian's speech, and thought to himself that after all she could not care for him; but soon, being of a pliable nature, he reflected that perhaps he had not done well, and that he had better try to return to his former allegiance. The consequence was that Lillian with her stronger will prevailed, and when Ursula returned from her drive, she was greeted with the news that Mr. George was waiting for her. He spent the evening at the house, and was so attentive, and even loving, that Ursula's cup of joy well-nigh overflowed.

After another week, during which, when not engaged in reading, he accompanied Ursula in her rides and walks, and went, as before, to see Lillian, George departed south to stay with friends before his return to Oxford. It was a hard week for Lillian, but she had done her duty, and that was much.

The days passed by very slowly after George went away, the bracken cloth of gold upon the mountains rusted, and the leaves fell thick and fast, and the days were dark and dreary. Then the first fall of snow came, and the summer was a thing of the past, and the winter had set in in earnest.

But Lillian did not get much stronger, and Ursula began, by very slow degrees, to understand.

From George's letters all she should have gathered was a new tenderness, increased from that of former days. Indeed, this very tenderness surprised her, for she did not look for any increase of affection in him who had so satisfied her before, and she began to have a sort of dim consciousness that this access of love was not for her. Slowly she put two and two together: Lillian's prolonged weakness and languor; the weariness she displayed in their talks, which naturally savoured much of George; and again, and most conclusively, her feverish anxiety to leave Dowthwaite for some months. This last subject was one which filled their minds very much at the present time. Lillian was very desirous of going abroad; the general did not care to leave England, because such of his boys who could came to spend the Christmas time at the Hall; Ursula and Miss Morris were loud in their protestations of dismay. Christmas would not be Christmas with the Hall closed; surely with care Lillian might at least wait until the festive season was over, and then go from home.

But this was just what Lillian did not want; her sole object in going was that she would be spared the pain of seeing George when he returned, and though she could not employ this plea, she gained the kind offices of her friend, the doctor, who told the general that his daughter's state of health was so far from satisfactory, that he thought that a sojourn in a warmer climate was not only desirable but necessary for her welfare. And so they departed.

When the farewells were over, and Ursula had got used to being without her companion, she grew to think that it was for the best that Lily had gone, and tried to persuade herself, and almost succeeded in doing so, that after all this proved that George was nothing to her—in fact, that she did not like him, or else how could she have gone when it wanted only a fortnight to his return?

The fact of the matter was that the poor child longed to feel that she was as much to George as before she had believed herself to be. Hers was a nature which naturally shrank from pain, and rather than face what she feared to be the truth, she temporised, and hugged to herself the thought that after all it was she who had been fanciful, he had been faithful. And then she blamed herself, and wrote him a long letter, in which she told him how glad she would be to see him home again. She told him, too, that he would not see Lillian, because she and her father had gone to winter in Rome.

George, when he heard this piece of news, felt very angry. Indeed, he never remembered to have felt so angry in all his life; but his pride was flattered when he reflected that if Lillian had really cared nothing for him she would not have left Dowthwaite when she knew he was coming.

He thought to himself that he would not hurry to go home, and as a most opportune invitation from a college-friend arrived, asking him to make one of a party of six men to keep Christmas together in a bachelor house in the country, he accepted it, and wrote home to his father to tell him that he could not come home for Christmas, but would be there at the New Year.

The rector took the news very calmly; it never entered his head that anything was going wrong. Ursula and George were engaged, and in due time would be married; that was sufficient for him; and though in his young days he would not have given up his Christmas with his lady-love for any amount of bachelor parties, yet men were different in these days. Ursula was woefully disappointed, yet she managed to put on a cheerful air, and made up her mind to wait as patiently as might be for the New Year. Then she would see how George seemed, and would have time enough to think what course she should take, if she did not find, as most probably she would, that all this time she had been troubling herself unnecessarily. Only Miss Morris was really anxious; the light of her own experience had taught her what to expect, and she could not help fearing that as she had fared so would her niece, and she trembled for her. All were busy with Christmas preparations, school-festivities, prize-giving, tea-drinking, and the like, and Ursula and Miss Morris were foremost amongst the workers.

Entering the school-house abruptly one wintry afternoon, Ursula found the mistress conversing with the eldest pupil-teacher about herself. She only heard two sentences, but they were enough, and instead of entering the room she turned and went home again, sick at heart and wounded.

Said Miss Smith, the teacher, to Miss Brown, the pupil-teacher: "Doesn't look as if Mr. George were very much in love with Miss Ursula, does it, Annie?"

And to this Miss Brown replied to Miss Smith:

"No, that it doesn't; it's Miss Beauchamp, I think," as who should say, "We know all about that." And then they laughed.

Sick at heart and wounded Ursula returned home; sick at heart when she looked into the future, and saw herself without her lover, wounded to think that the village had seen what she would not. She went about her work with a heavy heart within her, but with the outward serenity and cheerful bearing which were two of her chief characteristics. Her mind was now quite made up, and all she had to do was to await George's arrival.

When we are expecting and looking forward to some hard trial of our strength, the faster the days go, and the nearer the inevitable time comes, the more do we shrink from it, and wish it were not so close upon us.

The days between Christmas-time and the New Year were rapidly passing by, and the eve of the New Year brought George Dacre home.

The same evening, after he had greeted his father, and received from him the usual parental welcome, he walked through the bare cold wood to the Manor.

It was all very still, and the cold moonlight made the trees look weird, and threw black shadows round. All looked sadly changed from that summer-time when he and Lillian walked through the happy sunshine.

Miss Morris welcomed him. Ursula was not well enough to come downstairs; she had suffered all day with a bad headache, and had to keep very quiet; but in the morning she would like to see George as soon after breakfast as it pleased him, "would be very glad," Aunt Hannah added, thinking that the young man would naturally be disappointed.

And so he went back home again.

It is curious how much people think of the change of the year, how they have a sort of blind hope, and, indeed, a superstitious belief, that the new year will alter what has been untoward in the old, and begin a fresh era of happiness and hope in their lives. Only one day merging into another, and yet between December 31st and January 1st there seems to be a great gulf fixed, and we watch the one going out and the other coming in with regret for the happy days which have died with the old, and, if the heart be young, a vivid hope for the happiness of the new. Even to the careworn and heavy-laden the season brings some hope, and gives them fresh courage to bear their burdens—yes, and to fancy them lighter to bear.

It had been a weary time to Ursula, but she greeted the new year, and determined that now all should be new, and that she would bravely grapple with the change that had come in her life.

Once more in the morning George came through the wood, came unwittingly to receive his freedom. Ursula met him at the great hall door, where she stood with Aunt Hannah looking out upon the baby year. Good wishes passed between them, and he took her hand and kissed her, then Aunt Hannah said that she must run away, and they were left alone. Ursula led the way into the small drawing-room.

"It is very cold out there," she said, "let us sit by the fire and talk; it is a long while since we had a talk, George, and there is so much to say."

To tell truth, he rather expected a lecture, but Ursula did not often lecture, and her voice sounded pleasant, so he was reassured, particularly when, giving him an easy-chair and taking one herself in a darker corner, she drew from her pocket a letter, and handing it to him, said:

"This came this morning from Lillian. You may read it if you like."

He took it carelessly and read it through; it was only a short letter, and when he had finished it he passed it back to her, remarking that she seemed to be enjoying herself.

Now had come the time for Ursula to speak.

"I don't know," she said musingly; "I think she would enjoy herself more if you were there, George."

She spoke so quietly, with so much meditation in her voice, that, startling though the words were, he made no sign of surprise, only looked at her. She still gazed at the fire as if she were calmly speculating on the effect George's presence in Rome would have upon Lillian's enjoyment.

Under this calm exterior her heart was beating wildly.

"Could I have said more?" she thought; "would he need more if he really loved me, to make him say so?"

But he did not speak, and she continued:

"It was a stupid arrangement to make, George, the one our fathers made when we were children—a very stupid arrangement; and I am glad I have the sense to see it, and to prevent its being a miserable one as well. George," she continued wearily, still looking at the tire, "I wish you'd go to Rome—go as a free man, and tell Lillian that it is she you love. Ah, do not contradict me," she added, for the young man sprang to his feet and advanced towards her, as if to remonstrate. "I know you love her, George. Be good to her, and always love her as you love her now."

For some minutes he did not speak, then he said with a nervous tremor in his voice, which he could not control:

"You have taken me quite by surprise, Ursula; but, as you say, it is as well that we should part if you believe that our fathers' arrangement will turn out a miserable one. I wonder," he continued, looking a trifle scared, "I wonder what my father will say to the change?"

His look of consternation was so unfeigned that Ursula's womanly pity arose, and rising, she went to him and put her hand on his shoulder with such a tender graciousness, that he felt with a thrill a little of what he had lost.

Now that she knew he was glad to be free, the rest was comparatively easy to her.

"Dear George," she said, "I will arrange all that. You have only to do with Lillian; make her understand that I have sent you, that I love her as dearly as ever, and that I hope you may always be happy together. Tell her, though," she added with a little laugh, "that I will not absolve her from her German lessons. Directly she comes back, we will begin again; we were so dreadfully lazy for long before she went."

"You are very good, Ursula," said George. Faintly he understood her goodness, but he said to himself, "She is very glad to get rid of me."

Ursula kept her word. She told Mr. Dacre, and told him so that the old man recognised her devotion, and could not help but feel that his son was not worthy of her. From all but one she hid the bitterness through which she had passed, but from Aunt Hannah, good faithful soul, she could hide little. Few were the words which passed between them on the subject, but they had both been through the same suffering, and so their sympathy was as a solemn bond. The opinion in the village was unanimous: "Indeed, he was not half good enough for her," they said. But all the same, to her he had been very, very dear.

At Last.

CARELESSLY he said "Good-bye," Coldly touched her hand with his,
Heeded not her gentle sigh,
Guessed not anything amiss.
"Ah, he loves me not," she thought,
Sighing low with eyes grown dim;
So the months went by, but brought
Never news from him.

He is coming home, they said,
And her heart leapt as she heard,
Quick her cheek flushed rosy-red
At the soul-reviving word:
Then, as morning light is killed
By the dim returning rain,
Suddenly her joy was stilled,
By the old, old pain.

"He will meet me as before,
In the same cold, careless way,
Touch my hand with his, no more,
Have no loving word to say." . . .
But he took her hand again,
Held it long and closely pressed;
"Darling, I have tried in vain
Not to love you best."

His Own Guest.

(A SERIAL STORY.)

CHAPTER XXXIII.

COLONEL SKOOTER had, he imagined, the whole game in his hands. As he had once remarked to Mr. Pennington, his business was to pry into other people's business, and, on the whole, he found it a profitable one. Ever since he had been in the neighbourhood of Meredith Court he had been on the look-out for some means of trading on the foibles or weaknesses of his neighbours, and when he met Gordon he thought he had found his man.

The fact of his being under a false name was enough to show that he had something to conceal. But the colonel also had something to conceal; and, unfortunately for him, Gordon knew of it. So the advantage to be derived in this particular instance was a negative one.

But none the less valuable. If Gordon and he played their separate games with a mutual understanding, each could benefit the other.

This mutual understanding, which existed only in the colonel's imagination, had been overstepped at every opportunity by Gordon. The colonel could stand a good deal, but when he discovered that his supposed partner was the means of preventing Mr. Pennington from listening favourably to his prospectuses, the wrath of the American was of the bitterest. Since then he had only been waiting for a good opportunity for avenging himself.

The opportunity was now come. Messrs. Ridge's cablegram left no doubt that Gordon and Thomas Meredith were one.

Of course Skooter was ignorant of the fact that his enemy was also in communication with Ridge and Co. What Gordon's motive for concealing his identity might be Skooter knew not, but he was keen enough to guess that it must be a powerful and, therefore, necessary one. To put Lady Meredith on her guard would be to ensure her lasting gratitude, and would also render necessary Gordon's speedy departure from the Court, if not from the country.

However, it was not to Lady Meredith that chance determined that the colonel should make his disclosure. Lady Meredith took advantage of the colonel's message to leave Gordon, as she felt too agitated to remain with him longer, but she had no intention of seeking an interview with Skooter. Sending for Charles, she asked him to be good enough to see what the colonel wanted.

Charles obeyed willingly. Colonel Skooter did not seem too well pleased at first to see a substitute, but resolved not to postpone his business. After all, Sir Charles was, perhaps, the proper person to receive his communication.

"I say, Sir Charles, you haven't seen anything strange going on in this house lately, I suppose?"

Charles could have answered in the affirmative without difficulty. Had not everything been going strangely lately? But he only asked:

"To what do you refer?"

"How about that chap Gordon?" queried the colonel. "Nothing strange about him, I suppose?"

"There is nothing strange about him except his generosity and kindness," replied Charles a little stiffly.

"Well, when you come to think it over in a calm mood, doesn't it ever strike you that his generosity and kindness are a little strange? Do folks go about the country making friends of men they have never seen before?"

"Really, Colonel Skooter," said Sir Charles, "unless you intend speaking with more directness I don't see the use of continuing this interview."

He spoke rather sharply, for his conscience smote him as he thought over the way in which he had returned his friend's kindness. He had stolen from him the hand of the girl he loved. It was true that Gordon seemed in no way disconcerted at finding that Edith was engaged to another; that, however, was merely one more mystery added to the many with which the unhappy young baronet was surrounded.

"Praps I had better speak plainly," said the colonel, "though I want you to understand that I am going to tell you what I am solely from friendship for you."

"Will you come to the point?" demanded Sir Charles.

"Don't be in a hurry, Sir Charles. It may be news to you that I used to know this Gordon some years ago out in Mexico."

"Then why have you not confessed it before this?"

"I never force myself on those who don't seem to want to renew old friendships," replied the colonel evasively. "What I want to tell you now is, that this Gordon isn't Gordon at all."

"Who is he?"

"I guess you had better not press that question for a minute or two, Sir Charles."

A sudden thought struck the colonel. Surely he must have been blind not to see it before. Here he was in possession of information sufficient to turn the baronet into a simple younger brother, with no estate, no property of any kind. Instead of telling him who Gordon was, and simply succeeding in having the real heir got rid of, why should he not first look after his own profit, and make terms with the present holder? His silence ought to be worth purchasing on any terms.

"I'm getting a fool," was the colonel's mental remark, as he saw how near he had been to spoiling the best chance he might have for years. "I'll make this young swell pay for what I'm going to tell him, and pay well too. It will be worth some thousands a year to him, he ought to come down heavily."

"Who is Mr. Gordon?" again demanded Sir Charles.

"When I knew him his name was Smith," said Skooter. "That's a common name for a Britisher, I'm told, and there's more under it in America than here, I calculate, for a good many take it when they find it necessary to hide their heads in a cloud for a time."

There was a decided accusation here, and Sir Charles could not overlook it. Gordon, to whom he was under such obligations, was not the man he pretended to be.

"What is your motive for telling me this now?" asked Sir Charles.

"Friendship for you," replied the colonel offensively. "And perhaps something besides."

"We will talk further of that presently," said the baronet. "Excuse me now, please."

"Wait, Sir Charles, stop a minute!" cried Skooter, as his companion opened the door.

But Sir Charles did not obey.

He made his way to the library and rang the bell. Watts appeared.

"Ask Mr. Gordon to step this way," said Sir Charles, "and Mr. Pennington too," he added.

He paced the room angrily, then threw himself into a chair. What was the meaning of all this mystery which grew every day? How was it that within the last month his life, which had been tranquility itself, had become full of anxiety and trouble? He was in the dark, and more than that, was the only one in that position. Evidently his mother, Mr. Pennington, and Skooter were all possessed of some knowledge affecting him, of which he, the owner of the whole place, was kept in ignorance.

However, he determined now that he would know all before the evening passed. He was getting thoroughly angry, even the kindness with which Mary had treated him that morning had only tended to make him more so, by adding to the atmosphere of deception in which he now existed.

He was in the midst of his unpleasant reverie when Mr. Pennington entered.

"Ah, Sir Charles, we shall have good news for you before the day is out, I hope."

"I hope so, indeed," replied Charles bitterly.

"What do you want to say to me?"

"Something which I never thought to have to say to you," was the retort. "I have discovered that Gordon is staying in this house under a false name."

Mr. Pennington began to look uncomfortable.

"You introduced him to me," continued Sir Charles.

"I confess I did, practically, though not actually."

"What is the distinction?"

"I believe Edith actually made the introduction."

"This is mere trifling," exclaimed Charles angrily, "and I wonder you can descend to it. This is a serious matter, and I beg you will treat it as such. Did you know when you caused him to be introduced to me, that he was not what he represented himself to be?"

The situation was becoming very painful to the elder man. How could he answer such direct questions without incriminating himself and Gordon?

"I did not know it at first," he replied hesitatingly.

"But you knew it before the introduction?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Pennington in a low voice.

Sir Charles looked keenly at him.

"Mr. Pennington," he said slowly, "you were a valued friend of my father's; you have acted the part of a true friend to both my mother and myself all my life. Am I to understand that you have knowingly introduced into this house an adventurer under a false name, and allowed me to place myself under obligations to him?"

"No, no; you do us both wrong," burst out Mr. Pennington. Then he stopped suddenly.

"Will you kindly explain what you mean?"

But Mr. Pennington was silent.

"Have you nothing to say?"

"No, nothing. Why not ask Gordon himself?" he added suddenly.

"I am about to do so," was the reply. "I have already sent for him, and expect him every moment. Sit down."

Mr. Pennington dropped into a chair. Sir Charles stood leaning against the mantelpiece, waiting. At last he was on the verge of discovering the mystery, though it seemed likely to cost him the friendship of his oldest friend.

It must be remembered that Sir Charles had had no opportunity whatever of discovering the truth. He had never seen Ridge's advertisement, he had not been near when Watts made his avowal. He had been brought up from childhood to believe his brother dead; it is no matter for wonder that even at this stage he had no idea that the man whom he had discovered to be passing under a false name, was anything more than an adventurer.

With Mary false, and his best friends proved faithless, was it any wonder that he felt as if all the foundations of his being were being sapped?

The door opened, and Gordon entered.

Since Lady Meredith left the room, under the pretence of seeing Skooter, his time had been spent in wondering what was about to happen. At any rate, he had shown his hand now; there was no more doubt as to the course he must pursue.

"Mr. Gordon," said Sir Charles as he entered, "I am obliged to ask you a question or two. Is your real name Gordon?"

"No," was the instant reply.

"Is it Smith?"

"No."

"What is it, then?"

Gordon glanced at Mr. Pennington as if about to ask how much he had told. Sir Charles caught the glance, and continued:

"I have already asked Mr. Pennington. He refuses to tell me. I demand it of you."

"I can tell you now," said Gordon. "I only wish I could have told you earlier. I must first beg your pardon for having deceived you so long; it was a necessity."

He hesitated. Mr. Pennington rose excitedly. He had not seen Gordon since the arrival of the telegram, and was ignorant of its contents.

"Why do you hesitate?" demanded Sir Charles.

"Because I am about to do a most unkind action, at least it must seem so to you. But I can assure you it has been forced upon me by circumstances, which I will explain later. I can promise I will do my best to neutralise my seeming unkindness. Will you have the goodness to ask Lady Meredith to join us? The deception I have practised on you should be acknowledged before everyone."

Sir Charles rang the bell, a servant appeared to whom he entrusted the message.

"What do you intend doing?" whispered Pennington to Gordon.

"Wait a moment, and you will see," was his answer.

The three men waited in silence for Lady Meredith's entrance. The moment she came into the room she saw that the crisis had come.

"What have you done?" she demanded of Gordon. "I have you told him?"

"Not yet."

"What is that?" she exclaimed, as the handle of the door was violently shaken. A moment afterwards old Watts tottered into the room. He staggered up to Gordon, held out to him a letter, and fell on his knees, grasping his hand.

"I forgot all about it, Mr. Tom. Forgive me," he stammered. "It came years ago, and I took it and kept it safe for you, but my poor old head has been so bad I never thought of it till I heard you talking about it this evening."

Gordon raised the old man to his feet, and tore open the envelope. It was the missing letter from Fletcher, confessing that he was guilty of the crime of which Tom Meredith had been suspected. He handed it in silence to Lady Meredith.

"What does all this mean?" asked Sir Charles with a tremor in his voice. "Mother—Mr. Pennington—who is this?"

"I can tell you now," said the latter; "this is your brother, Sir Thomas Meredith."

Charles stepped back in amazement. His brother? He had been dead for years!

"Is it true, mother?" he demanded.

"Yes, my poor boy!"

Charles pressed his hand to his brow. After a moment's pause he stepped forward and held out his hand to Gordon.

"Can you offer me your hand," asked the latter, "knowing that I come to deprive you of what you thought your birthright?"

"Why have you kept me in ignorance so long?" was the reply.

"Did you think I would have wished for a moment to keep you out of that which is yours?"

"You overcome me with your goodness," said Gordon; "but I hope some day I may have the opportunity of repaying you for your welcome. Do not imagine I intend to act the part of a Jacob, and turn you out of your inheritance. Fortunately, I have no need to demand anything from you. I only hope that, with my assistance, your prospects may be considerably brightened."

He turned towards Lady Meredith.

"Can you not forgive me?" he asked. "I have wronged you more than anyone. We have been enemies too long. Can we not be friends now? Tom Gordon, who has deceived you so, no longer exists; let all remembrance of what is unpleasant die with him. And remember," he added in a whisper, "it is not only I who ought to be willing to let bygones be bygones."

Lady Meredith could not bear up against his appeal. What was there left for her to do but accept his proffered friendship? It would be best for her son. She placed her hand in his; Tom raised it to his lips.

"And you, my old friend," he said to old Watts, who had remained in the room, "how was it that you remembered me when everyone else had forgotten me?"

Tears were rolling down the old man's cheeks. In a broken voice he murmured:

"Perhaps, Mr. Tom, it was because I held you in my arms when you were a baby—because I loved you the most."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE worthy colonel all this while was not quite at ease. He hoped Sir Charles would return every minute, but, as he did not, he at last ventured from the room. Meeting Edith, she gave him the information that Charles was with Mr. Pennington, she believed, in the library. The colonel had not quite enough assurance to force his way in, so he waited in the hope of being able to finish his interview with Sir Charles before long.

The opportunity soon came. He met him as he left the library and drew him aside.

"You sloped so quick just now, Sir Charles, I hadn't quite time to say all I wanted to."

"I don't think you need trouble to say any more," replied Charles gaily.

"Wait a minute or two till you know what I've got to say. I told you that Gordon wasn't Gordon; I will tell you now who he is. He is your elder brother, who was supposed to be dead."

The news did not have the startling effect anticipated. Sir Charles merely replied:

"Well, what business is that of yours?"

"It's yours chiefly, I s'pose, but it's mine as well. Look here, sir. I'm the only man that knows this. If I tell what I know, it may turn out awkward for you. It seems he can't make himself known for some reason which you may be more acquainted with than I am. Why not let him keep his incog., and continue to be the baronet yourself? I'm open to an offer. You won't find me unreasonable. I owe your brother a grudge, and sha'n't mind letting you off easy to pay him out. Now, what do you say?"

Anyone less obtuse than the colonel must have seen that it was with difficulty Charles could restrain himself. But Skooter, though keen enough in many things, was at a disadvantage when brought into contact with a thoroughly honest man. He fancied everyone was actuated by as unworthy motives as himself, and so often failed to judge men correctly.

However, he was soon undeceived, for Charles imitated him in plainness of speech.

"Colonel Skooter, you tell me that this house is not mine. I confess I am sorry it is not for a few moments more, in order that I might enjoy the pleasure of turning you out of it. I may tell you, for your satisfaction, that I am perfectly aware that Mr. Gordon is my brother; that everyone in the house is aware of it; that there is not the slightest reason why he should not take possession of the title and property; and that I should be the last man to keep him out of them, even were I able."

So saying Charles opened the door and walked out, but meeting Tom just outside he told him in a few words what had happened. They returned together to the colonel, who lost no time in showing that he perfectly understood the situation.

"You have had the best of it, you Gordon, or Smith, or Meredith, or whatever your name is, but you bet I'll have my turn some day."

"Very well," replied Tom, turning on his heel. "He isn't worth having a row with," he added to his brother.

When the colonel had departed, Tom turned to his brother.

"We shall have lots to talk about, Charlie, during the next day or two, but we may as well get over one or two points now. Of course you and Lady Meredith will continue to live here, that goes without saying; we can all find room easily enough, especially if we build the new wing that my father intended adding. I'm afraid, though, that you will be living in town half the year now that you're going into Parliament."

"I don't know about that now. It's your place as the eldest son to represent the family."

"Oh, bosh! I've something better to do with my time than listen to a lot of people talking about what they don't understand. Besides, if you lose three letters from before your name through me, it's only right you should have a couple to stick on at the end."

"I shall prize them a great deal more, Tom. It's always been my ambition to have a seat."

"That's all right; you'll be Prime Minister one of these days, and in the meantime you must let me be your Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I can promise you there shall be no lack of ways and means. And when I'm married—"

"When you are married?" repeated Charles.

Tom smiled.

"Oh yes, I forgot you didn't know. I'm afraid we have been playing at cross-purposes lately. Suppose we go into the drawing-room?"

Charles acquiesced. They found Edith and Mary talking together excitedly, and Mr. Pennington, standing with his back to the fire, beaming benevolently.

Tom went up to Edith and took her hand, oblivious of the fact that she was engaged to his brother. Charles looked on in amazement.

"Come, Charlie," said Edith mischievously, "you mustn't be jealous if your brother acts as a brother should."

"I'm quite in the dark," replied Charlie, "but as I have been so for a month past, I am getting accustomed to it. However, my eyes are not so blinded but that I can see that jealousy would be out of place."

"On your side it would," retorted Edith. "I don't pity you a bit, Charlie, and you must confess that you deserve everything that you have suffered for your conduct to me. When I——"

"Accepted me," put in Charles as she hesitated.

"Did I? I don't remember."

"Did you not?"

"I only recollect saying I would never marry except to become Lady Meredith. Shall I ever marry?" she whispered to Tom.

"As soon as you will, my darling," was his low response.

"Then I am free?" exclaimed Charles.

"Yes, you are," retorted Edith, "and I wish you would not say so in so exulting a tone; it is far from complimentary to me. And now that you are free I only hope you will use your freedom as you ought," she added, giving a meaning glance in the direction of Mary.

"I say, Edie," put in Tom, "has the post gone yet? I want to send off a letter or two."

"Ah, so do I," remarked Mr. Pennington.

"I don't think it has gone," replied Edith; "we will go and see."

The three moved towards the door, Edith whispering to her lover:

"I never saw more stupid creatures than you men are. If you had given me a moment I would have taken you out of the room with some dignity, instead of running away in this stupid fashion to try and catch a post that everyone knows went hours ago."

"Mary," said Charles when the door had closed, "can you ever forgive me? I will not excuse myself, I will only throw myself on your mercy. You refused me once because of what you called the difference in our prospects—that plea cannot avail you now. If you refuse me this time it must be because you do not love me. Do you?"

Mary did not reply. But she allowed him to take her hand, to pass his arm around her, and give her a lover's kiss. Then she threw her arms round him, and fell sobbing on his breast.

"Oh, Charlie, if you knew how miserable I have been!"

"It was my fault, my darling. I have been wretched, too. But it is all over now, nothing can separate us. We have found it impossible to live apart, and we shall love each other all the more for having known the misery of separation."

What more they said can be imagined; there were mutual explanations to be made, mutual misunderstandings to be excused. At last the tolling of the great clock made them conscious that time had flown all too fast, and that they must no longer monopolise the drawing-room.

They found Mr. Pennington rambling aimlessly about the Hall; he was "rather out of it," as he remarked with a smile. Edith and Tom were in the billiard-room, though no billiards were played. But where was Lady Meredith?

She was in no fit mood for any company but her own. Seated in a low armchair in her own room she gave herself up to a reverie. She saw herself as she was when a penniless governess, striving to win the heart of her late husband. She had succeeded, and was happy. She remembered the joy of finding herself a mother—a joy that brought in its train misery directly she gave herself up to plotting injustice to Tom to benefit her own son. What had been her reward for all her sacrifice and devotion, her devices and schemings? She had lost the respect of those who knew her best; she had lent herself to fraud and imposture; and all to find herself defeated, her aims thwarted, her son disinherited!

She had no idea how long she had been alone when a quiet knock at the door roused her.

"Who's there?" she asked.

"It's I, mother. May I come in?"

"Yes, my boy."

Charles entered; he went up to his mother and bending over her kissed her.

"My boy!" she murmured softly.

"Mother," he whispered.

"Can you forgive me, Charlie?"
 "For what, mother? What you have done has been for my sake. We shall all be happy together yet."
 "No, no; I cannot stay here and meet him I have done so much to injure."

"You wrong him, mother. Tom is incapable of harbouring an ungenerous thought. He insists on our staying here. If you have done him a wrong, you must give yourself an opportunity of atoning for it." Another knock at the door. This time it opened to Tom and the two girls. Before they left, Lady Meredith no longer felt forgotten and almost despised. She found she had not lost her son, but only gained another one.

As had been anticipated, Charles's return to Parliament was unopposed, his rival finding his influence too strong. But before February came round, rendering a removal to London necessary, the parish church had witnessed the grandest wedding within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Sir Thomas's speech at the breakfast was a great success, but no part of it elicited more applause than that in which he stated that he hoped he might long be able to give to his friends as kind and hearty a welcome as he himself had received when he came amongst them as a stranger, to be for a time

HIS OWN GUEST.

Never Alone.

(A STORY IN TWO CHAPTERS.)

CHAPTER II.

I DID not fail to go up to Bewleigh on Thursday. What Mr. Muncastle had told me had scarcely been out of my mind in the interim. It was one of those confidences of which I could not speak even to my sister. Barbara could see that there was something on my mind, and doubtless wondered what it was, but bided her time in silence.

Mr. Muncastle greeted me with a smile and a friendly grasp of the hand. We found our way to the terrace as usual.

"Poor Ephraim Strong's successor arrived this morning," said Mr. Muncastle. "He has been recommended to me by a friend in London, and seems a quiet, sensible sort of man. I hope I may be able to retain him, but, as you know, the duties are peculiar."

We took a few turns in the sunshine, then Mr. Muncastle said:

"I am about to make a confession that I have never yet made to any living being. Why I should make it to you, whom I have known for so short a time, rather than to one of my older friends, I hardly know. It may be that the kindness and attention you showed poor Strong have drawn me towards you; it certainly is not the hope of benefiting by your professional experience that induces me to make you my confidant. My case is one that no remedy can touch, save the last great remedy of all."

"My profession has made me the depository of many strange secrets in my time. Yours, Mr. Muncastle, will only be one more added to the number."

"Such confidences would make my life a nightmare," replied my companion. "But to come to my own case."

He still seemed to hesitate and hang back a little. I could only wait in silence till he was ready to speak.

At length he began somewhat abruptly:

"My tutor, before going to college, was the Rev. Andrew Aylmer. I had not seen him for sixteen years, when I one day met him accidentally in Piccadilly. We knew each other in a moment. Mr. Aylmer was now the well-to-do rector of a large parish in Yorkshire. He gave me a pressing invitation to run down and see him, which I, having nothing better to do, was not slow to accept.

"The rector was a widower, and had only one child, a daughter. It gave me a certain shock of surprise, simply because I had never thought about the matter, when in place of the Laura Aylmer whom I had last seen as a chubby-faced child with a skipping-rope and hoop, a young lady presented herself, tall, stately, and gracious. I had reached five-and-thirty years of age without ever having been in love, or experiencing any desire to be so. But I fell in love with Laura Aylmer at first sight. I was fifteen years older than she was, a world-worn man, who had lived in every capital in Europe. I had no good looks to recommend me, but I was rich. Such unions are too common in Society to excite surprise. The easy-going rector threw no difficulties in the way of my suit, so I set myself with all my might to win the heart of Laura. Whether or not in the long run I should have succeeded, I cannot say. That she liked and respected me I had ample proofs, and sometimes I think that in time she might have learned to love me. But it was not to be.

"One day there presented himself at the rectory a young man, Ronald Deane by name.

"He proved to be a nephew of an old college friend of the rector, and had come into the neighbourhood on a fishing expedition, that part of the country being famous for its trout-streams. He was young, handsome, attractive, and sufficiently well-to-do.

"It was soon clear to everyone that he was drawn towards Laura even as I had been drawn towards her, while my eyes, sharpened by jealousy, could see just as plainly that she was losing her heart to him hopelessly and irretrievably. My house of cards had collapsed at a breath.

"I need not dwell upon my feelings, my misery, my despair. I loved the girl with all the strength of my nature, and I was now forced to recognise that she could never be mine. Her heart was given to young Deane; no other man could ever be more to her than a friend. When I could blind my eyes no longer, when I recognised the fact that my suit was utterly hopeless, I pleaded some excuse and fled.

"Three months later I read the account of Laura's marriage, and I vowed in my heart that should the opportunity ever come to me, my vengeance should be as bitter as my love had been deep. I little thought when or in what way that opportunity would arise.

"After Laura's wedding I set out on a tour through some of the remoter parts of Asia, but wherever I went her image accompanied me. At the end of three years I found myself in England again, my wound still unhealed.

"If I could only forget her!" was what I said every day of my life; but that was just what I could not do. Merely to find myself once more in the same country that held her was enough to thrill me with a delicious pain. I went nowhere, I saw nobody; I shut myself up in a gloomy old house that I owned in London, and seldom stirred abroad till after nightfall.

"At length the hot stifling days of early autumn became unbearable in town. Without caring much whither I went, I came by-and-by to Windermere, a spot that I had visited several times before. I took private lodgings near the lake, and hired a boat for my own use. I was fond of the water, and rowing was my favourite exercise. Every afternoon I stepped into my boat and went out alone on the lake, generally staying out till the hills were shrouded in darkness, and finding my way back home by the light of the stars.

"On a certain afternoon, never to be forgotten by me, I set out in my boat as usual. The sun was shining brightly, and a soft breeze fanned my cheek as I left the landing-place; but I did not like the look of the clouds, nor the strange, weird shadows that lurked among the folds of the hills. It seemed to me that a tempest was brewing somewhere among those purple peaks, but for that I cared little. I had been out on the lake in bad weather more than once, and I was quite prepared to run the risk again.

"Only those who are acquainted with that most treacherous of lakes know with what almost magical suddenness sunshine and summer breezes will sometimes give place to a storm of wind and rain almost tropical in its fury while it lasts. This it is that makes Windermere so dangerous to strangers who are not acquainted with its peculiarities, and whose sole knowledge of boating has probably been picked up on some quiet Norfolk broad or among the sunny reaches of the upper Thames.

"I pulled up the lake in a leisurely fashion in the direction of Waterhead, resting on my oars every now and then, and turning to gaze at the fantastic and ever-changing cloud-shapes that veiled the mountain peaks beyond the head of the lake. By-and-by, being at that time nearly opposite the Lowood Hotel, I shipped my oars, took out my pipe, lighted it, and bringing forth my pocket Horace, settled myself for half an hour's quiet enjoyment. I read on till my pipe had burnt itself out, and then I shut up my book and looked round. The sunshine had vanished as if such a thing had never been, and in its place was a black curtain of cloud, freighted with thunder and rain. A faint moaning made itself heard among the gullies of the hills—it was the forerunner of the coming wind.

"I buttoned my pilot-jacket, pulled my cap more firmly over my brows, turned my boat's head to the point from which I judged the wind would blow, and awaited with equanimity whatever might happen. Five minutes later the storm was upon me in all its fury—wind, rain, lightning, and bursts of thunder that seemed to rive the hidden hearts of the hills. It was a scene to exult in while it lasted, and to bring back to memory in time to come. I felt as if I were the one living being left amid a world that was reverting to its primitive elements.

"Suddenly, while this feeling was still upon me, there shot past me, like some living thing flying affrighted before the tempest, a frail skiff with its canvas all spread as if it were sailing on some summer sea. As it swept ahead I had just time to see that there was one man in it. I shouted a warning cry, but my voice was lost in the roaring of the wind.

"What a madman!" I thought to myself, "or what an ignorant fool!"

"I was still straining my eyes through the blinding rain when I saw that the head of the skiff was being put about as if with the intention of making for the Lowood side of the lake. Whoever the man inside her might be, he was throwing away his last chance of safety. And so it proved. Scarcely had the little craft got her head in a line for the shore when a stronger burst of wind than we had yet had, catching the full spread of her canvas, blew her clean over and left her lying like a half-drowned creature on the seething waters of the lake.

"What had become of the man I had seen inside her? I got my boat's head round and pulled towards the scene of the accident. When within a short distance of the capsized skiff I stopped and peered round. Suddenly, within a dozen yards of me, the head and shoulders of a man came into view, rising from the depths of the lake. His face was turned towards me. Great Heaven! It was the face of Ronald Deane—the face of my rival—of the man who had stolen from me the heart of the woman I loved! For a moment his eyes met mine, and then he disappeared as if drawn downward from below.

"I sat staring like a man stunned by some sudden blow, unable to think or stir. My boat was half full of water, but I heeded it not; wind and rain were forgotten. But a few seconds could have elapsed, although to me they seemed like as many minutes, before that white, despairing face, framed by the inky waters, came into view for the second time. Again the eyes met mine, and I knew that they recognised me. In them I read the mute, agonised appeal for help of a dying man. I read the look, but if my life had been the forfeit I could not have responded to it. It was as though I were held back by some invisible power, which for the time being paralysed my every limb. I was a strong swimmer, and could have saved him although at some little risk to myself, and yet I stirred neither hand nor foot to help him. Suddenly there came a flash of lightning that for the moment half blinded me. When I looked again there was nothing but the wind and the rain, and the black waste of waters. Of a surety I was avenged, but after what a fashion!

"Six hours later I was in the express train on my way to London. I felt that I must flee from that black lake and its dreadful secret, or I should go mad. Three days afterwards I read that the body of Roland Deane had been found. He and his wife and child had been staying at the Lowood Hotel when he met with his untimely fate. And now, Dr. Bland, you know my secret."

He ceased, and for a little while we walked on in silence. Then I said:

"I presume that the appearance which you have seen, or imagined that you have seen at various times, is that of the Mr. Ronald Deane of whom you have been speaking?"

He bowed his head gravely.

"And you never see it except when you are alone?"

"At no other times. But if the person who watches at my side were to fall asleep at his post, I should see it just the same as if he were not there."

I knew that it would seem like a mockery to my unhappy companion to tell him that I looked upon his case as nothing more than one of hallucination of a somewhat singular type, brought on in the first instance, and aggravated afterwards, by his morbid habit of mind and his persistent seclusion of himself from all the interests and occupations of everyday life. We cannot separate ourselves from our fellows, and shut ourselves up in the narrow range of our own thoughts and feelings, as in a darkened room, without paying the penalty of our selfishness in one form or another.

Had Mr. Muncastle been a poor man, compelled to earn his bread by his own exertions, the probability is that he would never have been troubled with any such delusion as that of which he had made me his confidant.

But these were thoughts which I was bound to keep to myself. It was as well, perhaps, that the mere fact of being able to open his mind to some one, and the comfort he apparently derived from having had the courage to do so, was all that he seemed to care for. He craved neither advice nor any attempt at consolation. What consolation, indeed, could I have proffered him? Who can minister to a mind diseased?

Almost without knowing it I got into the way of driving round by Bewleigh twice or three times a week, more for the sake of half an hour's talk with Mr. Muncastle than for any other reason, seeing that he persistently declined to allow me to prescribe for any of his bodily ailments. In all other respects life at the Hall went on precisely as it had gone on before I set foot within its doors. Its master remained as much a recluse as ever he had been. I was the only visitor from the outside world that ever crossed his threshold.

After having eased his mind to some extent by the confession he had made, Mr. Muncastle seemed to shun all further allusion to the subject, which, to my mind, was one of the wisest things he could have done. No good, but only additional harm could ensue from perpetually harping on the same morbid string. The one object I had in view in visiting him was to lift him out of himself; to induce him to forget for a little while the dark shadow that brooded over his life; to arouse some interest in him, faint though it might be, with regard to what the world was doing in politics, science, or letters. My only reward, and I asked no other, was his evident liking for my society, and the increased cheerfulness of spirits observable in him at the close of each of my visits.

Upon calling upon him one day about three months after the memorable confession, I saw at once that something out of the ordinary way had happened since my last visit. There was a look on his face such as I had rarely seen there before. Knowing his moods, however, I took no notice. If he had anything special to tell me I would gladly listen to it; if not, it was not in my province to question him. In a little while it appeared that he had something special to say to me.

We had been talking on various indifferent topics, when he turned abruptly, and fixing his eyes full upon me, said:

"I had a visit from It last evening."

I knew in a moment to what he referred. "The difficulty was to know what to say in reply."

"Is not that somewhat surprising," I asked, after an instant of hesitation, "in view of the precautions you take to protect yourself from anything so unpleasant?"

"When I tell you the circumstances, you will not think it surprising. Laura and I had been out riding; we went farther than we ought to have done, considering the heat of the weather; and when we got back home she was somewhat fatigued. When she had taken off her riding-habit she came downstairs, and relieved Jared Strong, who had been on guard during her absence. Then she took up her usual position on a favourite couch near one of the windows, I, meanwhile, being engaged on some letters at the opposite end of the room. Once or twice I glanced at her, but as she seemed deep in one of the magazines, I did not disturb her.

"Perhaps a quarter of an hour had passed thus, when suddenly an icy shiver shot through me from head to foot, and I knew that Laura and I were no longer alone. A hand of iron seemed to grip me round the heart. I started to my feet, knowing well what I should see when I turned my head. Yes, there it—he—was, in every particular as I had seen him before, with his blue serge jacket, his sailor's tie, his wide turn-down collar, and his fair hair and chestnut beard dripping with water, while in the eyes he bent on me was that same never-to-be-forgotten look which will be the last thing I shall see when I am dying.

"Of how I passed that awful figure and reached the other side of the room I have no knowledge. I remember touching Laura on the shoulder and calling her by name, but there came no response, and on looking more closely, I saw that she had fainted. The heat and fatigue had overcome her. A bell was within reach; I rang it violently, and almost before the sound had died away Jared Strong was in the room. Where the figure had been standing a moment before there was now nothing."

Not wishing to encourage him to dwell at too great length on these strange fancies, I made no observation when Mr. Muncastle had finished speaking. We took two or three turns on the trimly-kept lawn; then I said:

"Would it not be advisable for me to see Mrs. Dare while I am here this afternoon? It will never do for her to go off in fainting-fits in the way you describe."

"The very thing I was about to ask you to do. If Laura were taken ill, or were obliged to leave me, I know not what I should do."

"She must be invaluable to you, Mr. Muncastle."

"You have hit on the exact word, doctor. She is invaluable to me. It is now five years since she first came to me. How, during that time, she has devoted herself to me, and lightened the weary burden of my life, you, although you have only known her for a short period, could tell better than most men. She is more than a niece to me—she is like a very dear daughter."

"From the first she impressed me as being a woman who has gone through some great trouble."

"You are alluding to her snow-white hair?"

"Not so much to that, perhaps, as to the general expression of her countenance when in a state of repose—when not lighted up by conversation. At such times it bears the impress of a profound melancholy."

"And well it may do. Poor Laura! her story is a sad one. I can tell it you in a few words—as most of life's tragedies can be told. She was married at an early age to the man of her choice. No two people could have been more devoted to each other than she and her husband. Dare had estates in the West Indies, and they went out there to live. At the end of four years, business affairs required Dare's presence at home. He sailed, accompanied by his wife and child. The vessel was wrecked, and passengers and crew had to take to the boats. They were at sea nearly a fortnight, and suffered incredible hardships before they were picked up by a passing ship. In the course of that fortnight the child died, and then Dare himself succumbed, while she, the frail and delicate woman, lived through it all; but when she and the rest who were left alive were rescued, Laura's hair had changed to what you see it now. No wonder that you scarcely ever see her smile. And now let us go indoors and look for her. Of course she will tell you there's nothing the matter with her, but you ought to be the best judge of that."

It made me very glad to find that there was nothing seriously the matter with Mrs. Dare. Her constitution was naturally a delicate one, and a little care and attention soon brought it back to its normal condition.

Weeks and months sped uneventfully away, as they have a habit of doing in quiet rural neighbourhoods like ours. Summer had faded into autumn, and autumn had deepened into winter, and mid-December was here, when on a certain snowy night, a little before twelve o'clock, I was roused from my first sleep by a loud summons at my night-bell. With a mild anathema I struggled from between the blankets, inducted myself into my dressing-gown, flung open the window, and demanded to know who was there. Even while in the act of asking the question my heart sank within me. By the dim light of the overcast moon I recognised the groom from Bewleigh.

"If you please, sir, you're wanted up at the Hall at once," said the man, not without a tremor in his voice. "I'm afraid it's all over with poor master."

For a moment or two I could not speak. I had left Mr. Muncastle the day before, no better and no worse in health, to all appearance, than usual. And now—

"I will be down in three minutes," I called out to the man, and with that I dressed as quickly as possible.

It was no time for questions.

"Let me have your horse," I said to the groom. "You can drive back in my gig, which my servant will have ready in a few minutes." Two minutes later I was galloping over the snowy road in the direction of the Hall.

I was shown into the library, where Mrs. Dare joined me at once.

"Too late, too late!" she exclaimed through her tears, as I held her hand for a moment in mine.

"It may be as well that I should see him at once," I said. "You can tell me what I shall want to know later on."

She rang the bell, and I followed the servant without a word.

The man conducted me to Mr. Muncastle's bedroom, a large but sparsely-furnished apartment. Two tall candles were burning on the dressing-table. On a camp-bedstead at the upper end of the room lay stretched the master of Bewleigh. His form was shrouded by a snow-white sheet, a delicate cambric handkerchief covered his face.

I drew the handkerchief aside. The eyes were glazed and half open, but one glance was sufficient to tell me that no light born of this world would ever shine out of those orbs again. But what shall I say of the expression that had fixed itself for ever on those immovable features as though cut in lines of marble? It was an expression of mingled horror and surprise. It was as though while in the act of gazing at some sight too awful for mortal eyes to dwell upon, the pulses of life had suddenly ceased to beat and had left there, fixed indelibly, the last earthly look which those still features would wear.

I covered up the face again, feeling very sad at heart, and after giving a few directions to the man, I quitted the room with hushed footsteps.

I found Mrs. Dare waiting for me in the library.

"Oh, doctor, was it not awfully sudden?" she wailed.

"Awfully sudden indeed. I have long known that Mr. Muncastle's heart was affected, but I had no prevision that the end was so near. Would you mind telling me all that you know about this terrible business, or would you prefer that I should see you in the morning?"

"No, no; I will tell you now, if you please. There is something so inexplicable about it that I must tell you."

Her tears began to flow afresh, and for a little while she could not speak.

"I had parted from my uncle about half-past ten," she began, "kissing him and bidding him good-night as usual. I saw no apparent change in him, in fact he seemed to me more cheerful than he had been for some days previously. I retired to my dressing-room, and had been sitting for some time over the fire with a book, when all at once I started to my feet with the impression that I had heard my uncle call me by name. Next moment I sat down again, and told myself that I must have been dreaming. The distance from my uncle's room to mine is too great to allow of my hearing his voice, however loudly he might call. So I took up my book, but had hardly found my place, when I heard my uncle call me again. 'Laura,' he cried, not loudly, but clearly and distinctly, as though he were no farther away than the next room, and then again 'Laura.' I thrilled from head to foot as the sound rang through my brain.

"Hesitating no longer, I opened the door of my room, sped through the corridors, and burst into my uncle's room without ceremony. The first thing I saw was Thompson asleep in his wicker-chair by the fire. Taking no heed of him, I crossed the room to my uncle's bedside. The moment my eyes fell on him I knew that he was either dying or dead. I bent over him, I took him by the hand, I called him by name. But there came no response. A faint flicker stirred his eyelids for a second or two, a faint sigh broke from his lips, and then something told me that all was over. My heart gave a great gasp, as though it would burst. I reached the bell-rope somehow, and after that I remember nothing more till I found my maid trying to bring me round with sal volatile."

I waited till Mrs. Dare had in some measure recovered her calmness, then I said:

"If you have no objection, I should like to have a few words with the man Thompson. He appears to have been the last person who saw your uncle alive."

Thompson was accordingly summoned, and Mrs. Dare left us together.

He was a quiet respectable-looking man of forty, a worthy successor, to all appearance, to Ephraim Strong.

"Did your master seem as well as usual when he went to bed last evening?" I asked.

"Yes, sir, I didn't see a bit of difference in him. He had the one glass of sherry he always has the last thing, and then he bade me good-night in the kindly way he always did."

"I am informed that when Mrs. Dare entered your master's room she found you asleep. Why was that, Thompson? You know what strict injunctions were given you never to sleep at your post."

The man hung his head.

"I know, sir, I know," he said penitently. "I never did it afore, and I can't think how I came to do it last night. For one thing, sir, I'm a teetotaler, so that it couldn't have been through drink. I felt it coming on, sir."

"You felt what coming on?"

"The sleepy feeling—the drowsiness, sir. I did my best to fight against it, but it was no use. My limbs felt like lead, my brain seemed all of a muddle, and, do what I would, I couldn't keep my eyes open. I hope never to have such a feeling again."

"It is a pity—a very great pity, indeed, Thompson, that you allowed yourself to be so overcome. I suppose you did not hear your master when he called out for Mrs. Dare?"

"Did he call out for her, sir? If he did, I didn't hear him. I heard nothing till Mrs. Dare rang the bell, and then I woke all in a daze like."

I had enough to occupy my thoughts as I drove home under the frosty stars.

Remembering what Mr. Muncastle had told me, and bearing in mind the expression that rested on his features after death, I could not help wondering whether in that last supreme moment he saw, or believed that he saw, the figure of Ronald Deane standing before him? and if such were the case, would the figure have appeared to him if Thompson had not fallen asleep? There was another question that might be asked, but that could never be answered in this world: If Thompson had remained awake at his post, would Mr. Muncastle have been still alive?

Then there was Mrs. Dare's strange assertion that she distinctly heard her uncle call her by name, once, if not twice, and yet, if he did so call her, their rooms were so far apart that it was impossible she should have heard him. On the other hand, what more natural or likely than that he should call her when he felt himself sinking, helpless and alone, into the depths of the great unknown? If that were so, did her spirit respond to the summons through some finer intuition than she herself had any cognisance of? Who shall say that such things may not be?

These are problems that have a singular fascination for my sister and myself, and we often discuss them over our winter fire, but not for the world would I speak of such matters to Mrs. Denny, or any of the other good people of our little town.

To the Spirit of Poetry.

LOVE of my youth, the morning hours are gone,
The noontide drawing on ;
Hope lights the path no more,
And where her sunny radiance fell before,
The gathering shadows slowly darken o'er,
Life's brightest time is past ;
The fruit has lost its bloom, the flowers are fading fast.
Yet as I sought thee through the vanished years,
All dimmed with doubts and fears,
So now I seek thy shrine,
The heart thou once hast won is ever thine,
And waits expectant of thy smile divine,
Nor other charm can own,
But longs to hear thy voice, and lives for thee alone.
Come to me ! come ! for life is dark and sad,
And thou canst make it glad.
Come from thy home afar,
In that fair region where the Immortals are ;
Flash on my wearied spirit, as a star
In silver splendour gleams,
And cheer my waking hours, and mingle with my dreams.

No Preferment.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

THE seasons' changes were almost the only ones that had been known in Marley for many a year. The same parson preached to the rising generation in the old church on the hill-top, as had preached to the grandparents of the young, and the parents of the middle-aged. The same doctor healed and mended them now, as had done so a quarter of a century ago. The same sort of little high-teas and suppers were given by the village "upper ten" as had been given before the young people who met and flirted at them now were born. The same sombre "Kinder Scout," the loftiest point of the grand Peak-district, looked down in unchanging gloom upon the smiling country which is the border-land between Derbyshire and Cheshire. And the same intolerable sense of his own absolute importance and superiority to the majority of things in the scale of humanity, filled the heart and inflated the manner of the present owner of the old black and white house, known as Cratcliff Hall, as had filled the hearts and inflated the manners of the long line of Squire Eldridges, his ancestors.

But in this unchangeableness were peace and poetry for such as had the heart to appreciate the former, and the soul to feel the latter.

It was a sweet, simple, healthy life that of Marley, and Robina Ward (familiarily called "Poppy"), the doctor's eldest daughter, had lived it for twenty years with perfect contentment and satisfaction. Being the eldest daughter a good deal of responsibility concerning the younger ones devolved upon her, for though Dr. Ward had a wide practice, it was not a largely remunerative one, and servants were not numerous in his house. Added to this, the mother of the family had been nearly worn out in her youth by domestic worries and want of money, and in her maturity she looked to her eldest daughter to relieve her of the active part of the housekeeping. So that the fulfilling of the mere daily round of duty occupied a good deal of Poppy's time.

For amusement she had what seemed to her in these days an endless and brilliant variety.

A pony to ride, which was always and absolutely at her own disposal, when his services were not required for professional purposes by her father ; a garden full of luxuriantly growing flowers, vegetables, and weeds, from the ever-recurring stores of which she could always deck the house and her own fair person with grace and beauty ; a few dear friends in the village who were always ready to ride or drive, or come to tea with her ; "a pretty taste" for singing and painting, according to her doting parents ; a wholesome love of reading, and a good supply of magazines and novels from Manchester, within an hour's run by rail of Marley ; and such a power of taking intense, bright-hearted pleasure in all these things, as the majority of London-stimulated girls would give much to possess, were they not as a rule ignorant of its very existence.

Miss Poppy and her nut-brown hair, her shapely, tall figure, and fair face, was a familiar object in and around Marley. She had been liked for the sake of her parents when she was a bonny baby, and as she grew on through childhood to girlhood, she had been loved and admired for her own sweet self. But rather to the chagrin of that portion of the parish whose pet she was, she had not had a real lover, or a regular offer of marriage yet.

It was well-known that the rector, Mr. Holt, hoped to have her for his daughter-in-law. He unwisely made no secret of the hope, but proclaimed it in a semi-confidential way to several people. Hearing of it Poppy was very critical when Frank Holt came home from college for the last time before taking orders, and when he presented himself, not as a lover, but merely as an old friend, the young lady—it was merely self-defence—surveyed him collectedly, and allowed the poor mortified fellow to see that he did not meet with her approval.

It was injudicious on his part, and on his father's too, to have presented himself before Poppy at this time. If his mother had been alive the fine maternal instinct would have held him back till he was at his best. But Mr. Holt, in his hurry for Frank to begin his wooing of the prettiest Poppy in Cheshire, would brook no delay. So he sent his son forth to dazzle his lady-love, with an air of being weak and over-done enveloping him like a garment.

The lad—he was little more, being only Poppy's senior by a year or two—had been paying a heavy price for this attenuated appearance of his. By day and night he had laboured to become what he was now—a scholar whose scholarship was honoured and rewarded. But Poppy merely saw in him a weak-limbed, bent-backed young man, with no savoir faire, and an unmanageable amount of gush about him at the first moment of meeting.

"What a delightful face Frank Holt's is," Mrs. Ward said to her daughter when the visitor had gone.

"Do you think so, mother ? Well, if his is a delightful face, I am glad none of our boys have 'delightful faces.' He looks so timid. Now a man oughtn't to look that, ought he ?"

"I only thought he looked gentle, and that look of gentleness, combined with power, is very beautiful, I think."

"You always thought a good deal of Frank, didn't you ?" Poppy remarked carelessly. "I never did, you know. Laurence Eldridge is different, isn't he ?"

"Very different," Mrs. Ward said curtly, magnanimously refraining from saying how inferior she thought him.

"Why don't we know more of the Eldridges, mother ?" Poppy said presently ; "they are so nice, so very, very much nicer than other people here, and we never seem to get to know them. Why don't we, mother ?"

Mrs. Ward tried to smile as if she saw a joke in her daughter's question as she answered :

"Because we are the 'doctor's family,' and they are 'the Eldridges.'"

"And the Eldridges are ever so much above us—do you mean that, mother ?"

"No, indeed—the Eldridges above us!—above you ! No ; but they have got into the habit of holding themselves aloof, and why shouldn't we suffer them to indulge in that habit without let or hindrance from us ? We've got on very well all these years without knowing them. Why should we risk discomfiture by trying to know them now ?"

This question apparently demanded serious consideration before Poppy could answer it, for she sat in a cogitative attitude for some moments.

Then she spoke :

"Do you want me to try not to know them, mother ?"

"My dear child, no—a dozen times, no ! Feuds are out of fashion. Moreover, there never has been one between the Eldridges and ourselves—for one reason, perhaps they are scarcely conscious of our existence."

"They are, mother !" Poppy cried, blushing furiously ; "Mrs. Eldridge has been saying lately that she looked for an opportunity of meeting me and knowing me ; she is quite sorry that the families have never got to know one another ; it's not her fault, and it's not Laurence's fault, that you don't visit at Cratcliff Hall."

"Who has been your informant on this point, Poppy ?" Mrs. Ward asked, with a slight sense of amusement, and a deep one of anxiety.

"Laurence Eldridge himself, mother dear ; you see I met him at the Holts' last evening, and to-day he came over again while I was there. He says it's such a pity that his sisters and I don't fraternise, and when I told him I didn't even know them to speak to, he said 'that wasn't their fault,' in a way that made me think it might be ours."

"I've lived in Marley twenty-one years, Poppy, and during that time Mr. Eldridge has spoken to me, on an average, about twice a year. When I came here a bride, fresh from a home that had been in our family as long as Cratcliff has been in the Eldridges, and that is held in as high account in our county as Cratcliff is in Cheshire, Mrs. Eldridge drove up to the garden-gate one morning, and sent her servant in to ask me to go out and speak to her. I went, knowing all the while that she was being guilty of a grossly unladylike action. Still, I thought, two wrongs never made a right yet. So I went. We were both young women in those days—twenty-one years ago, and I had this advantage over her, that I had been born and bred in the sphere into which she had only married, and that recently. My people were county people, her father was a newly rich Manchester man, and her mother had been a factory hand. She, in her new position, was ashamed of the parents whose industry and money had won it for her, and she felt that I knew this and despised her for it. So she tried to treat me as she did the wives of the better-class employés on her husband's estate, and just called at the gate occasionally to send in a basket of vegetables, and a request that if I wanted anything in the way of jelly or wine I would send to Cratcliff for it. But she never met me on terms of equality, and she was careful to tell everyone that she only employed the village practitioner, Mr. Ward, in the cases of her servants' illness. Her newly-developed desire to know you is altogether unaccountable. But I think, dear Poppy, you can understand easily that I am not very desirous of gratifying it."

Poppy looked perplexed and discomfited.

"I can never like her now that I hear how she treated you," she said presently. Then after a pause she added ruefully: "What a pity she should be so different—so very different to her son! You would like him if you knew him, mother, but I suppose, after the way Mrs. Eldridge has treated you, it's hopeless to think we shall ever know him—any of them, I mean."

"How serious you are about it, Poppy."

"It does seem to me to be a serious thing to live at odds with one's neighbours instead of being in love and charity with them," Poppy said thoughtfully.

And then Mrs. Ward was very well satisfied to let the subject drop. No good could come of a discussion as to the merits of the Eldridges. All Mrs. Ward asked of fate and circumstances respecting them, was that she might hear nothing, and Poppy think little, about them.

Her aspiration was a vain one. After one or two more meetings at the Holts'—meetings which it was Frank's heart's desire to avert—between Laurence Eldridge and Poppy, the squire's son called on Mr. Ward on some transparent pretext, and having once obtained an entrance maintained his power to use it. And Poppy was undisguisedly delighted at his doing so.

He, like Frank Holt, was destined for the Church, but unlike Frank Holt he had not distinguished himself at college, nor had he come home with a bent back and a generally weak-looking physique. He was a stalwart, muscular young Christian in these days, gay hearted and mannered, with the prospect of a good family living falling to his lot as soon as he could hold it. This living was in the gift of a bachelor uncle, who, like his father, had married cotton, and invested the money he had married in buying an old family place and Church patronage.

Summer weather is very conducive to the growth of the tender passion everywhere. It seemed to be especially so at Marley this year. Never had the rushing rivers and waving woods, which make this borderland of Derbyshire and Cheshire luxuriantly lovely, seemed to respectively gurgle and whisper such fair promise of love, and hope, and joy to the young people whose fortunes are being traced here.

Poppy and Mr. Laurence Eldridge, the squire's second son, were happy and hopeful because they were a great deal together, and each had come to the pass of feeling that the world held nothing higher than the presence of the other. Though words of love and promise had not been actually spoken, yet the girl knew that the man looked upon her as his future wife, and the man knew that the girl regarded him as her future husband. For the present summer weather this was enough for them, though ways and means of compassing this desirable end were not apparent yet.

It is true that Laurence did not meet with anything like the encouragement from the family of his pretty sweetheart that the latter thought was his right and proper due. Dr. Ward, from a business point of view, thought young Eldridge an undesirable suitor for his daughter, for the Eldridges had lived extravagantly beyond their income, and the eldest son had not the reputation of being one who would be likely to recoup the fortunes of the house if they were failing, as he passed more of his time beside the green tables of Monaco than in the green woods of Cratcliff. However, with him we have nothing to do. Our sole interest in the Eldridge family is confined to his younger brother, who had never given father, mother, or any human being connected with him any anxiety as to his future yet.

Mrs. Ward, for her part, disliked the probability of his marrying her daughter, and suffered him to see that she did so, because he was the son of his mother.

The young Wards, Poppy's brothers, were unflatteringly indifferent to him, "because he was going to be a parson;" their ideas of parsons having been formed from a former curate of Mr. Holt's, who had been a rather severe tutor to them.

Poppy was happy because she loved and was beloved, and he was sure to come to see her every day.

Frank Holt was happy because in the intensity of her own new-born love, and hope, and joy, Poppy was always kind and sweet to him, treating him more as the old friend and playfellow he had been, and not at all as the lover into which he had developed. But he was not quick to mark the subtle distinction, and so was happy in the mere fact of being shone upon by the sun of his life.

He had recovered from that look of being weary and overwrought which had impressed Poppy unfavourably on his first return from college, but he still remained a slender, pallid, rather weak-looking man by the side of strong, upright, manly, bright-looking Laurence Eldridge. Frank Holt's face was fair as well as pale, his hair was nearly yellow, straight, and as a rule too long to coincide with Poppy's notions on the subject of close-cropping. His eyes were of that light blue into which shadows rarely come, but fire does, when anything stirs the souls of their owners. He was, if not "slow," unquestionably very deliberate of speech, and his voice was, if not sweet, certainly one that constrained and held the attention of his hearers. Laurence Eldridge, whose tones were strong and high, and whose laughter was loud and full, said he felt himself to be a boisterous bull, roaring, if he spoke immediately after Frank's soft subdued strain.

He chose his language and rounded his sentences with more scholarly precision, too, than fervent force. Not that his manner of expressing himself was strained or laboured—far from this, but it was more polished and accurate than the easy colloquial style which is chiefly in favour. If Laurence Eldridge felt like a "boisterous bull" when following Frank Holt conversationally, no less assuredly did Poppy Ward fancy that she was speaking untidily and a little roughly if she were his successor.

At length, after a happy, irresponsible summer, came the happier day for Frank, when he got a title to orders, and a curacy in the cathedral town, Wexminster. And here, under the influence of the shadow of the sacred fane, in the atmosphere of cloistered seclusion, a revived feeling of Churchmanship, and the eye of the bishop, he commenced his labours, and we part with him for a time. But previous to commencing those labours, he had played out his part in the romance of Poppy's life.

Frankly he had told her that he loved her, and wanted her to love him in return—had declared his poverty and his anticipations of its sticking to him closer than a friend through life. With equal frankness he assured her that anyone who loved him, and shrank from enduring that poverty with him, would be despicable in his eyes. Then he waited for her to answer him, and she, dreading the sound of her own voice, and trembling for the construction of her sentences, did it rather falteringly, little knowing how musically her voice sounded in his ears.

"It's not that—it's not poverty I dread, Frank, you must know that; but—I care for someone else in the way you want me to care for you."

He felt himself chilling as she spoke—chilling with disappointment. A mild afterglow came immediately, for was he not entirely right, and she entirely mistaken? That was the harshest term he permitted himself to apply to her conduct.

He was too much of a gentleman to worry her with a request for the name of his rival to be delivered up to him, and he had himself too well under control to weary her with vain repetitions of his suit. But he was disappointed, and he let her see it, and her kind heart was pained.

"You're not angry with me, Frank?" she asked, and all the while she was longing for him to go, for she heard Laurence Eldridge's jubilant voice in the garden enquiring of one of her brothers where "they all were," "they all" meaning herself.

"I can never be angry with you, it would not be possible for me to be anything but what I am already with regard to you," he said quietly, but there came a clear, bright light into his eyes that showed Poppy this subdued, self-restrained man could feel—aye, and that strongly too!

He got up to go away, and Poppy, in all the after years, never forgot how he looked then, drooping and shambling in figure and gait, with an indescribable mixture of weakness and strength about him—the girl didn't know then that the weakness was physical merely, or that the mental strength, which even she was dimly cognisant of now, would develop into something that would make her wonder that she had ever been so conscious of the physical weakness. The present did not teach her this truth. The future may!

Again she broke the silence, this time with a quick coming colour, and a flurried disregard of the way in which her words tumbled out of her mouth; for she heard Laurence Eldridge's voice approaching the house.

"Will you promise always to be friendly with me, Frank, whatever happens?"

"Certainly; not that my friendship can ever be of avail to you," he said, looking at her as coolly and steadily as if her refusal to marry him had not wounded him to the core. Then he shook hands with her in a way that made her feel that she had undesignedly done him an injury, and got himself away out of the house, meeting Laurence Eldridge as he went.

"So you've cut me out, old fellow," the latter cried heartily, referring to the fact of Frank's having got a title to orders before he, Laurence, had been so fortunate.

"You're mistaken," Frank said icily, thinking only of Poppy Ward.

Then he went on his way to his curacy in Wexminster; and Laurence Eldridge went in to his love.

Matters came to a climax very shortly after this. Laurence was ordained deacon to a London curacy in the East End, and thither he went, and served a sharp probation. He went into it with no particular views, and he came out of it under the influence of one of the hardest-working vicars and best Churchmen in London, an excellent parish-priest of the "Young High" school.

Opportunely, about this time—after two years of real work in London—the incumbent of the living which was in the gift of Laurence's uncle died, and the uncle wrote, saying that it had always been his intention to give him this living, but that rumours had reached him which made him desirous of seeing his nephew before he made the offer formally.

"Poppy and I will have to stand to our guns now," he said with a whistle as he read this.

But he did not attach any serious importance to the reference to the "rumours" till he got to Gaylight and interviewed his uncle.

"Your mother tells me that before you were ordained there was some idle folly going on between you and some girl in the village. Is that true?"

"It is not true," Laurence said sternly.

The idea of his true love for Poppy, and Poppy's true love for him, being described as "idle folly" struck him as being utterly false.

"Then there is no entanglement—nothing to interfere with your carrying out my views?"

"It depends on what your views are. If they're confined to giving me Gaylight, there's nothing in the world to interfere with them."

"They extend beyond that. Your aunt and I, having no children of our own, have come to regard Bessie as our daughter. To have her settled close to us at the vicarage has been our dream for the last few years—ever since you determined on going into the Church, in fact."

Now, Bessie was a girl whom the Robert Eldridges had adopted, and for whom Laurence Eldridge had not even a liking.

"I'm sorry for that, because she certainly will never be settled there with me," said Laurence stoutly.

"Nonsense! Why not? Where will you find a better or a nicer girl?"

"I've found one already," Laurence laughed.

But he soon found that it was no laughing matter when his uncle said:

"Then you have deceived me bitterly. You told me two minutes ago that there was no entanglement—nothing to interfere with your carrying out my views."

"Nor is there," Laurence began explaining; "the young lady to whom I am engaged is worthy of the position I offer her—worthy of the best position any man could offer her. She'll be a much greater boon to you, and a far greater acquisition to Gaylight than——"

"Who is this young lady who has entered into an engagement with you unknown to your family?"

"It's known to my family by this time. I only proposed to her formally four days ago; directly I got her letter accepting me, I wrote off to my mother telling her of it, and asking her to call on my future wife. You asked who she is. Her father's a doctor in Marley."

"Indeed!" Mr. Robert Eldridge said savagely; "spare yourself the trouble of giving me any further information. You reject the hand of my adopted daughter, and in doing that you reject Gaylight. I wash my hands of you."

Laurence thanked his uncle for the dismissal, and went his way back to his London curacy. On his way he married Robina Ward, and was cut by his whole family in consequence.

Years passed away. Mrs. Laurence Eldridge became the mother of many children, and sympathised more than ever with the many monetary troubles which had beset her mother in her own youth. The children sickened, and some of them died in the low localities in which they were compelled to live in London on account of her husband's work. The exigencies of circumstances compelled him to rove from diocese to diocese, and still "suitable preferment" was never found for the hard-working, earnest man who went on doing his Master's work through poverty, privation, and ill-health. In common with the majority of the underpaid, overworked, poor clergymen of the Established Church of England, he failed to establish a claim on any bishop, dean and chapter, or private patron. A curacy of a hundred and twenty pounds a year, and pious recommendations from men better placed than himself to "wait patiently till there was a distinct call" to a position that would make the possibility of living from day to day less problematical than it was at present, was all to which Laurence Eldridge had attained at the end of twenty years' unremitting labour.

There had been a hope in Laurence Eldridge's heart once of being so placed that he would be enabled to do his work untrammelled by the ignoble difficulties about filthy lucre which were for ever checking, blighting, and thwarting. This was when, after several years of unremitting toil amidst cruel circumstances, his health broke down, and while he was in a pitiable plight of poverty and pain, his vicar, a man of immense social, political, and Church influence, promised him, Laurence Eldridge, the first living which it was in his, the vicar's, power to get.

But that hope, nurtured in ignorance of the real character of the man who raised it, soon gave way to despair in Laurence Eldridge's breast. His late vicar was not the one to ask for preferment for the men who had done his work. His part it was graciously and gracefully to further the claims of men whose feet were sure to climb, whether he aided them or not. It looked so disinterested, it read so well, that he should warmly advocate a winning cause. It showed such a noble lack of acrid jealousy; it brought his name so unobjectionably, yet so prominently forward. It enabled him to be noble, and magnanimous, and generous, and unselfish, at such a cheap rate.

There had been another gleam of sunshine on Laurence Eldridge, besides these fallacious promises.

Once, when, broken down in body, purse, heart, and soul, he had sought cheap retirement in an almost unknown spot in these realms, he had been accidentally unearthed by the bishop of the diocese.

The great man, having discovered in the unfortunate Laurence something which he felt in his episcopal mind would supplement some ideas of his own concerning a parish under his supervision, swooped upon the down-trodden curate with all the force of his—the bishop's own—recently-developed power and suavity. He swooped with the offer of a locum-tenency in a remote seaside place, in his episcopal talons; he spoke the words bishops soon learn to speak concerning the interesting nature of the work and the salubrity of the climate, and he succeeded in landing our poor hero, with a wife and family, in a half-furnished house, on a hundred pounds a year.

But he—the lord bishop—did not succeed in doing this until in answer to his prey's plaint: "My lord, if I accept this at your request, it is with the understanding that at the expiration of my locum-tenency I may claim preferment at your hands?" he (the bishop) had replied with smiling suavity:

"That will be a question for after consideration, of course."

Laurence Eldridge, being generous-natured, did not fairly balance the words against the mere smiling suavity.

Once again there came a glimmer of hope's ever-lighted lantern.

Mrs. Laurence Eldridge read in one of the few newspapers which she saw in the wilds in which she was condemned to live or perish, that her old friend, Frank Holt, had been appointed chaplain to the Bishop of Wexminster. Later on she saw that he had married one of the bishop's daughters.

"He will help Laurence," she thought. And having some friends in the far-off county in which Wexminster was situated, she wrote to them, and asked them to take her in for a few days.

They gladly promised to take her in, at the same time warning her that her chances of an interview with the bishop's private chaplain and son-in-law were few, unless she could get him to make an appointment.

But Mrs. Laurence Eldridge could not forget that she had been Poppy Ward; further, she did not forget that as Poppy Ward, she had been the heart's desire of the bishop's chaplain.

So she went in hopeful confidence to the palace, where the bishop's chaplain and his wife, the bishop's daughter, had excellent quarters, and sent in her card to Mr. Holt.

Unfortunately Mr. Holt happened to be crossing the hall as the servant, in some doubt where he was to put "the person," was hesitatingly about to show Mrs. Eldridge into a little waiting-room, and, stepping forward, Mrs. Eldridge made the mistake of exclaiming:

"Mr. Holt, surely you know me!"

He turned towards her with that air of superficial courtliness which seems to be a growing attribute of successful divines. There was no recognition in his clear, light-blue, unflinching eyes, but

Mrs. Eldridge could have taken her oath that not only did he know her, but that he was uncommonly ill-pleased to see her.

There was no trace left in this smooth-mannered, suavely-courteous gentleman with the self-possessed, easy, condescending air, of the shambling, stooping, slightly awkward lover of her youth. Instinctively, just as she felt sure that he knew her, did she also feel sure that he put her on a lower level, and her spirit rose in indignation when in reply to her question, "Mr. Holt, surely you know me?" he replied, "I have not that pleasure, but shall be most happy to do so."

"I doubt that," she said calmly, "but you hold my card in your hand."

He glanced at it as she said this, and affected to recall her identity with a slight effort.

"Mrs. Eldridge—I had the pleasure of knowing you as Miss Ward—pray walk into my study."

He ushered her in with elaborate politeness, placed a chair for her, and seated himself at his writing-table, whereon a pile of unopened letters were lying.

"I regret that I can only give you a few minutes. The bishop has such a mass of correspondence that it could never be got through were I not to give my undivided attention to it. Will you tell me to what I am indebted to the honour of this visit?"

"To my hope that success and prosperity had not entirely obliterated from your heart all kindly feeling for two old friends. To my belief that you would, if I asked you, use your great influence with the bishop to get a living for my husband, Laurence Eldridge, who is nearly broken down with poverty and ill health."

He shook his head gently and deprecatingly.

"Your husband is at present in the diocese of Oldtowers, I believe?"

She assented.

"And previous to his going there he was in London. It is on the bishops of these two dioceses that he has a claim, if on anyone. For my own part I have made it a rule never to back an application from any man for preferment, and I always lament it when I see a restless craving for a fresh sphere of labour developing itself in any priest. If a direct call is made upon him, it is distinctly a man's duty to obey it. But unless this is the case, I cannot conscientiously advocate the cause of one who is desirous of turning away from the labour that is close to his hand."

"The direct calls to livings that men can live on, are only made to those men who have interest or money," she said bitterly.

He gently shrugged his shoulders, and took up one of the letters.

"But I will not ask you to act against the dictates of your conscience, Frank Holt. I am glad to hear that you have one, and sorry that it has expanded to such dimensions as to crush out your heart and humanity. 'Direct calls' to higher places than the one you fill now will surely come to you, for you'll never lose an inch of ground by stepping aside to help save the 'hindmost' from his proverbial fate."

With that she left him; he smiling softly, and congratulating himself inwardly on having rid himself of so possibly troublesome an applicant with so little trouble, and such perfect tact.

At the present time he has, after a little becoming hesitation, and a few exquisitely worded doubts as to whether the "call" is sufficiently strong to "justify him in quitting his present sphere of labour," accepted a certain deanery, which has always been a sure step to a bishopric. Laurence Eldridge is in receipt of an offer of a living value one hundred and twenty pounds per annum, and two acres of glebe. He is also hesitating as to whether he shall accept this "call" or not. But his hesitation is due to the fact of his doubting whether or not he and his family would not die of stagnation and starvation upon the "living" in the course of a few weeks.

The Editor's Note Book.

If the Government had really decided upon an early evacuation of Egypt, the destruction of Hicks Pasha's army was very inconvenient for their policy, but it is fortunate for them and for us that the Mahdi's victory occurred before, and not after, the departure of our troops. It seems certain that but for the moral and material support of British bayonets, the Khedive's position would have been by this time untenable, and that our troops would scarcely have reached home, before they would have had to return, with a task before them compared to which the suppression of Arabi was mere child's play.

DIFFERENT people, the old adage tells us, have different opinions, and I have, myself, the greatest respect for people who, having strong opinions of their own, have the courage to avow them, even if the avowal is not likely to be very popular. But I think my readers will agree with me that Mr. Labouchere, in his cynical statement in Truth, that he rejoiced at the news of the destruction of Hicks Pasha's army, oversteps the line of decency. I should be very sorry if my political views permitted me to "rejoice" at the deaths of the gallant band of Englishmen who composed Colonel Hicks's staff.

WAR between France and China is even less likely to do anybody good than war in general, and I shall be surprised if France does not come out of it worse than anybody else. It is nearly a quarter of a century since China had a stand-up fight with England and France—and a very good fight she made of it at the Peiho Forts—and a great many things have happened since then.

NATIONS like the Chinese have now very different ideas about the organisation, armament, and equipment of troops to those which obtained in 1860, and although it may be granted that a French army might be safely trusted to beat a Chinese one of much greater strength, it must not be forgotten that the French army has first of all to be sent all the way to China, an undertaking the difficulties of which it is impossible to over-estimate.

AND it must also be remembered that the French Government is heavily handicapped at home, firstly, by the terrible condition of the national finances, and secondly, by the very uncertain state of the national temper. The people could barely support any considerable increase of taxation, and French ministers fight, metaphorically speaking, with ropes round their necks. Failure would at once lead to their ignominious dismissal, and, even if they succeed, there will be a very mauvais quart d'heure for everybody when the bill comes to be paid.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Standard having unkindly suggested that Mr. William Morris, if he wished to be consistent, ought to divide the contents of his factory with his workmen, the new Apostle of Socialism has written to the Editor to explain that he is not in a position to do anything of the kind, and that, in fact, it is not possible for individual capitalists to cast aside their positions and "take rank with the proletariat," until "the immense chain of the terrible organisation of competitive commerce," of which capitalists are but minute links, is completely unriveted.

THIS, being translated into plain English, simply means that Mr. Morris's Socialism is altogether absurd and unpractical, and that he knows it; and that the mischief that teaching such as his may do is not even atoned for by pure and simple faith on the part of the teacher.

It is not uninteresting to note what Mr. Morris says he thinks will follow when the unrivetting of the links of the immense chain has enabled capitalists to abandon their positions. Let me give his exact words.

"THE sacrifice of that position, I believe, will not seem heavy to us; because, if we are right in our estimate of the good which a state of Social Order would bring the world, we should receive in return gifts which no money can buy: to see an end of poverty as well as of riches, of aqualor as well as of luxury; to find leisure, pleasure, and refinement common among those who do the rough work of the world; to see genuine healthy art growing spontaneously from this happiness; to see our well-loved islands freed from all sordid disfigurement, the tokens of a degrading struggle for existence and riches—is anything which money can now buy worth the pleasure of being part of such a life as this, and of feeling that each one of us has a share in upholding it?"

THIS is, indeed, a charming picture, and will probably be realised at about the time of the Greek Kalends, or when three Sundays come together in a week, or during the later years of the Millennium. Seriously, it is intolerable that the real work and progress of the world should be hindered, even for a moment, by such vain imaginings as these.

It appears that there is to be a great strike in the cotton trade against a proposal of the masters to make a reduction of five per cent. in the wages of weavers, and the colliers also propose to "go out" unless the masters will consent to increase wages fifteen per cent. It is to be hoped that wiser counsels will prevail, and I think that if each weaver were to work out a simple little sum in arithmetic by himself, a strike would not be so probable as it seems to be at present. Thus, a reduction of five per cent. in the case of a man earning thirty shillings a week, means £3 18s. in the course of twelve months, whereas a man who "goes out" and stops out only six weeks, makes a dead loss of £9, which it will take him a very considerable time to recover. No doubt strikes are organised on the supposition that the masters must speedily give way, but the men have been beaten before now after struggles which have lasted very much longer than six weeks.

THE position of the colliers is stronger than that of most other workmen, seeing that we cannot get coal except from our own mines; but the Lancashire weavers would do well to remember that manufacturing industries have occasionally not only been paralysed, but absolutely killed by injudicious strikes. The transfer of the iron ship-building trade almost bodily from the Thames to the Clyde is a case strictly in point.

TWELVE years' penal servitude is a severe sentence, but not too severe for such a man as Warden, who, being in the enjoyment of a very handsome salary, and implicitly trusted by his employers, robbed them deliberately and mercilessly. But I think that some distinction ought to have been drawn between the case of this man and that of the other convict, Watters.

WITHOUT altogether believing the statement of Warden—certainly not evidence one would be inclined implicitly to trust—it is no doubt true that, if Watters did not absolutely know of Warden's robberies, he must have had a fair idea of what was going on, and deserves punishment as a receiver of stolen property. There seems to me, however, to be a marked difference between the crimes of which these men were respectively guilty, and if the sentence upon Warden was a just one, of which there can be no doubt, I cannot help thinking that Watters's fate is unduly severe.

MR. JUSTICE HANNEN's decision that it is not sufficient in law for a husband, who finds it impossible to live on friendly terms with his wife, to provide her with a suitable residence and income, and that he can be compelled to live under the same roof with her, or go to prison, will come as a surprise to most people. Mr. Justice Hannen expressed a strong opinion that such a state of things ought not to be permitted to continue, and there can be no doubt that in process of time there will be an alteration in the law. Meanwhile, the position of the defendant in the case in question is a hard one.

LORD COLERIDGE and Mr. Justice Mathew, sitting in banc, have decided that Sir Percy Shelley, in the matter of his theatre at Chelsea, acted, no doubt with the best possible intentions, against the law, and that the conviction which was obtained against him in the police-court must stand. I do not see how any other result could have been expected, and in the public interest no other could have been desired.

SIR PERCY's theatre would have been practically under the control of no authority whatever, and the door would have been opened to all sorts of evasions of the law on the part of people of very different position to that of Sir Percy Shelley, which might have been in no way conducive either to the public morality or public health.

THE case of Day versus Foster, in which the proprietor of a school was sued by one of his assistant masters, is not of great public interest, except for its bearing on the question of public as against private schools, although it has served as the text of several newspaper articles on the subject. The case does not seem, however, very relevant to that issue, seeing that the boys at the school in question numbered about one hundred and forty, a number considerably greater than is to be found at many so-called public schools, and far in excess, I think, of that which can be safely entrusted to the care of the practically irresponsible proprietor of a private school.

I WONDER what the drink of the future will be, after all. Sir Henry Thompson and other distinguished doctors, not to mention people like Sir Wilfrid Lawson, warn us against alcoholic liquors; if we drink milk, we are in appreciable danger of typhoid fever; and water, in its native state, is not without danger of its own. A correspondent of the Times now suggests hot, almost boiling, water, as a cheerful and wholesome dinner drink. Probably a considerable time will elapse before the kettle takes its place as part of the necessary equipment of the dinner-table.

A DIFFICULTY, which excited a good deal of temper at some of the cricket matches of last season, has now assumed such proportions as to threaten the prosperity of the national game. That the delivery of certain professional bowlers could not be called fair has long been obvious, as was also the fact that umpires, who belong to the same class as the offenders, were not particularly anxious to put a stop to the objectionable practice. Matters have now been brought to an issue by the fact that the Nottingham County Club has refused to meet Lancashire, against two of whose bowlers complaint was specially made.

THE rivalry of counties is the backbone of cricket, and it is to be hoped that the Marylebone Club will be able to find some way out of the present difficulty. There can be no doubt that the big gate-money matches, of which we have of late years had so many, have done the game a great deal of harm, and if the M.C.C. does not insist on strict fairness and rigid adherence to its rules, the result will very speedily be one which all lovers of cricket must deplore. ## Spiders.

SPIDERS are the most murderous animals in creation. They have nets and traps, caves, fangs, hooks, and poison bags—all the paraphernalia, in short, of robbers or assassins. When a spider attacks a hapless fly, he plunges his two buried fangs downwards into it, pouring out his poison into the wound, whereby he soon kills his miserable victim. The fangs shut up like a knife-blade into its case when not used or wanted, and open and erect themselves when the creature is savage and wants to use them. His eight eyes are like globes of polished diamond, and curiously follow the necessities of his situations. When the creature lives at the end of long tubes, or underground, they are clustered forward on his forehead, for he only wants to look straight and intently before him; and when he lives in short tubes, terminating in a large web exposed to the open air, they are more separated and give him a wider range; when he lives in the centre of an open web they are more divergent still, and set in slight prominences so as to have a freer axis; and when he is of the wandering tribe, they are scattered so that he can see every way and all round at once. The nocturnal species have no dark pigment like the rest, but have, instead, a curtain which reflects a brilliant metallic lustre, so that their eyes shine like cats' eyes in the dark.

Spiders' webs are made of two kinds of silk; the one forming the cables and radii, simple and innocuous, the other forming the concentric or spiral threads, closely studded with minute globules of fluid, like small drops of dew. These globules are intensely viscid, and by them alone are retained the fly, the bee, the gnat, and the moth. A fat old spider, basking half asleep in the middle of his treacherous net, yet never so asleep as not to be on the alert if but the wind shake its moorings too roughly, is more like one of Bunyan's giants than anything else; he is the tyrant of the garden, the butcher, the assassin, the oppressor of the weak, the wily circumventor of the strong.

One variety of spiders make showers. On one hot day in June, while seated on a bench on the esplanade at Brighton, I saw spiders flying in a way which I could not have believed possible. Some half-score pairs of spiders alighted upon the coats of myself and of two gentlemen with whom I was in conversation. They were of a sort I had never seen before—small, with black bodies and grey abdomens. I caught several of them, because I was surprised to see them pass from my coat-sleeves to the coats of the gentlemen who were to leeward of me as easily as house-flies or ladybirds might have done. When I caught them, they let themselves down from my finger by spinning threads very rapidly, as other sorts of spiders had done under similar circumstances. But the very lively black-and-grey spiders showed me tricks I had never before seen or heard of. I expected them to do as other spiders, and let themselves down to the ground before unloosing their rope. They escaped in a far cleverer way. When the pendent thread was some eight inches long, its course changed from vertical to horizontal, for the spider rose on the current of the breeze until it was on a level with my finger, the line lengthening all the while. When it became about ten inches long, the spider, by some means, detached the string at its point of juncture with my finger, and sailed away upon the stream of air. I caught three of these spiders, and each of them performed this feat, to the astonishment of myself and of the gentlemen sitting beside me. It must have been accomplished by means of special faculties. This spider must be possessed of the knack by means of which boys attach and detach leather suckers from stones. Moreover, they must possess a far more extraordinary faculty; they must know how to adjust their own specific gravity to the current of air upon which they float. Dr. Lister said long ago that spiders have a power of coiling and thickening their webs in the air, and this power has been deemed by some the explanation of the gossamer showers. But the whole cause is not understood, for no one knows why, on particular days, flakes of gossamer should fall so fast upon trees and hedges, that a diligent collector might gather basketfuls.

Amongst the most curious of the many curious facts recorded by Mr. Walter Bates, who lived for many years on the borders of the River Amazon, hunting for all manner of living creatures, is the existence of the bird-catching spider, Mygale avicularia, so long unbelieved in, but now established beyond all doubt, Mr. Bates having seen with his own eyes what he has related. He saw a large hairy spider, nearly two inches in length of body, and with legs expanding to the length of seven inches, both body and legs being covered with coarse grey and reddish hairs. He saw this monster crouching on the body of a finch, which, smeared with a filthy liquor, but not quite dead, still palpitated beneath the fangs of the horrid brute. Another finch lay on the bole, dead; and the dense white web, stretched across a crevice in the tree, but now broken, and with birds entangled in the pieces, told the story of the capture. The mygales are called crab-spiders by the natives, and if touched, shed their hair, causing a peculiar and almost maddening irritation. They are sometimes of immense size, and Mr. Bates asserts that he saw one of them with a cord round its waist, led about the house by some Indian children, as if it were a dog. Many of the spiders of the country are of exquisite colour, and some, which double themselves up at the base of leaf-stalks, deceive their prey by thus looking like flower-buds. One species has two curved, bronze-coloured spines, an inch and a half in length, proceeding from the tip of its abdomen. It spins a large web, its spines, so far as can be seen, neither hindering nor helping in the work. As for the webs, some are like silk, and some like fine muslin. Some of the dens are broad, slanting galleries, two feet long, burrowed in the ground; others are nests built in trees, or hammocks slung across the angle of a room, or hung up on the tiles and thatch of the house-tops.

In Suffolk, the people say, that if after sweeping a room the broom is accidentally left up in a corner, strangers will visit the house in the course of that day; while others affirm, in the northern counties, that to sweep dust out of the house by the front door is equivalent to sweeping away the good fortune and happiness of the family. Care should rather be taken to sweep inwards—the dust being carried out in a basket or shovel—and then no harm will happen. Furthermore, the spider, which in daily life is little noticed except for its cobweb, the presence of which in a house generally betokens neglect, is by no means an unfriendly intruder. Although the servant oftentimes ruthlessly sweeps this uncared-for little visitor away from the wall, yet a common proverb reminds us that If you wish to live and thrive,

Let the spider run alive;

ill-luck being supposed to quickly overtake those who kill or even so much as injure it. It was a notion formerly prevalent in many parts of Scotland, that should a servant wilfully kill a spider, she would certainly break a piece of crockery or glass before the day was out.

Teaching at Home.

ARITHMETIC. PART II.

IT is impossible to fix any age as the one at which children should begin the formal study of arithmetic. One child may be able to begin at five years old; with another it may be hopeless trying to teach him till he is eight. Somewhere midway between six and seven is a frequent time for beginning, but the rule must not be by age, but by the mental condition of the child.

ONE of the first steps, of course, is to teach the child to write the figures. His teacher should let him count up to nine, and then show him how the first three figures are written, and let him copy them over and over again, till he is able to write them without the copy. The child will very likely want to know how the other figures are written, but do not show him more at one time than he will be able to remember permanently. The desire to be shown how to write down 4, 5, and 6 will often stimulate a child to take pains with 1, 2, and 3. Besides, whatever may be the case in eating, the proverb certainly holds good in learning, that "it is best to leave off with an appetite."

WHEN the child has finished writing his figures, you can practise him with a little easy addition and subtraction. "How much do two and three make?" Perhaps the child, instead of answering, looks stupid. "Well, but you have three marbles; how many would you have if you won two from Tommy?" Put in this practical form, the child will probably answer, "Five." Show him that three of your fingers and two of his make five fingers, three of your buttons and two of his make five buttons, and lead him to see that any two and three similar articles make five when added together. Some children will tell you at once, from past experience, what two and three come to; but, whenever a child does not know, do not let him "make shots" at the answer, and call out four, six, three, five, in a random manner. If he does not know, let him find out by the best of all methods—experience. Let him have two pink sweets and three white ones, and see how many sweets that comes to; or let him work his sum with marbles or bits of paper. Show him how he may find out the right answer, and let him feel that it is silly to give wrong ones when he has the materials for forming a right opinion at hand.

THE great use of arithmetic being to encourage accurate thought, take care that your pupil is accurate from the very beginning.

AFTER a child has had some little practice in adding and taking away—the two processes may be taught together—suggest to him one day, that he should add four oranges and five apples. He will probably tell you there are nine. Ask him what he means, whether there are nine oranges or nine apples; and tell him to think about it, and let you know to-morrow which it ought to be. Don't be in a hurry to explain, just let your suggestion wait a little. An idea is like a seed, it must have time to grow in a child's mind, and you need not always be pulling it up to see if it has begun to sprout.

If the answer is not ready next day, you may perhaps help him with another question: "Here are five marbles, take away four sugar-plums from them, and tell me the answer." The child thinks this is very silly, and remarks contemptuously, "You can't." "But you can take four away from five, can't you?" "Oh yes, of course, that leaves one." "Then why can't you take four sugar-plums from five marbles, and leave one?" It is by such exercises as these that a child gets the idea that numbers represent real things; that only like things can be added to like things, and that you must not attempt in arithmetic, what it would be ridiculous to attempt in life.

WHEN the pupil can make all the figures from 1 to 9, and has been practised verbally in adding and subtracting, you can let him work little sums on paper. Make him write 3 and 4, one below the other, add them up, and write down the answer. Give him all the combinations you can think of, provided their total sum does not exceed nine. Let him see for himself that one number can be made up in several different ways, that nine can be made from 4 + 5, or 2 + 7, etc. Let him at this stage learn the meaning of the signs + and —. You can set his sums for him using the signs, and then let him write the figures under one another, and add or subtract according to the sign given. A week or more will very likely be spent in teaching the child to write down the figures from 1 to 9, and very likely take another week over these little sums, and the use of the two signs. But there is no need to hurry, take more time still, if you need it, and don't go on to a fresh step till your pupil has mastered the preceding one.

WHEN the pupil has got thus far, you have to take a new and very important step, no less than an introduction to the decimal system of notation.

THIS system, we must remember, is an artificial contrivance of an elaborate nature, which, as far as notation was concerned, was unknown to even so civilised and intellectual a people as the ancient Romans. We must, therefore, be prepared to take a great deal of trouble to render it intelligible to the tender intellect of a child. Intelligence, however, is much assisted when stimulated by interest and curiosity, and you must try to excite these feelings in your pupil.

WE will suppose he has gained a certain readiness in working his little sums, and is able to write down the answers with ease and certainty. Now give him a fresh sum; tell him to add two fives together, and let him write them down in the usual way. He will know from his verbal exercises with you that two fives make ten, and will probably tell you so; very likely adding, "But how am I to write it down; how am I to make a ten?" Tell him that you have shown him how to make all the figures that there are, and ask him what he thinks had better be done under the circumstances. He will very often be sharp enough to guess that you hold the key to the enigma, and will object to puzzling his own brains over the matter. He will "give it up," as children do with a riddle, and tease you for the answer. Don't be disappointed at this result; you must not expect your pupils to be like the young Pascal, who reasoned out the elements of geometry for himself.

YOU may be quite satisfied, if you have roused this interest and secured his attention for your explanation, when you tell him that, as there are no more figures, the only thing to be done is to use the old ones over again; that when you want to write ten you must begin afresh with the figure 1, that it is the custom to put some sign after it to show you have "begun over again," and that then the number must be read, not as one, but as one ten; or, as we generally call it, ten.

Now, ask the child to write down ten. He writes down 1, and perhaps hesitates as to what he shall write after it, for you have not told him anything about the cypher, 0. You must encourage him a little.

"Yes, that is quite right for the ten, but you must put something after it; what shall it be?"

Probably he will write down another 1, feeling it does not commit him to so much as the other numbers might do.

"Yes, that is quite right," you will say; "you have turned that first one into a ten by putting a figure after it; only, you see, you have written a 1 down here, so that whole number means ten and one more. How much would that be?"

"Eleven," answers the child.

"Yes; you see you have written down eleven, ten and one more. Now, I'm going to write down ten, and two more; you know how much that will be."

So you go on with the numbers from eleven to nineteen; sometimes writing them down, and getting the child to read them; sometimes getting him to set down the "ten and six more," or the "ten and eight more."

The child will feel encouraged by finding out that he can write some of the numbers without your telling him how to do it; and then you go back again to the ten, and ask him, "But how will you write ten, and no more?"

Then you can make a nought for him, and tell him that that sign is used to express "no more," and that it is called nought, because, in old-fashioned times, when people had no more things, they were said to have nought.

At last the child will be able to write down ten for himself, and though the process may be a long one for all parties, and a tedious one for my readers, the pupil will probably feel interested in his discovery.

and when you resume work next day, he won't distress you by asking on which side of the one he is to put the nought.

It will now be comparatively easy to make the child see that if 1 with a figure after it means ten, 2 with a figure after it means two tens, or twenty; and by the time you want him to write a hundred, there will be a chance of his being able to discover for himself that, as you have used up all the figures a second time, you must begin with a fresh set, and use three figures. Thousands and tens of thousands will fall naturally into their places, though I should recommend that the child be very gradually introduced to them; and when you do bring them to his notice, try and connect them with some familiar object. For instance, you can take three or four books, let him see how many pages there are in each of them, and then add their numbers together. The ordinary three-volumes novel will often contain about a thousand pages; and if a child liked to count them through, he would get a clearer hold of the meaning of the word "thousand" than by any amount of talking and explanation.

It may be said that all these directions have only brought us a little way—not farther than notation; but, as a matter of fact, you have taught a child a good deal when you have taught him to write down numbers correctly, and when he can read off, say 10004 or 20302, without being puzzled by "the noughts in the middle." Besides, arithmetic is essentially a subject where "ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte." Lay your foundations well, and the rest will come with ease and certainty; whereas, if you once let your pupil start on a wrong plan, you may never be able to set him right again.

A Chinese Doctor.

AN article in the Saturday Review contained a little while ago, among other amusing matter, the following story:

Among the Celestials it is well known that a doctor is paid according to the rapidity with which he effects a cure. The longer he is about it, the less he will get for his trouble. In regard to the preliminary negotiations as to the sum to be paid in the event of recovery, the system of calculation is rather curious and suggestive of a country where mankind has a remarkable value. A tale is told of a missionary in Tong-King, one of whose catechists fell ill. He was not one of the modern class of medical missionaries, and did not trust himself to prescribe for his convert. Accordingly he called in an Annamese physician. It may be remarked, by the way, that this was one of the most astonishing instances of humility on record. The ordinary European would as soon trust an Indo-Chinese doctor, as he would take to snake-charming. However, this missionary not only summoned the sayah, but bargained with him in the regulation way as to the fee to be paid. The doctor, after the usual preliminaries—the feeling of the pulse, and the inconsequent interrogatories, whether the sick man was married, and if he had any children, whether he had ever been in China, why the Christian religion did not enjoin the worship of deceased ancestors, and so on—declared that he was ready to set the patient on his legs again. If his subject had been younger, he could not have consented to cure him for less than one hundred sapeques, but seeing that he was a dried-up old atomy of nearly sixty, he would not demand more than twenty, for when the man was cured, he was not much use. This was an agreeable view of the question for the missionary funds, and a bargain was struck immediately.

It is satisfactory to hear that the doctor restored his man to health, and got his stipulated fee.

Imitation Ground-Glass Engraving.

THERE is a very simple way of producing all the clear and pretty effect of ground-glass engraving on lamp-globes and similar articles at a nominal cost; the outlay merely consists in the purchase of a bottle of varnish and a soft penny brush. White spirit varnish is the best for this purpose, although copal will do very well, but the spirit looks clearest when laid on. This varnish does not look quite white when in the bottle, but in working it will be found to be quite sufficiently so.

It must be premised that any one attempting to decorate ground-glass must know something of designing—colouring he need not be an adept in, as colouring is not required, but he must have an accurate eye and hand, as every touch of the varnish tells, and cannot easily be removed; turpentine will wash off a mistake if applied directly, but it is apt to run into the rest of the design and spoil the whole, so it is best to avoid a mistake altogether.

THIS art, then, merely consists in painting on the rough side of the glass with a brush dipped in varnish; this is all the process, and to one accustomed to drawing is most quickly done; the varnish soon dries and the globe may be used again at once. In working do not use too much varnish, but lay it on evenly, having a good pointed brush that can be easily guided; one coat is quite sufficient. You will observe that directly you touch the glass with varnish its opaqueness becomes clear and transparent. It is as well not to wash such a globe too often, but when it requires it—as gas globes, especially, frequently do—no difficulty need be apprehended, for the varnish will not wash off or become in any way injured if the water is only slightly warm, such as is generally used for washing glass in.

PATTERNS or designs will suggest themselves to the artist, but we may mention that such a simple design as a few marguerites formed in a careless wreath looks extremely pretty round a globe, and would be a good subject for a first attempt.

PANES of ground-glass such as we often find in hall-doors or staircase-windows may just as easily be decorated, only, as the surface in this case is a fixed perpendicular one, more care is needed in applying the varnish. Unless brushed on very lightly it is sure to run down the pane, or at least when dry be found to have accumulated in a little lump at the bottom of each petal, or whatever the design is; with a small amount of practice, however, this defect can be easily avoided, and panes otherwise stupid and monotonous may be made to become quite an ornament to the house.

It is perhaps superfluous to remark—as no one who lays claim to artistic work would do so in any case—that no previous outline should be drawn either with a pencil or anything else; the marking could never be got out again when once varnished, and the whole effect of engraving would be spoilt. For those who cannot possibly manage a design without some guiding outline, let said design be accurately cut out of white or coloured paper and stuck on to the back of the glass, so as to show through. For a strictly conventional pattern this is not for anyone a bad plan, as to keep regular curves, lines, etc., exactly like one another without a guide is difficult even to a practised hand. The pattern can easily be washed off again when the painting is finished. It is best to use a mahl-stick when painting on the perpendicular surface. Few people possess a hand sufficiently steady to do without this, and if the delicate lines are not drawn firmly, a very home-made effect is produced.

WE should recommend that before attempting one of the staircase-windows or even the lamp-globes, our imitation ground-glass engraver should take some practice on any broken pieces of ground-glass he may find about; those from a child's drawing-slate would be just the thing to try on, or any hopelessly cracked lamp globe. If washed with turpentine directly the varnish is applied the design can be taken off clean, the piece of glass wiped dry, and it will be all ready for more practice. This mode of commencing, except to an acknowledged expert, will be found to be good advice, since it will save the artist the humiliation of being informed that his gummy experiments have made the hall-windows unfit to be seen, and he must send for a glazier!

To keep the brushes in good order, always, after using, cleanse them with turpentine and then wash with hot water and soap. A little soda may be used with advantage.

A French Duellist.

ONE of the most notorious of French duellists at the period of the restoration of the Bourbons in 1815, when scarcely a day passed without a hostile meeting, was the Count de Larillière, a native of Bordeaux. At the time of this story he was a man of about thirty-five, tall, well-made, and with polished manners; his appearance, indeed, utterly belying the reckless life he was in the habit of leading. One day, as he was walking with a friend in the principal street of Bordeaux, he saw approaching them, on the same side of the way, one of the richest and most respected merchants of the town, with his newly-married wife on his arm. Larillière advanced towards them, hat in hand, and with all the outward semblance of a well-bred man about to make a speech of more than ordinary politeness. "I beg your pardon," said he, addressing himself to the merchant, who, with his wife, had abruptly halted, "but I have just made a bet with my friend, whom I have the honour of presenting to you"—here he introduced his friend in due form—"that I will kiss your wife on your arm"—the merchant, knowing the count's character and reputation, here became ghastly pale—"after having first given you a box on the ear." Saying this, the miscreant stared impudently in the face of the amazed merchant, and, spite of all the resistance he could offer, put both threats in immediate execution. A challenge and a meeting followed, which resulted in the injured party receiving his death-wound, and the aggressor going forth in search of new victims.

In course of time, Larillière had fought upwards of forty duels, and was able to boast of having killed no fewer than eleven individuals. He was now bent upon making up his dozen, after which he proposed to rest, and continue his practice with the new cavalry sabre, to which he had taken a strong fancy. This laudable desire was not destined to be realised, for he was himself killed in a duel, under strange circumstances, a few days after the death of his eleventh and last victim.

On the evening of a masked ball at the Grand Theatre at Bordeaux, Larillière was seated in the adjoining café. It was about eleven o'clock, and the count, not being in a very quarrelsome humour, was occupied in peacefully imbibing a glass of punch. Suddenly, a tall young man, wearing a black domino and black velvet mask, entered the room and strode up to the table at which the formidable count was quietly seated.

No particular notice was at first taken of the new comer, but no sooner was he observed to be in the close vicinity of Larillière's table, than all eyes were attracted towards him. Without a single preliminary observation, he seized hold of the count's glass, threw away the punch it contained, and ordered the waiter, in a loud voice, to bring a small bottle of orgeat in its place.

Witnesses of the scene say that at this moment, for the first time in their lives, they saw that Larillière had turned pale. It was the common belief in Bordeaux that during all the years this man had been applying himself to the work of destruction, he had never once allowed his countenance to betray the slightest emotion. "Scoundrel!" he exclaimed, "you do not know who I am," at the same time making a vigorous but unsuccessful effort to remove the stranger's mask.

"I know who you are perfectly well," coldly replied the unknown, forcing Larillière violently back into his seat. All present started to their feet, and, without venturing to interfere, anxiously waited the issue of this strange provocation.

"Waiter," exclaimed the stranger, "be quick with that bottle of orgeat." At this second command the bottle was brought, and the masked man, drawing a pistol from his pocket, proceeded to address his adversary thus:

"Unless in the presence of this company and for my own personal satisfaction, you at once swallow this glass of orgeat, I will blow your brains out with less compunction than I would those of a dog. Should you, however, comply with my bidding, I will do you the honour of fighting you to-morrow morning."

"With the sabre?" demanded Larillière, convulsed with rage.

"With what weapon you please," replied the stranger disdainfully.

Whereupon the count swallowed the orgeat, every one present preserving a death-like silence.

The masked man, satisfied with the result, now retired, saying in a tone of voice loud enough to be heard by all in the room:

"To-day I have humbled you sufficiently; to-morrow I intend to take your life. My seconds will wait on you at eight o'clock in the morning. We will fight on the spot where you killed the young Chevalier de C—." This was the name of the count's last victim.

The following morning Larillière found himself in the presence of a man, no longer wearing a mask, and who appeared to be some twenty-five years old, and of calm and dignified but singularly resolute bearing. His seconds were two private soldiers belonging to one of the regiments of the garrison. They had brought weapons with them, but Larillière's seconds took exception to them, at which a scarcely perceptible smile passed over the stranger's face.

On taking his position, Larillière turned towards his seconds and said in a low tone: "For once I believe I've found my equal."

The combat commenced, and at the first passes, the count was convinced that he had to deal with a skilful antagonist. However, his courage did not fail him, though at times he seemed to lose somewhat of his customary composure. Lunges and parryings succeeded each other with rapidity on both sides. Larillière had already tried his usually fatal finishing thrust more than once, but each time only to find his effort turned aside by his adversary's blade. Harassed at finding his efforts unavailing, he insolently remarked to his opponent: "Well, sir, at what hour do you intend to kill me?"

A momentary silence ensued. Then the stranger, who seemed to have profited by that slight interval to assure himself that the advantage lay decidedly with him, quietly replied, "Immediately," and rushing forward thrust the point of his sword through his adversary, who sprang backwards, tottered, and sank into the arms of his nearest second. Putting his right hand on the wound, the count was just able to say: "That, sir, is not a sabre cut, it is a thrust with the point—with the sabre I feared no one," and in a few moments he fell back dead.

The stranger now advanced politely towards the seconds of the man he had slain, and enquired if he was at liberty to depart.

"Will you at least tell us your name?" asked they in reply.

Larillière's opponent proved to be one of the young officers at Blaye, who had determined to avenge the murder, as he considered it, of the count's last victim. When the fact of Larillière's death became generally known at Bordeaux, many mothers of families actually had masses said, in thankfulness for having been delivered from so dreaded a scourge.

alterations may also be required in many gardens; and it is quite certain there are numbers of plots attached to new dwellings out of which gardens have to be made. This is apparent at a glance round the borders of nearly all cities and towns, where fresh fields are ever being invaded by the builder, and rough and barren plots require to be made smooth and fertile, for a home nowadays is not considered worthy of its name without a garden.

DRAINING GARDENS.

Both in the formation of new gardens and the renovation of old ones, it is most important to make provision for the free passage through the soil of superfluous water. It is not always possible to drain gardens effectively, for it is no use digging trenches and placing in pipes for taking the water away unless there are outlets for it into a deep existing drain, or where such can be conveniently made; but these outlets provided, no work can be more profitable, where the soil is naturally wet, than that conducted with the object of relieving it of the water with which it is saturated.

WATER-LOGGED SOIL.

Nothing is more certain than the fact that hundreds of persons are quite unable to determine whether their gardens need draining or not. It is also a fact that gardens innumerable are practically ruined by the want of drainage.

Where moss abounds on walks, lawns, and the branches of trees in such quantity as to be unsightly, and where the growths of fruit-trees canker and the shoots decay, there can be little doubt that the ground needs draining, and a few trenches cut and pipes laid in them would be far more potent in effecting improvement than any amount of money expended in manure.

In ground intended for gardens, but not yet prepared, the question of drainage can be determined by digging a few holes here and there to the depth of two feet, and leaving them open for a week or two, placing a little soil round them to prevent surface water running in. If water then collects in these miniature trial wells, it will show that the land is too wet to be fertile, and the first work that is done should be to conduct it away.

MAKING DRAINS.

The first point to determine is the depth that these should be made, and this depends on the crops that are desired to be grown. In making a walk dry and comfortable, a drain a foot deep under it will suffice; the same depth will also answer for draining ground for a new lawn, or for removing stagnant water from a lawn already existing, and which is soft, mossy, and unsatisfactory. Ground generally that is devoted to or intended for the cultivation of ordinary vegetable crops and flowers should be drained at least two feet deep, while that intended for or occupied with Roses, shrubs, or fruit-trees, should be drained from three to four feet deep.

PIPES FOR DRAINS.

For shallow drains two-inch pipes will answer, but they should be a little larger for burying deeper. In all cases they must be laid on a uniformly firm base, having a slight incline. This is imperative, as if the base is unequal in firmness, in one place hard and in another loose or soft, the pipes in the latter part will inevitably sink, and the drain be rendered worthless. By inattention to this simple but very important matter much money has been wasted in the work in question.

DRAINING WITH RUBBLE.

Where ground is not very wet, and deep drainage is not required, and at the same time where it is necessary to work economically, much good may be done by digging out trenches, and half-filling them with clinkers, ashes, stones, or hard rubble of any kind, spreading on this a layer of shavings, small sticks, or even straight straw, then levelling in the soil again. This, furthermore, is often a convenient mode of disposing of such matter which is unsightly in heaps and when there are no ready means of otherwise getting rid of it; bury it in the manner indicated, and it will have the same effect on the soil above it as the drainage in a flower-pot has on the compost provided for the sustenance of the plant.

Where the ground is very wet, shallow drains may be eight feet apart, deep drains twice that distance; and if the work is well done, and the water can pass away freely, improvement is sure to follow, as the soil will be rendered decidedly more fertile and distinctly warmer than before, for the heat from the sun cannot penetrate soddened soil; therefore, in making new gardens and improving old ones, let the subject of drainage have the first attention.

ARRANGING AND REMODELLING GARDENS.

Where a new garden is being made the arrangement of the surface becomes a matter for serious consideration. No strict rule can be laid down for conducting the work, as different owners or occupiers have different tastes, and each has a right to gratify them within certain limits, the most important being the avoidance of planting trees that may overhang a neighbour's garden, as, in such a case, the neighbour has a right to cut them, and unpleasantness often follows. Some persons like a perfectly even surface, others prefer undulating ground, while others again like examples of both. Then the question of walks and paths is important, and as regards these, individual preferences must not be ignored. One person likes the walks perfectly straight, another covets serpentine paths. Either or both may be had,

Household Gardening.

FROM the present time onwards, throughout the winter months, work in gardens will be of a more or less heavy character, such as digging and trenching the land preparatory to its satisfactory and productive cropping another year. As has been previously intimated, and the nature of the plot will usually suggest the most appropriate. Let us look a little more closely into the subjects of ground arrangement and walk formation.

GARDEN PATHS AND EDGINGS.

Walks or paths demand the first consideration in making a garden, and their width and disposition must be governed by the size of the enclosure. As a rule the walks should be straight in all gardens that are not more than twenty feet wide. In such a strip as that indicated, a path two and a half feet wide, taken all round at that distance from the fence, will be the most satisfactory and economical method of arrangement, as it affords a narrow border all round for Roses or fruit-trees to be trained to the fence, and also for flowers, while there will be a bed ten feet wide down the centre for growing what may be most desired—flowers, fruits, or vegetables, or all three if the length suffices.

In gardens that exceed the width stated, the walks may be proportionately wider, and, if desired, they may be formed in a series of graceful curves; the outside border will then naturally vary in width, and afford the more scope for the exercise of taste in planting.

In making a walk it is always desirable to dig out the best soil and spread it on the borders, as this makes them deeper and better, while the excavation affords a convenient receptacle for broken bricks, stones, pots, clinkers, or any hard matter of that kind, and this, surfaced with an inch or two of gravel, makes a hard, dry, and comfortable path.

EDGINGS FOR WALKS.

The best of all are formed with hard-burnt tiles which are manufactured for the purpose, and made in various patterns; for a serpentine walk the cable pattern is very appropriate, but much less so when the path is straight. These tiles make the most neat and durable of all edgings, but are too costly for many occupiers of gardens.

The cheapest edgings of all are strips of deal, an inch wide and three inches deep, secured firmly to stakes driven into the ground at suitable intervals. If the wood is well painted on the portion within the ground, these plain edgings will last for years.

PLANTS FOR EDGINGS.

Many persons prefer a living to a dead margin to their paths. The Dwarf Dutch Box-edging is a general favourite, and, if kept in good condition by trimming yearly, is extremely neat; but if plants that are growing in the borders are permitted to overhang, the Box will soon become patchy and unsightly. Nor does this popular edging-plant last for many years if the soil is quite destitute of lime.

The dwarf grassy-leaved plant, popularly known as Thrift (Armeria), is excellent in forming fresh green margins. It is studded in summer with pink double-daisy-like flowers, and has the valuable property of growing well in town gardens. Thrift is a very accommodating, homely plant, and has many admirers.

London Pride (Saxifraga sarmentosa) is another dwarf edging-plant that will grow almost anywhere, even in the most smoky districts, and it produces in summer thousands of small, star-like, pinky-white flowers. For town gardens it is the best of all plants for the purpose in question, and rooted offsets inserted an inch apart will soon spread and form a close row that will last for a lifetime, if not overgrown by stronger plants established too near it in the border.

The subject of edgings is one of the most perplexing to amateurs, hence our hints will be useful to many at the time when work of the kind under notice can be successfully accomplished.

WINDOW PLANTS.

Special attention is requisite now, both as regards watering and cleanliness. Such favourites as Geraniums, Fuchsias, Cactuses, and succulent plants generally must be kept dry; while others that are flowering, or approaching that stage, must be watered judiciously. The foliage of these must never droop, or a serious check to growth will be given. Every decayed leaf should be promptly removed, whenever it is seen, and large leaves, such as those of Indiarubber-plants will be greatly improved by being carefully rubbed with a damp sponge once a week. This should be done towards midday, in order that the foliage may have time to dry before night.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.

4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

A. K.—Apply at the Trade Marks Registry Office, 25, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

DAME DURDEN.—1. Only by the use of phosphor paste, or other of the poisons, to be had at any oil-shop. 2. The Palais Royal is famous for imitation jewellery. See "Dickens's Dictionary of Paris" for interesting particulars. 3. The failure of sight being a misfortune, and having occurred whilst the girl was in your service, we think you should pay the month's wages.

F. A.—"The Boatswain's Song" would exactly suit you. It is published by Stanley Lucas. Also you might get "The Diver," and "Tis Thor's Day."

FLORENTIA.—Staining wicker-work is rarely satisfactory. Paint the chairs with Japan-black, such as is used by coachmakers; no varnish is required. Work carefully, the paint not too thick, or it will clog the crevices of the basket-work. Japan-black can be had at the oil-shops, and costs about 1s. 6d. a pint.

GRPSY.—"Enid," by Walter Macfarren; "Two Tarantelles," by the same composer, one in G and one in F; "The Shepherd Boy's Song" by Wilson; "The Mexican Serenade," by O. Langey; "Cynthia—A Right Merrie Dance," and "Danse Javouri." All these are pretty, light pieces, and sure to be liked. Amongst short classical pieces, there is a Gavotte by Bach, known as the one so much played by Agnes Zimmerman; Serenade in F, by Sterndale Bennett; and Gavotte from "Mignon," published by Schott and Co., 159, Regent Street. H. Stanislaus' compositions are thought very well of by the musical profession. 2. We do not see what there is in the text you mention which requires explanation. We suppose that stress is laid on the exact way the clothes were folded, so as to show that it was the work of a living person and not of a spirit. 3. Pronounce as if spelt Book-a-rest. 4. The Corraline Corsets ought to wear well, as they are made on a very good principle. The Corraline bones give to the figure, and do not snap like whalebone.

JOHN R. W. (Philadelphia).—W. M., writing from Nicolaieff, South Russia, kindly sends the following particulars respecting the poem, "The Nautilus and the Ammonite": "It is in the appendix to the second series of Frank Buckland's 'Curiosities of Natural History,' people's edition, page 337, and there stated to be taken from 'Richardson's Geology.'"

PERPLEXED.—1. We cannot undertake any such task. 2. Lobster-salad is generally handed round alone, as an entrée; having fish in it, it should be eaten alone. Ordinary salad is handed round with the roast. Crescent salad-plates are generally used; failing these, pudding-plates are the best substitute. 3. There is a monthly publication called "Book of Crests," price 2s. We know of no other specially devoted to the subjects you mention. 4. Some lilacs never bloom, and it is better to root them up and replace them with suckers from a flowering shrub. 5. Cotonaster is easily propagated by root divisions, i.e. by dividing the plant at the root. Weiglia rosea we have propagated by cuttings after flowering, set under a bell-glass on a moderately warm hot-bed, also by suckers at the root. 6. Pyrus Japonica will grow well by seed in heat, or by cuttings treated as above. Layering requires a small incision to be made in the stem layered next to the ground. Both Weiglia and Pyrus J. will layer, but are not certain.

TOFF.—"Routledge's Comic Reciter" contains a very good selection of pieces which would be suitable for a high-class entertainment.

TRY.—A correspondent kindly sends the following answers to your questions: "1. A fresh tongue steamed in a Captain Warren's cooking-pot till perfectly tender, no steam allowed to get to it, is delicious. All round the tongue on the tin plate should be placed herbs, a fagot of the usual savoury ones, and twenty minutes before the tongue is done put eight tomatoes, stalked, seasoned, and a small piece of butter inserted in each. The herbs must be removed before the tomatoes are put in. Skin the tongue and serve on a dish, with tomatoes dressed as follows: Choose as nearly same size as possible, plunge one minute in boiling water, remove the skin, and cut out a round piece from the stalk end, season with pepper and salt, with an egg-spoon remove the pipe, fill up with forcemeat, and spread it thinly, like a paste, over each tomato. Cover them with fine raspings, and fry in oil for eight minutes over a good fire, or bake ten minutes, and brown with a salamander. 2. The best time for potting butter is a few weeks after the cows have been turned out to grass in the early part of the year. When they are first turned out, the butter is generally strong, and does not keep well. The butter should be cleansed from the buttermilk thoroughly, but not washed, and should, if possible, be of the same churning; for each separate potting salt the butter as usual, and to each pound of butter put half a quarter of an ounce of bicarbonate of soda powdered and mixed with the salt. Press the butter into well-scalded wooden tubs, highly glazed jars, or glass pots, and cover with bladder. The quantity in each should vary according to the needs of the family, as it is better not to have a pot opened too long. Two-pound jars are a useful size."

ZENOBIA.—1. You offer your left arm to a lady, so as to leave your right arm free to protect her if occasion should arise. At dinner she sits at your right hand. 2. See answer to Leonora. 3. "Sunshine and Rain," by Blumenthal, in G; "Kismet," by Molloy, in E flat; and "The Romany Lass," by Stephen Adams, in A flat. These three songs are in exactly the compass you require, and are all published by Boosey and Co., 295, Regent Street. There is also a charming tenor song called, "Tom Waiting," which will suit you if you get it in the lowest key it is published in. 4. We should think either "Blackwood," "Temple Bar," or "Longman's Magazine" would answer the purpose you require. 5. If you wear dress-clothes, of course you wear gloves. 6. There is only one kind of gas that does not affect flowers, and that is called the "Chamberlain light." With ordinary gas, you must take the flowers out of the room directly it is lighted, or you will never save them. 7. With regard to your deafness, we think you should at once consult a specialist. Deafness increases if neglected.

Puzzles for Prizes.

RULES.

1. Answers should be written on one side of the paper only, and should be posted so as to reach the office, 24, Great New Street, Fetter Lane, E.C., by the first delivery on the Tuesday after date of publication. Envelopes must be addressed, "The Puzzle Editor," and each answer must bear the nom de plume of the writer legibly written on the top of the first sheet.

2. A First Prize of TEN SHILLINGS and a Second Prize of FIVE SHILLINGS will be awarded each week to the best and second-best answers respectively to the two Puzzles set. The Puzzle Editor reserves, however, the right of withholding either the First or Second Prize, or both, if, in his opinion, the answers received should not come up to the required standard of merit.

3. No winner of a First Prize will be eligible for another Prize during the same quarter. A winner of a Second Prize will be eligible for another Second Prize in the same quarter, but not for a First Prize.

4. Every Prize-winner must consent to send his or her name and address for publication.

5. The Puzzle Editor's decision is to be taken as final.

PUZZLES.

1. A Parody.

Write Parody of Hood's "Bridge of Sighs." In writing parodies, the object is to keep as close as possible to the sound of the original while conveying a different meaning; and Hood's poem is one which easily lends itself to this treatment. Any subject may be chosen by the parodists; but the verses sent should not exceed thirty lines in length.

2. A Literary Puzzle.

Give the names of the poems from which the following lines are taken:

"Sad is my fate said the heart-broken stranger."
 "Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride."
 "Old times were changed, old manners gone,
 A stranger filled the Stuarts' throne."
 "Open the temple-gates unto my love."
 "I see before me the gladiator lie."
 "Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness."
 "Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is."

Prize Winners in No. 134.

1st Prize, 10s., "One and All."

2nd Prize, 5s., "Froggie" (Miss Constance Gillespie, Wildcroft, Putney Heath).

"One and All" is requested to send name and address.

FIVE METAGRAMS.

1. I am a word of letters five,
 And should the keynote be
 Of every act and word in life,
 As when you've guessed you'll see.
 Change but a letter and you'll find
 What is too often used,
 To settle points whereby the weak,
 Are cheated and abused.
 Another change; what schoolboys love
 And Quakers hate, behold;
 Each page of history, old and new,
 Fresh tales of this unfold.
 Replace my head once more, and you
 A blessing will decry,
 Without whose aid fair Nature's charms
 Would all unheeded lie.
 One final change of head, and that,
 The gift I named e'en now,
 Would useless be without this last,
 I'm sure you will allow.
Right, might, fight, sight, light.
2. Four letters are but few to represent
 One-third of all this mighty world of ours;
 Yet well they play their part, no more we need
 To say where cities stand, where grow the flowers.
 One letter changed, a thing without whose aid
 No city e'er was built, no battle fought,
 Will by that man be easily divined,
 Who answers this my riddle as he ought.
 Now wet, now dry, now soft, now hard and firm,
 Shifting and changing, yet a playroom dear,
 Where children gambol, and the maiden dreams,
 My head transposed, this clearly will appear.
 Once more bestow on me initial new,
 The nuisance of each seaport town you see,
 Although the little ones, and nursemaids too,
 Perchance in this may not agree.
Land, hand, sand, band.
3. Please take a word of letters five,
 Untouched and undisturbed,
 Leave the last four, but change the first,
 By turns to make each word.
 A baby mountain, if we may,
 By great names small things call,
 A friend of man, whose faithfulness
 Has seldom had a fall.
 An emblem of eternity,
 That ends not nor begins,
 A breath, a moan, a whisper,
 Sweetest strains, or rudest din.
 And if these will not content you,
 A word all men fain would say,
 Who seek for what escapeth
 Their researches day by day.
Mound, hound, round, sound, found.

4. Three letters stand, but one we change,
 Enough to make the meanings range
 (Of the five words, which thus are found),
 O'er a wide range of sense and sound.
 A right joyous friend to the young and gay,
 But the foe of old age and sad decay;
 A curse to mankind, but a blessing too;
 Say which of the twain shall it be to you?
 A place of safety and shelter sweet,
 Where the lamb lies down at the shepherd's feet;
 "Do tell me a story!" the children cry—
 The past of this verb you may now decry.
 What I hope neither you nor yours may be,
 Tho' a ripe old age you should live to see.
Cold, gold, fold, told, sold.

5. These letters four
 With each new head,
 May well as follows
 Right be read.
 The rich, they eat me
 Every day;
 The poor, but seldom,
 So they say.
 Men fight for me
 By word and speech,
 And stick to me
 Fast as a leech.
 If you could walk
 The world round 'bout,
 You would do me
 Without a doubt.
Meat, seat, peat, feat.

ONE AND ALL.

1. I am a word of letters six,
 And oft a sorry mess,
 But change my head, and now behold
 A mildew, I confess.
 Alter again, and you will find
 Departure all in haste,
 Or if you like a change once more,
 Neglect we often taste.
Flight, blight, night, slight.
2. You'll find me difficult, I fear,
 And so I'll change my head;
 Now a district in a town appear,
 Or part of lock instead.
 New head again, a poet I,
 Or if you like it best,
 And yet another change you'll try,
 A pasteboard stands confest.
 A different head, and you will see
 A sort of fat am I;
 Or change again, I'll guarantee
 "A scented plant" you'll cry.
Hard, bard, card, lard, nard.
3. My whole means to tighten up well,
 Or a double, may be;
 Fresh head me, and soon it will spell
 That a mark you can see;
 Again, I am one, truth to tell
 Of a most charming three.
Brace, trace, grace.
4. Change your head each time
 You begin a new line,
 You'll soon find the rhyme,
 And the answer's—"divine."
  1. The front of an army am I;
  2. To be this, all boys try.
  3. Now I'm the name of a brother;
  4. Used in summer by mother.
  5. The god of the shepherds of old;
  6. Edict shuts out in the cold.
  7. This is vessel for containing;
  8. How I went when 'twas raining.

1. Van; 2. Man; 3. Dan; 4. Fan; 5. Pan; 6. Ban; 7. Can; 8. Ran.

5. I am a part of a ship, 'tis true,
 Until you shall change my head;
 Then, when you've done as I bid you do,
 You'll find me enormous instead.
 Alter once more, I am thrown away,
 Yet again, the shoemaker's aid;
 And a final change that you may say,
 "As tight as it well can be made."
Nast, vast, cast, last, fast.

FROGGIE.

The Metagrams of Vincentius and Zorilla rank next in merit to those sent by the Prize Winners. Vincentius would have been awarded the First Prize if he had given more explicit directions as to the solving of his Puzzles. The incident described in the Historical Mental Picture was the relief of the town of Tergoes by the Spanish veteran Mondragon, and took place in the year 1572. The event is described at length by Motley in his "Rise of the Dutch Republic."

OUT OF THE RUNNING.—The following Prize-Winners come under the conditions of Rule 3, for thirteen weeks from the date of the Number in which they gained a Prize: No. 123.—1st Prize, "Zyx"; 2nd Prize, "Comus." No. 124.—1st Prize, "Ferdinando"; 2nd Prize, "Ambrosia." No. 125.—Equal Prizes, "Frensham," "Ryland," "Malblume." No. 126.—1st Prize, "Hookwood"; 2nd Prize, "L. C. L." No. 127.—1st Prize, "Manhattan"; 2nd Prize, "Malblume." No. 128.—1st Prize, "Irish Exile"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 129.—Equal Prizes, "Abracadabra," "Acacia," "Ethel May." No. 130.—1st Prize, "The Arabs"; 2nd Prize, "Alice." No. 132.—1st Prize, "Atlas"; 2nd Prize, "Ethel May." No. 133.—1st Prize, "Syd Gardnor"; 2nd Prize, "Medway." No. 134.—1st Prize, "One and All"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie."

Answers have also been received from—Apollo, Bok, Canada, Ella, E. B., Emma Jane, Gabrielle, J., Jacky J., John Streaks, Lance, Mona, Mary, Nettie, Pericardium, Stella, Tarradiddle, Vernon de Montgomery, Vincentius, Warwickshire Lass, Yorkshirer, Zigzag, Zorilla.

Answers to Puzzles in No. 133 received too late from Old Jib, Rome, J. Dark, Jacky J., Rima.

Odds and Ends.

"I WAS present at her Majesty's coronation in Westminster Abbey," said Campbell, "and she conducted herself so well during the long and fatiguing ceremony that I shed tears many times. On returning home, out of pure esteem and veneration, I decided to send her a copy of all my works. Accordingly I had them bound up, and went personally with them to Sir Henry Wheatley, who, when he understood my errand, told me that her Majesty made it a rule to decline presents of this kind, as it placed her under obligations which were unpleasant to her. 'Say to her Majesty, Sir Henry,' I replied, 'that there is not a single thing the Queen can touch with her sceptre in any of her dominions which I covet; and I, therefore, entreat you, in your office, to present them with my devotion as a subject.' Sir Henry then promised to comply with my request; but next day they were returned. I hesitated to open the parcel, but on doing so, I found to my inexpressible joy a note enclosed desiring my autograph in them. Having complied with the wish, I again transmitted the books to her Majesty, and in the course of a day or two received in return an elegant engraving, with her Majesty's autograph."

AMONGST no class of people does gambling prevail with more fatal effects than the Chinese. The intensity with which these people will play game after game, staking every possible thing, is wonderful. A recent writer on China gives information which, did we not know the character of the people, would be set down as incredulous. They play not only for their furniture, their clothing, and their pig-tails, in which latter they place so much pride, but for their fingers. A small hatchet and a pot of boiling oil is set on the table, so that when the finger is severed from the hand it can be plunged into the oil and the bleeding stopped. Then the game is continued as before.

How Lord Kinsale acquired the right of wearing his hat in the royal presence was as follows: King John and Philip II. of France agreed to settle a dispute respecting the Duchy of Normandy by single combat. John de Courcy, Earl of Ulster, was the English champion, and no sooner put in his appearance than the French champion put spurs to his horse and fled. The king asked the earl what reward should be given him, and he replied: "Titles and lands I want not; of these I have enough; but in remembrance of this day I beg the boon for myself and successors to remain covered in the presence of your highness and all future sovereigns of the realm."

A VENERABLE Bedford gentleman had never read Shakespeare's plays, and was advised to do so during the winter. In the spring the giver of the advice casually asked if he had read any of the plays. Yes, he had read them all. "Do you like them?" ventured G—, feeling his way anxiously for an opinion. "Like them!" replied the old man, with effusive ardour; "that is not the word, sir. They are glorious, sir; far beyond my expectations. There are not twenty men in Bedford, sir, who could have written those plays!"

NOTES from parents: "Please excuse my boy on Friday being absent as is to be expected as he was buried and it will not occur again." "Please inter my to boys in your skull," was a note recently sent on a Monday morning to a Board schoolmaster in Greenwich. A teacher who had been diligent in teaching animal physiology, received the following from the mother of one of the scholars: "Please do not learn my little girl no more about her inside, because it does her no good and is rude."

SIR FRANCIS BURDETT's liveries were light blue and silver; Lord Alvanley's were the same. His lordship said to Burdett one day: "We're always mistaken for each other; couldn't we hit on a way to prevent it?" "I am willing," replied the baronet, "if I only knew how." "Then I'll tell you," said Alvanley. "Make your people follow your example, and turn their coats; that will do it."

STATISTICS state that there are two million widows in the German empire. It has heretofore been understood that young men leave Germany for this country in order to escape compulsory military service, but after reading the foregoing statement we are in possession of a much better reason for their emigration.

SCENE: Country road; two young women, who are walking, pass the parish doctor. First Young Woman: "That was Dr. Richard. They say he's got an awful wealthy wife." Second Young Woman: "Oo, ay! He married the money, and asked the wife to the wedding."

A PRUDENT man advised his drunken servant to put by his money for a rainy day. In a few weeks his master enquired how much money he had saved. "Faith, none at all," said he; "it rained yesterday, and it all went."

"My dear," said a fond wife, "when we were engaged I always slept with your last letter under my pillow." "And I," murmured her husband, "I often went to sleep over your letters."

"WHAT is the effect of the moon on the tide?" asked the teacher. And the Lewes schoolboy answered that it depended upon what was tied. If it was a dog, it made him howl.

AN extraordinary marriage has taken place in New York, the chief features of which seem to be that the bridegroom was a slim youth of twenty years, who weighs one hundred and twenty pounds, and the bride, a professional fat woman, aged sixteen years, turned the scale at thirty-six stone thirteen pounds. The bride, a New York paper says, wore a red silk dress, a large gold chain, diamond earrings, pink stockings, and a profusion of white flowers in her hair and upon her breast. The marriage took place in a public hall, the charge for admission being ten cents. To add clat to the ceremony, the clergyman who performed it, an ex-army-chaplain, came to the building in a state of joyous intoxication, and swore more oaths than he pronounced benedictions. The building was crowded to suffocation by an excited mob, which, in spite of the presence of several policemen, interrupted the ceremony with hisses, groans, and laughter. The proceedings were wound up by the bride being presented with a gold chain a yard long, a cheque for two hundred dollars, and a basket of flowers, with the inscription: "May your shadow never grow less!"

ETIQUETTE in Tunis requires that the man who is to succeed the ruler should be completely ignored. No minister or state officer could visit him or communicate with him without running the risk of losing his office or of being exiled. Even the representatives of foreign governments may not visit the heir, and personally he is quite unknown to them. For a native to show him any mark of attention would be high treason, and such act by a foreign consul would be regarded as evincing a want of respect for the bey, every manifestation of regard for the heir being tantamount to an intentional allusion to the transitory power of the regent and to his eventual death.

AN eminent special pleader was at the theatre, seeing the play of "Macbeth." In the scene where Macbeth, questioning the witches in the cavern, says, "What is't you do?" they answer, "A deed without a name." This phrase struck the ears of the special pleader much more forcibly than the most energetic passage of the play, and he immediately remarked to a friend, "Why, then, it's void."

A PRYING sort of an individual has discovered that the oyster has a trunk. Such a receptacle may be necessary from the fact that the oyster spends the summer by the seaside; but if the bivalve wants to put on as many airs as the fashionable young lady, it must also have a big band-box and a pug-dog.

The Sorrowful Sisters.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

ONE spring morning, many years ago, I sat alone in a railway-carriage, about to make my first essay at independence. My sister stood at the window waiting to say farewell at the last moment.

A porter came along, closing the doors. On hearing his "Now, ladies," quite near, she kissed me, and said anxiously:

"If you are not quite happy, be sure and come back."

"Yes, Helen—come home again," said my aunt.

I looked at them as cheerfully as I could, intending to assure them that I should be happy, but my heart sank a little as I lost sight of their dear faces, and felt that I was really starting on a life without them.

My father had been dead six months, my mother many years. As there was no provision for my sister and myself, we went at his death to his sister; but our aunt was a widow, and not wealthy, and it would have been a tax upon her to provide for us both. So I determined to earn my own living.

It was reasonable that my sister should remain with her, because a companion would add to her comfort, but I was simply an encumbrance.

Being weak in music and languages, I determined not to try to be a governess, and gladly accepted a situation brought to my notice by a friend, and was now on my way to become assistant to some middle-aged sisters, who kept a Berlin-wool and fancy shop in a country village. And I was resolved to give them satisfaction, if it was possible to do so by any amount of willingness and patience.

At the country station I got into an omnibus that in about ten minutes put me and my luggage down at the private door of The Bazaar, as the Misses Baxters' shop was called. The door was opened by a scared-looking woman with a black bonnet on, who, without a word, ran away, leaving me standing in the little passage.

Presently a tall stern-looking woman came towards me, saying in a hard voice:

"So you are come, Miss Raymond; I hope you had a pleasant journey. Come upstairs, you may like to wash your hands; dinner will soon be ready."

"Nurse Hamlen," she continued, turning to the person who seemed to me unmistakably a charwoman, "bring up Miss Raymond's boxes shortly."

Near the top of the stairs we turned off into a room over the kitchen that was to be mine. It was clean and neat, and I saw with delight that the window was at the end, and looked over gardens and country.

"It is a comfortable room," said my companion severely, as if I were making complaint.

"Yes," I said; "the view is very pretty."

"Oh, the view is very well," she said with contempt; "I was thinking of the bed and the carpet. I am not sentimental."

"It is very nice, thank you," I answered, trying to rally my failing courage.

"That is well; for I do not see my way to make it better. It is well to begin as we mean to go on, and I am afraid you may have to conform to many things that you are not accustomed to."

I felt her speech a little hard, but replied quietly:

"I will do the best I can."

"No one can do more. Come down when you are ready;" and she left me.

I went to the window to look at the blossoming trees, but the tears were gathering, so I could see but a confused mass of colours, and I made haste to put aside hat and mantle, and bathe my eyes. I had much ado to keep from breaking down, but I managed to enter the parlour with a fair show of composure.

It was a pleasant room, with large French-windows opening into the garden. The light paper on the walls, the light carpet gay with small flowers of many colours, and the very white curtains, made it bright and cheerful. A glass door covered with white muslin and opening into the shop moved as I entered, and a gentle-looking lady came in. She was so many years younger than Miss Baxter that it did not occur to me that she was that lady's sister.

"Good-morning, Miss Raymond," she said in a subdued voice which seemed to me to have a strain of sadness in it, and offering her hand. "I am very glad to see you. I hope we shall be able to make you comfortable."

I was pleased with her at once.

"I am sure you will," I replied confidently, "but I know nothing."

"Oh, Miss Baxter will teach you; she is very clever. I am very slow to learn, but she taught me." Then seeing a look of enquiry and surprise on my face, she said: "My sister, I mean; I am Susan Baxter."

"Oh!" was my foolish exclamation.

"You must want your dinner," she continued; "sit down."

I sat down, so did she, but there was still an empty place.

Observing that I noticed it, she said: "My sister and I do not dine together;" then, with a hesitation that struck me as odd, she added: "There are the customers, you know," and looking at her I saw a blush upon her fair face, and a confusion that made me feel that she was hiding something from me, and was a little ashamed. I looked down demurely into the plate which had just been placed before me, and continued steadily eating my dinner. My plate was emptied and filled again, and still no word was spoken. I began to think that I had come among strange people, but I was so anxious not to give offence lest I should be sent back to my aunt, that I determined to watch and wait, and try to understand them, if need be, in unbroken silence.

When the strange-looking woman had left the room after placing the pudding upon the table, Miss Susan said:

"Nurse Hamlen keeps her bonnet on because she has no cap with her, as she does not generally stay over dinner; but it was such a nice hot joint, it seemed a pity she shouldn't have some."

"You are very kind," I replied.

"Oh no," she said deprecatingly; "but it is very late, we have been slow to-day. I must go," and she passed through the curtained door.

Then Miss Baxter came in, and I was reminded of the two figures on old-fashioned cuckoo-clocks, where one comes out always when the other goes in, and I subsequently found that that was exactly the practice of the sisters, who were never in the parlour together, and in the shop stood at different counters.

Miss Baxter sat down to her dinner in silence, but presently, noticing me apparently by accident, she said:

"It is dull work watching another person eat. Would you like to walk in the garden? I shall be ready for you in a quarter of an hour. You can go out by that door."

"Thank you," I said, and after a little difficulty in opening one side of the French-window, I found myself in the strange garden, "all alone by myself," as the children say, and very happy to be so.

It was a narrow, but very long strip of ground, well cultivated, and gay with laburnums, lilac, and gualder roses. I loved it at once, and in all the time that came after, when I was oppressed by the strangeness and silence indoors, if I could get out into the garden I was happy and light-hearted.

Punctually to the moment as the quarter of an hour was over I stepped in at the glass door. Miss Baxter was just rising from the table.

"I am glad to see that you have some idea of time, Miss Raymond," she said in her cold, hard voice; "nothing is to be done without punctuality, and system, and order. I endeavour to have everything carried on in the strictest regularity, and I think that I succeed."

"No doubt," I assented.

"A resolute will always must succeed."

I answered nothing, because I did not know what to say.

"Come," she continued, "I can give you a little instruction now; it is the dinner-hour for many of our customers, so there is not much doing."

I followed her into the shop, feeling a little bewildered at entering one that way, and when I stood behind the counter, it seemed to me that I had got there by mistake. Miss Baxter gave me a paper on which were the private marks side by side with the figures they were meant to indicate. She showed me the contents of a few drawers, just pointed out that a sort of great bookcase behind me was full of fancy articles, and then was obliged to leave me to attend to a customer, and I had opportunity to observe the sisters critically.

It was a double-fronted shop, and at the opposite counter, with another great bookcase behind her, stood Miss Susan, helping a lady to choose wools. I noticed the rich amber tints of her wavy hair, the delicate pinkish white of her forehead, the pretty curve of the eyebrows; her nose was good, her mouth small, her chin was round, and it seemed to me that if she really laughed, there would be dimples in chin and cheeks. It was a very gentle face, but curiously sad. As she talked to the lady, who seemed very friendly with her, it brightened a little, and I thought how sweetly pretty she would be if she were only cheerful. She was of medium height, with a shapely figure, nicely rounded, and small, plump, white hands.

I looked at Miss Baxter, she was assisting a lady to choose silks, but she would not let her have the ones she desired; she insisted upon her having a better match, and took much trouble to get it. Even with her customers she was masterful. Her face never changed or softened; it was always composed and stern. Repellent its expression seemed to me, it was so fixed and hard, and the lips closed so firmly after speaking. Yet I was forced to admit that under other conditions she would be a handsome woman. All her features were good. She held her head well up, and it was fairly shaped, but her complexion was pallid, her hair a harsh iron-grey, her face painfully thin, as were her long hands. She was tall, and her figure seemed as little capable of yielding as her face. There were no soft curves; but a demonstrative gauntness that forced itself upon one's attention. Her dress was dark, and straight, and plain to ugliness, and she wore a net cap as neat as that of a Quakeress.

As I watched her I noticed how quick she was without the least appearance of hurry, how readily she understood the complicated wants of her customer, and with what tact she led the lady's uncertain mind to a decision.

"Shall I ever be so clever a woman of business?" I thought sadly, when a bright young girl said, "Show me some silks, please," and when I made excuse and said I was a stranger, said again, "Show me that drawer; I know the price myself;" and as I let her point out what she wanted, she whispered: "I am so glad you served me; she," meaning Miss Baxter, "is so grim and severe that I scarcely seem to have a will of my own with her, and the fun of shopping is following one's own vagaries." She looked at me with a face all smiles.

Miss Baxter, free of the lady, came to attend on my customer; at once she was sedate and serious, and as I moved away, gave me a glance that seemed to say: "See how I am instantly extinguished." And soon I learned that where Miss Baxter came laughter and cheerful speaking ceased. Mirth vanished and minds took a sombre mood in her solemn presence. She walked the world a depressing influence. I do not think that she was conscious of this. She looked like a woman with a lifelong sorrow, and possibly she had forgotten that happiness existed.

Miss Susan and I took tea together. Once during the meal, she said:

"I hope you will not feel dull, but I have lost the habit of talking. I don't seem to have anything to say."

"I am not dull," I answered; "everything is so novel that I have plenty to think of."

"I am glad of it," she said kindly. "Store up plenty to think of for the winter, it is dreadfully dull then."

"That is very far off," I replied.

"Yes, the days creep, but the months fly. I have cried for the dullness. You do not know what it is in the long evenings, and no one coming to the shop, no one to speak to."

"Never any visitors?" I said.

"Never; my sister and I have lived alone for nearly twenty years, and she never speaks to me."

Again was there the crimson, guilty blush in her sad face, and she said no word more.

Miss Baxter came into the room, and Miss Susan left it. I followed her, and stood behind her counter with her.

"Go over to your place," she said nervously; "she may not like it."

"But you can teach me as well as she can," I urged.

"No; she is mistress here, do just as she wishes——"

"Do you not wish the same?" I asked.

"I have no wishes but hers now. Go." And there was such plaintive sadness in her voice that I went at once, lest I should vex her, wondering what singular wishes she had had in the past, that were hers only, and not her sister's.

When the shutters had been put up by an old man who came for the purpose, and the shop goods covered, Miss Susan and I had supper together; Miss Baxter, meanwhile, being busy entering accounts, and making up the day's takings. Then as she sat down to her supper, and I said good-night, Miss Susan said to me that she would go to bed too, for she was tired, and, as she turned away without a word, I saw a sad look pass between the sisters, and a little sigh escaped from Miss Susan. I glanced at Miss Baxter; she was more rigid and severe than usual.

CHAPTER II.

SUNDAY came; one sister went to church in the morning, the other in the evening, I went both times. I was surprised to find that Miss Baxter had dined when Miss Susan and I returned.

The following Sunday Miss Baxter and I went to church, and Miss Susan had dined when we returned, and then I understood that, for some reason or other, the sisters never sat down to table together. Each in turn, for a week, was my companion at meals. In time Miss Susan got into the habit of saying a little to me, and I told her little things to amuse her, but Miss Baxter never said an unnecessary word, and there was something about her that forbade my speaking to her, except upon business.

In a couple of months I had a fair knowledge of my new employment; it was easy to learn, for Miss Baxter gave information very clearly, but she expressed herself pleased with my progress, and Miss Susan told me that she was sure her sister liked me.

"I see it in her eyes," she said. "If only she would look at me as kindly as she does at you, how happy it would make me!"

"Can nothing be done?" I asked. "Speak to her, say that you feel her coldness."

"Oh no, I cannot; it is right, it is just, but I feel it so cruelly sometimes. Oh, I wish I might tell you, it would ease my heart."

"Do, your confidence will be safe with me," I said.

Miss Baxter came in at the moment, Miss Susan rose trembling. She did not lift her eyes, but her sister looked at her with stern condemnation. When she was in the shop I said:

"Tell me all, it will ease you."

"Do not tempt me," she said with piteous pleading.

And I withdrew to my own counter, indignant with Miss Baxter, and feeling, with all my pity for Miss Susan, a little contempt for her excessive submissiveness.

That evening, when Miss Susan and I had about finished supper, the curtained door into the shop opened, and Miss Baxter stood before us, but not in our room, just a step from the doorway.

"Miss Raymond," she said, "you have been with us some months, and have merited our respect and good opinion. I believe some of our proceedings have surprised you, and I think it right, for many reasons, that you should have an explanation of them."

I thought at once that she had overheard her sister's words in the morning.

"I speak in confidence," she continued. "My sister will hear me, and if I say aught in error she can tell it you correctly. Twenty years ago somebody loved me."

The mournful pathos in her words surprised me, and I think it struck upon her own heart too, for in a hard tone she continued:

"Even then my sister and I were two lone women, for we had no men kindred. She was younger than myself, and I looked upon her as my charge. She came home from boarding-school, and when I introduced her to my promised husband, she wiled his love away from me with her soft prettiness and beguiling ways."

"Miss Raymond," said the younger sister, "I did not know that they were actually engaged."

"She knew, Miss Raymond, that we loved each other, and in her pride and belief in the power of her own fascinations, she wilfully endeavoured to win his heart from me. She knows this is so."

"Miss Raymond," said Miss Susan, "it is true. I was vain and foolish, and as I look back, I believe heartless too."

"I learnt her treachery," continued Miss Baxter, "and I made a vow that I would not speak with her as a sister or friend, or sit at table with her so long as I lived, but as the words passed my lips my mind limited the period, and I hold myself bound only to that limitation. Then she was sorry for her evil-doing, dismissed the false lover, and would have left me had I wished it, for she knew there could be little happiness for us together; but people should not evade the consequences of their conduct, but bear them humbly. And we were not cowards, so we have lived on as you have seen, apart yet together, solitary but not asunder. And so we shall continue to do until the end. We must not complain of a burden we have laid upon ourselves. I have spoken that Miss Susan may feel free to accept the comfort of your sympathy, and I believe that you will respect the secret of two unhappy women."

"Certainly I will," I answered, and Miss Baxter went back to her accounts.

Miss Susan was crying softly. I went to her.

"You can tell me anything now," I said, gently stroking her pretty hair.

"He did love me," she said, "and he was so handsome, but it is true. I tried to make him notice me in the beginning. I was piqued that he should think so much more of my old, dark sister than of me; but every moment of my wicked pleasure has been atoned for by days of grief. There must come a time when it may be forgotten, don't you think so?"

"Yes," I answered, "and wicked vows should be broken at once."

"I do not know," she said gravely. "A vow is an awful thing. I could not counsel her to break it. I would rather bear patiently the misery of it."

"I am sure it should be broken," I said confidently.

"Maybe, but everything is so clear to the young. When one is older, one is doubtful, uncertain, and one must not shrink from the burden one has put on one's own back."

"Your sister is so hard, so resolute," I said.

"Yes, but I was timid and afraid to stand alone, so I was glad to stay with her, and she is just, and has cared well for my interest; and to do her will in anything is the least I can do, for I have destroyed her happiness."

"And your own," I said. "But you are still gentle and pretty."

"I have no vow upon my soul," she said. "She is so terribly changed no one would know that thin old woman for the once handsome, proud Miss Baxter."

The curtained door moved, and Miss Susan went out of the parlour as her sister entered. How long is this farce to last? I asked myself in my impatience. But as I looked at Miss Baxter, and saw the great sorrow in her face, I felt that there was something solemn and terrible in the long drawn-out suffering, and the endurance and submission of these two women.

After this, Miss Susan gave me many little confidences. One day she noticed two women dressed exactly alike.

"Ah," she said with a little sigh, "that is how we used to be when we were sisters, but Miss Baxter, after that dreadful day, would not be like me in anything. She would have altered her name if she could, but she always wore dark ugly dresses, and left everything bright and pretty to me."

Another time she told me after a customer had left her:

"That lady, like me, is dependent upon her sister, but she is very mean to her; but mine is always very liberal to me. She gives me more money than I care to spend."

She told me also how her sister had sat up night after night with a neighbour, doing her work in the day as if she had slept as usual. That if she gave a subscription to a charity, Miss Baxter and Miss Susan Baxter were entered with the same sum to each name. And that a traveller told her that Miss Baxter said that they were partners with equal shares in the business.

"And I never had anything," she added pathetically. "All the money was hers."

"She is very kind," I assented.

"She is nobly generous," she said eagerly, "and yet she hates me, and will not let her hatred die."

"You let yourself imagine foolish things," I urged, for I had grown very familiar with her of late.

"You never saw hatred of you in a human face," she answered.

"I have. It flashed upon me from her once, and I thought it was killing me. I see a glimmer of it sometimes when she looks at me, and I tremble; and, yesterday, when I had not left the room quickly enough, her dress touched mine—only her dress—and she drew back from me as if I were a scorpion," and she began to cry.

"It is your fancy," I said, and tried to comfort her.

"No," she said with her gentle persistence, "you do not understand her, she never forgets."

"But she forgives."

"Child," she said impressively, "there is little consolation for the sinner in a forgiveness that does not forget."

The summer passed. Perhaps during all these months I should have been oppressed by the sorrow in the house, but that I had a special happiness of my own. Twice a week letters came to me which I read in the solitude of the garden. They were letters from one I loved, and who loved me, telling me of his doings and hopes and thoughts, and making my heart joyful. Once as I was walking in the twilight, thinking of his goodness and the bright future he was making for me, the possibility of my ever losing his love occurred to me, and in the sadness that came over me at the thought, I felt a deep compassion for the two women who had lost their lover. And as I sat at supper with Miss Baxter a few minutes later, looking at her with new interest and understanding, she said:

"You look sorry for me, Miss Raymond."

"I am indeed," I answered.

"Thank you. You are engaged; be advised by me, and let everyone know. It keeps people from temptation; they fall so easily, and are so subtle at finding excuses for themselves. Let us make the way clear for those we love as far as we can. And keep yourself from the bitter bondage of a vow; it is an awful tyranny. You are a good girl, and I wish you well."

I went to my room more depressed than I had ever been since coming under that roof, but I took out one of my letters, and its honest, hopeful spirit cheered me, and banished my foolish fancies and apprehensions.

A few weeks later Miss Susan, attending to her flowers after dark, when an east wind was blowing, took a chill, and was confined to her room for a few days with a slight attack of bronchitis. She was a little frightened; neither she nor her sister had suffered from anything but a cold for more than twenty years. Nurse Hamlen came to stay in the house altogether, and I saw her without her bonnet for the first time. I then learnt that Hamlen was not at present her name, and that it was twelve years since she had been nurse to the doctor's children; that Miss Baxter had not approved of her marriage, and had always ignored it, and called her by her old name; that the woman's husband had turned out a most undesirable acquisition; and that she would have had a good chance of starving if Miss Baxter had ceased to befriend her. She had a wondering admiration for that lady's sagacity in having so truly prophesied her misfortune in marriage, and a grateful willingness to do anything to please her, but she was an incapable sort of person, such as I felt sure Miss Baxter could only employ out of kindness.

Mindful of her shortcomings, that lady asked me to superintend matters in her sister's room. She never even came to the door herself, but she was anxious about her, I knew, by the wistful look in her face when I came from the invalid, and I always gave my report without being asked any question.

One morning, as she looked over one of my bills to see if the addition was correct, as was the custom when the amount was large, she said:

"You have mistaken the date, it is the 17th."

I showed her an almanack, it was the 16th.

"Then I have one day more to wait," she muttered with a little sigh. It was a new thing for her to sigh, and I thought she was getting strangely softened.

Miss Susan looked very pale and thin when she came downstairs, and I designedly wrapped a pink shawl around her to heighten the delicacy of her appearance, hoping that it might touch Miss Baxter's heart, and move her to be friendly with her sister. I noticed that she was a little startled, and I heard her mutter, "She is almost as pretty as ever," but she turned away to her employment without a word of greeting.

I saw the pain in Miss Susan's face, and passed over to her to say something kind, but I think she saw the indignation in mine, for she said with a little blush:

"As we sow, we must reap;" and I kissed her and was silent.

CHAPTER III.

It was autumn, and there was but little business after dark, so sometimes of an evening I read a little of the county paper to Miss Susan, while Miss Baxter was occupied in the shop. Once I was reading an account of a burglary at the house of Mr. Bailey, of Burton. His courage and prowess in defending his house and himself against two ruffians was greatly extolled. And, looking up, I observed great interest and excitement on Miss Susan's face. And as I read out further particulars, I was conscious that Miss Baxter was standing a few paces from the door, listening. I glanced at her, and saw a look of approval in her face, and I guessed at once that the John Bailey I had been reading about was the man who had been so cruel to them both.

Miss Baxter understood my thought, and said:

"Yes, Miss Raymond, John Bailey was always brave physically, but timid in mind."

"He was brave every way," said Miss Susan as her sister turned away. "He would have dared anything for me, but I could not marry the man who ought to have been my sister's husband."

"Of course not," I assented.

"But I am thankful he is not much injured. He is not fifty, and that would be so young to die."

A few days later we read that he had walked to the court to give evidence against the men, so could not have much the matter with him.

Miss Susan took advantage of her recent indisposition to go to bed early, and thus escape the dull, silent evenings.

Miss Baxter and I had been sitting together for an hour without speaking, when she startled me from a happy reverie by saying:

"I believe she still thinks of that man."

"He is probably married," I said, bringing my mind from my sweet fancies as quickly as I could.

"Not he; he told me I had prevented him from ever thinking of women again."

"But he may have changed his views."

"He meant what he said," she answered decidedly. "He is steadfast and stable by nature. To make the one change must have been difficult to him, and will suffice for his life."

I went back to the picture my true-love's words had raised in my mind of the home he was preparing for me across the seas, and again her solemn voice, full of an abiding sorrow, recalled me to the present:

"The days have never passed so slowly. Time moves indeed with heavy, halting feet, as though so weary that he will move no more, and the final pause be come."

"Do you mean death?" I asked.

"I hope not," she replied sadly. "I ought not to trouble you with my sorrow, but sometimes the heart will speak out of its own bitterness. Good-night."

As I went away, I heard her say to herself: "If only the days would pass!"

After this I observed how very worn and thin she was, and how an eager, restless anxiety alternated with her usual calm composure. It came upon her as soon as she was unoccupied for a few minutes, and flushed her cheeks, and made her eyes glitter. Her hair was much whiter than it had been when I came in the spring, and her eyes were sunken, with a great darkness beneath them.

Miss Susan said to me:

"My sister looks ill"—she had ceased to call her Miss Baxter to me—"and so old. She gave me a kind look yesterday with so much pity in it. You noticed," she continued, touching my hand, "that she said her vow had a limit. Can it be that it is near?"

"Ask her," I suggested.

"You do not know her," she replied, "or you would not say that. Perhaps she would have to renew it, if it were broken. She was always hard upon herself, poor sister."

"And harder upon others," I thought. But I would say no word that might possibly widen the breach between the sisters. I had come to esteem them both; they were both good to me.

As the last days of the month passed, Miss Baxter looked still more haggard and anxious, and Miss Susan took to shedding a few tears at odd moments.

I could but notice how pretty and young she looked now that she was thinner through her illness, and her delicate fair complexion was shown up by the colour of dress and ribbon I carefully selected for her.

Grief made ugly marks upon her face, although she was truly sorrowing, nor did it dim the beauty of her wavy auburn hair. And when I asked her why she was extra sad, she answered:

"It was about this time all the trouble happened, and sometimes I think it is coming to the end of her vow. That possibility has made me nervous, and made me feel more near to the past than in other years."

On the 31st of October, Miss Susan and I had just sat down to supper when the curtained door leading from the shop was opened, and Miss Baxter, coming in, took the place made ready for her at the table, saying in a quiet voice of intense emotion:

"I am come to take supper with you."

"I am very glad," I said quickly.

"Susan, do you give me no welcome?"

"I am thankful," she answered, putting out a hand that trembled.

Miss Baxter grasped it, saying:

"Sister, I am very sorry for my wicked vow, and all the grievous consequences it has brought upon you. I repent the making it, and I ask you to forgive me."

"Do not say that," said Miss Susan, putting up her hands as if to banish even the thought. "It is I who am to be forgiven. Forgive me, and let us be friends, sisters, once more."

The tears rained down her face.

"We will be friends, and we will forgive each other." And kissing her sister, she said: "If only we could forget!" and the despairing sorrow of that wish lingers with me yet.

We tried to eat; we tried to seem as if it was our usual custom to sit happily at table together. I ventured to make a remark, but no one noticed it, and my voice sounded so strange to myself and the words so out of place, that I felt a little ashamed, and in silence we continued our pretence of supping.

Miss Susan's tears flowed quietly, in spite of her efforts to stop them. Miss Baxter slowly and resolutely ate some food, trying not to look at her sister, not to hear her subdued sobs.

I was conscious of the great effort it was to her to repress her impatience and irritation at the persistent weeping, and I was oppressed by the emotion and excitement of the moment.

"Susan," she cried at last, with incisive voice, "cease your crying, for Heaven's sake; your tears reproach me too bitterly. The past is gone; we have no power over it; we could not change it if we gave our life to do so; but the present is ours; we can make of it what we will. I would make it very happy for you; I would give you affection, tenderness, pleasure; I would make your days bright and cheerful, so that a sweet joy and content should grow up in your heart, and banish the memory of the evil that has befallen us. I have resolved and prayed to do this, and you meet me with weak tears."

"Sister," said Miss Susan, and her soft eyes were very earnest, and her tears were stayed at last, "bear with me. I was always weak. I am grieving for my own acts, not in reproach for yours. You have been good to me through all. I will help you to live as sisters should."

"Try hard," said Miss Baxter. "If I see but one smile on your face I shall have faith in your endeavour."

Miss Susan smiled feebly, and an answering brightness in her sister's face revealed to me a depth of love in her nature that reminded me of a fertilising spring breaking from rock-bound earth.

"I take that as an earnest of our coming happiness, Susan, and we must remember that the habit of years cannot be broken through in a day. We must learn to converse with each other, and be intimate as sisters. The familiarity and companionship that come by instinct have so long been laid aside. But we shall regain all, Susie, and in a greater measure, if we truly forgive each other. God bless you; good-night!" And kissing her sister, she moved to leave us. Passing me, she said: "I leave her in your charge. You will soothe her best. I am too strong and too hard, as in the old days."

I took Miss Susan to her room and petted her, as her sister could not have done even if it had been the only way of bringing her back to happiness.

She was soon quite composed, and very thankful that the reconciliation had come, and spoke hopefully of the future. Then her face was overcast again, and in answer to my enquiring look she said:

"My evil-doing looks blacker than ever now. But for that my sister would now be a happy wife and mother."

"Forget the past," I urged; "that is what she wishes, and it is the kindest thing you can do for her."

"I will try," she answered; "but I have not a strong will that can say to my mind, 'Think not of that,' and be obeyed."

I went down to Miss Baxter, she was still standing at a counter looking over a book of accounts.

"Your sister is quite calm, and you have made her very happy," I said.

"Yes, and I have just been looking over figures, and find that we have prospered so well that my sister has a nice little sum of money of her own if she should marry. Do you think that she is too old, Miss Raymond—you are a better judge than I?"

"No," I replied; "she is so fair and pretty."

"And she is clinging and constant, and fit for a life of dependence. Thank you, Miss Raymond. Good-night."

It took some time for the sisters to get accustomed to the new relations between them. It was difficult for people who had not spoken together for twenty years to get into a habit of conversing, and Miss Baxter was a woman who at all times found it hard to speak unless she really had something definite to say, so that occasionally in the autumn evenings we were together for an hour at a time in absolute silence.

The little things that Miss Susan and I could gossip about seemed too trivial to mention in Miss Baxter's presence. She got an inkling of this, and left us more to ourselves, saying that the most lasting friendships were formed between people of divergent tastes, but I think she felt that a certain sternness in herself isolated her from others, and that she would have been glad to be softer and more genial to her sister if she had been able.

It was her custom to make occasional visits to the county town, and even to London to look out for novelties for The Bazaar. One evening she returned from one of these visits much later than usual. "I called upon an old friend," she said in explanation, and the effects of the long years of estrangement were still so powerful over Miss Susan that she never asked on whom.

Half an hour later, as we sat at interminable rug-work, Miss Baxter came in and said:

"Susan, I called at John Bailey's house, and was shown up into a room where he sat eating walnuts and drinking wine at five o'clock in the afternoon, looking quite happy and satisfied with himself. I knew when I saw him drinking wine alone at that hour, that he could not be the John Bailey that I had believed him to be."

I looked at her, standing tall and stern, with a contempt for the solitary wine-drinker in mien and heart, and I understood that, absurd and illogical as the inference might be, his apparent easy enjoyment of the moment, and his early freedom from business, had led her to believe him self-indulgent, and deficient in the energy and earnestness of character which to her were the salt of life.

"And he is not," she continued emphatically. "I gazed at him with scrutiny. There is no power, no ambition, no deep thought in his face, only kindness and benevolence. He is not the man I loved. I made myself an idol and worshipped it, and I thought it was John Bailey. But though he will never be a great man, he is honest and true. When I said to him, 'John Bailey, I am come to say that I forgive you,' he cried out, 'You never mean to say you bore a grudge against me all these years. And that poor thing, your sister, surely you forgave her and were friends!'"

"After twenty years?" I replied.

"His great red face went white."

"You were harder even than I thought," he said. "Cruel woman! is she dead?"

"No," I answered; "she is well and fairly happy; that is her address. Good evening," and I put out my hand.

"Excuse my rudeness," he said eagerly.
 "I do not mind it," I replied, and came away."

Miss Baxter was perfectly calm as she spoke, but many emotions passed over Miss Susan's face as she listened.

A week later a burly, good-natured man came to the house, and asked for Miss Susan Baxter. I opened the door and showed him into the sitting-room. He seemed so much too big for it that I bethought me to ask him to step into the garden, where Miss Susan was taking a little walk in the midday sunshine.

The two got on so well together that both returned to the house with smiling faces.

He came once a week for some time, and in the spring there was a quiet wedding. And afterwards Miss Baxter and I lived together happily for several years, for the home for me over the seas was longer in making than was expected.

My Fairest Maid.

TELL me, ye birds, have ye my mistress seen—
 My lovely Kate, 'mongst other maids a queen?
 Thus may ye know
 Where she doth go;
 When her sweet voice she mingles with her lute,
 The envious warblers of the grove are mute.
 Still, must I roam, my wish unsatisfied?
 Ye flowers, have ye my darling Kate espied?
 Thus may ye tell
 Her I love well;
 None care to view your beauties when she's near,
 Your fairest blossoms but as weeds appear.
 Tell me, ye maids, who trip along the mead,
 Have ye seen her I love in very deed?
 Nay, nay; a truce
 To vain excuse,
 For by this token you may know my queen,
 The fairest maid is she the world has seen.

Snowdon House.

(A SHORT SERIAL STORY.)

PART I.

PROBABLY most of our readers know where lies the town of Bridgeley, even if they have never visited it. In the event of a few not being so well informed, we will just mention that its population is between ten and sixty thousand, and that it lies between the belt or zone comprised between ten and sixty miles from London.

It is not very many years since the town of Bridgeley began to assume the character of a manufacturing town—only to some extent, however, for it was never given up to tall chimneys, clouds of smoke, barren wastes, grimy canals, and piles of slag. All these pleasant accessories, however, were predicted as being of certain and speedy arrival when Shale and Co.'s ironworks were established in the suburbs, and a ruinous depreciation of all Bridgeley property was confidently expected also.

However, the beauty of the country around Bridgeley still survives, and we know that no softer, pleasanter meadows, no greener hedgerows, no statelier elms can be found than are within a mile or two of the town. Yet it cannot be denied that in the suburb of Bull's Mead a good deal of disfigurement did ensue, and that the rents of the villas and farms just about there did fall considerably. But on the other hand, the receipts became much more considerable from that part of the district where the works stood, and where two or three straight streets of monotonous cottages were built also, with the two public-houses, the grocer's, and so forth.

The town itself quickly seemed disposed to stretch out its hand to grasp that of this new neighbour, for on both sides of the road leading to the river at Shaletown—the new name of Bull's Mead—there began to rise up a number of new houses, more being built in one year after the opening of the works than had been built in Bridgeley during any previous seven years; and so, on the whole, no great damage was done to the town.

Nevertheless, as we have admitted, some parts suffered, and rents fell, and this was the case with Snowdon House. This had been a farmhouse, but part of the estate had been sold for the factory site, part for the cottages, while the portion which was left, although extensive enough for some purposes, was not large enough for a farm of its former type, and, indeed, its new surroundings also spoilt it for this purpose. Yet, as no immediate demand was likely to be made in its direction for building, it was advertised as a villa and pleasure-farm, its name changed from Gribblings's Farm to Snowdon House, the extreme beauty of the adjacent country brought prominently forward, its convenient proximity to the rising town of Bridgeley dwelt upon, as well as the fact that two packs of hounds were within reach, as little said about the ironworks as possible, and a low rent asked for all these advantages.

Several persons came from London, attracted by the advertisement, and more than one rich manufacturer or ironmaster from the Black Country, but the unlucky ironworks sent them all away. Of the two classes, the midland counties people were, perhaps, the more disgusted, telling the agent that if they had wanted a place of that kind, they could have had the real article without stirring from their own doors.

At any rate, Snowdon House remained unlet for more than a year, and its grounds, although defended by various notice-boards, and stout hedges to boot, were often intruded upon by factory hands, their wives and children, for even in its neglected gardens there was a tolerable assortment of fruit-trees and fruit-bushes.

The owner was an invalid, living abroad, so that the disposal of the estate was almost entirely in the hands of Mr. Dockle, the agent, and this gentleman, disgusted with his want of success, began seriously to contemplate throwing the meadows and grounds still left into allotment plots of a quarter of an acre each, which he knew were high in favour with the factory hands and with many of the townspeople also, and were, besides, not easily obtainable.

But while he was debating this step, another intending customer presented himself. This was a gentleman from London, a Mr. Luke Wayre, who wanted such a place for pleasure, not for profit; who liked the country around; and who cared not what his neighbours were, so that he was quiet and retired. The situation of Snowdon House, lying back a quarter of a mile from the little-frequented road, and accessible only through its own grounds, gave fair promise of these latter advantages. He saw the gloomy old house, which was large, certainly, but old, flat, and ugly, and made no objection to it.

In brief, Mr. Wayre became the tenant. He sent in a man and his wife, who appeared to have been in his service previously, engaged a young girl to act under them, on the recommendation of the agent, and said he should come down himself as soon as a few indispensable repairs were completed; and he kept his word.

He came down very quietly; indeed, he had no acquaintances in the town but the agent referred to, and seemed to desire none, for Mr. Dockle's attempts at introducing a friend or two were received in anything but a favourable manner. In accordance with his expressed resolve, the new tenant made a beginning of what was intended to be a dairy and poultry farm. A few cows and pigs were bought, a good many fowls and ducks, while Ezra Crake and his wife—the couple mentioned as having been sent on by Mr. Wayre—were installed in a roomy cottage at the gate, and had superintendence of the labourers who were employed in this experiment.

Mr. Wayre had no experience in such matters. He was rich, apparently, and took pleasure, or sought to find it, in a new way of life. He had hitherto lived in large towns—so much he said readily, but as to what those towns were, or what his life had been, Mr. Dockle could gain no hint. Ezra, the manager, described his master, when he spoke of him, which was not often, as not possessing the temper to be closely questioned with safety. If he wanted a thing, he would have it, and never cared what the expense was; if he wanted his own way—and he always did—he would have that too at any cost, and it had cost him a good deal before now, Ezra said, but would say no more.

The reader sees what sort of a farmer Mr. Wayre was likely to make, and what his preparations were, but these preparations received a check. His health, which had been but indifferent from the first, became worse; he took less pleasure in watching the progress of his alterations and improvements; he had, perhaps, grown rather tired of his toy; and, to his great annoyance and actual injury, with the darker nights of autumn, the trespassing upon the grounds of Snowdon House revived.

The unruly "hands" from the works, and their still more unruly children, did not always wait for the night to set in. Wayre himself had seen them, by twos and threes, breaking through his hedges, climbing his trees, dropping from his walls, and trampling down his bushes. To these, doubtless, was due the stealing of eggs, and ducks, and chickens, which now began.

As Ezra had intimated, the temper of the tenant of Snowdon House was not exactly that which would put up tamely with this treatment, so the local police were "communicated with," to use their own favourite expression; fences were strengthened, railings added, walls heightened, and additional boards, still fiercer in their warnings, were placed around the demesne.

Once Mr. Wayre went so far as to arrest a suspected marauder, but this was a costly failure; identification failed, the accused got off scot-free, and Mr. Wayre, under advice from his own solicitor, paid the man twenty pounds as compensation. What was a worse consequence, the trespassing increased, and it seemed as though nothing would effectually check it.

This is a little in advance of our story, however, for while these things were being transacted, Mr. Wayre's health became worse, as has just been said, and it was desirable he should see a doctor. The agent, who, besides his solicitor, was almost the only person he knew in Bridgeley, recommended a very respectable physician of the town, and to him Mr. Wayre would doubtless have resorted, but that when he asked his manager, Ezra, if he knew anything of this gentleman, Ezra replied that he had a house in the best part of Bridgeley, and had married Mr. Dockle's sister.

Married Mr. Dockle's sister, had he? This was enough for the suspicious hypochondriac. The agent had been actuated by interested motives, then—was very likely to get a commission on the bill—he would have none of his recommendation.

"Who was the doctor that brought the action against the iron-works company the other day—one of their vans was driven against his horse, you know?" demanded the master.

"Dr. Fulham, of Back Market Street," replied the man; "he has only been here four or five years, and he—"

"Go and fetch him," interrupted Mr. Wayre; "tell him I want him at once—or, stay! Take the chaise, so that he can come back with you if he is at home."

Ezra knew his master too well to argue this or any other matter with him, so went at once, only pausing as he drove through the lodge-gates to say to his wife: "He," indicating whom he meant by a jerk of his head towards the house, "is going to have Dr. Fulham."

"Good job for Fulham too," responded his wife; "he won't have no call to buy half-shoulders o' mutton for Sundays now."

Ezra drove on, but this brief conversation will serve to show that the medical gentleman selected by Mr. Wayre, however skilful he might be, did not hold pre-eminent social rank in Bridgeley. He was, happily, at home and disengaged; indeed, Dr. Fulham's practice was so moderate in its extent, that he was too often at leisure, so he returned promptly with Ezra in the chaise.

Wayre was seated in his easy-chair, looking out of a window which commanded a far-stretching view, even to the hills in the neighbouring county, beyond which the sun had so recently disappeared that there was a faint golden glow in the sky behind them still; although closer at home, and under the influence of a large town, the sky was grey, and twilight seemed closing in. He heard the chaise draw up, but could not see it from where he sat; then the door of his room opened, and the doctor entered.

The penetrating glance with which Wayre greeted the new comer showed a thin, dark, keen-looking man, with well-brushed symmetrical whiskers, but otherwise closely shaven.

"I am glad he does not wear a moustache, that is something in his favour," thought Wayre, then added aloud, "Dr. Fulham, I presume?" and on receiving a reply in the affirmative, went on: "You are called in, doctor, to perform one of your usual impossibilities. A worn-out, broken-down man wants to be made young again. You have been asked to do as much many times, I doubt not."

The keen eyes of the doctor probably read the speaker accurately, and divined what sort of man he was, for he answered brusquely, and with little of the gentleness common to the profession. He asked various questions, and then said:

"Half your ailment, Mr. Wayre, is imaginary. Your mind is responsible, not your body. Rouse yourself more, go out more, take an interest in something, and you will be well. You want cheerfulness more than physic."

Wayre looked at him again very penetratingly while he said this, then broke into a smile as he returned:

"You are right, but you are the first doctor who ever said as much to me. I have tried to take an interest in this place. I thought I should like it, but its dullness has grown hateful to me. I thought I should take an interest in my farm, but it is less mine than others', for the marauding villains of the neighbourhood trespass and rob me every day."

"Factory people, I suppose?" asked Dr. Fulham. "I thought so. They are the bane of the place. I have had some trouble with them myself."

"I know it," said Wayre. "Then you will understand me that it is chiefly through these wretches that my strength has given way."

"Why do you not keep them out?" demanded the doctor. "I would stand none of their trespassing, I warrant you."

"Keep them out!" echoed the other. "I have tried everything in vain. I believe the policemen are bribed, or go shares in the pilfering. Perhaps, indeed, they do some of it themselves."

"Oh, the police are no good!" exclaimed Dr. Fulham. "They are not half sharp enough for such fellows as these."

"Then what am I to do?" naturally asked the patient, who had perceptibly rallied from his languor, even in this short discussion. "I can keep the children out, and have done so, but what am I to do with systematic thieving?"

"Do!" repeated the doctor. "Why, get a dog—a couple of dogs if one is not enough. Let them be seen a bit, have them accidentally led through Shaletown just as the hands turn out, have them brought home that way. Then let it be known how savage they are—and they should be large and savage both—keep them confined all day, let them out of a night. Be careful that your walls and fences are sound, so that the animals cannot get over, and, take my word for it, you will have much less trouble with your trespassers."

"Egad, the very thing!" cried Mr. Wayre. "I am only sorry I never thought of it earlier. I wish it was possible to have tigers for the business; I would buy them. Now where can I get such dogs? Advertise, I suppose?"

"No, go to the regular men. Do you not know them?" said Fulham. "I do; shall I write about one?"

"I wish you would," replied Wayre. "Write to-night if you can. I shall be for ever obliged to you. Expense is no object. And, doctor, although I dare say you are right in saying my disease is half imaginary, yet I shall not feel safe if you do not come over every day for the present. I shall anxiously look forward to your visits."

It may easily be believed that a promise to this effect was given, and the doctor rose to depart. This, however, he was not suffered to do until he had partaken of a glass of wine with his patient. He certainly prolonged his visit considerably, allowed his patient to talk more than himself, and left him in far better spirits than he had found him.

Dr. Fulham's own spirits were equally improved by the visit, and in this result the old port had but a minor share. The doctor was poor and struggling, and, what was more, unlucky. It is very easy for those who are not in the struggle to say there is no such thing as luck; that every effect has a cause, and so on; but it will be found that few doctors, or lawyers, agree in this opinion.

We repeat that Dr. Fulham had been striving against adverse currents all his life; he was nearly beaten in the struggle, and doubted his ability to hold on much longer, even in his third-rate provincial practice; but now light seemed to break through the clouds, his luck was about to turn, for never before had he gained so important and profitable a patient as Mr. Wayre. Those keen eyes of his, perhaps, saw how such a man might be made more profitable yet.

He duly wrote to his dog-fancying agent in London, and duly attended Mr. Wayre on the next day at Snowdon House, to report progress, to take him his medicine—for, as the doctor candidly said, there was no particular hurry about that—to drink some more of the port, and to have a prolonged gossip with his patient.

On the next day he had the dog fancier's reply to take with him, and from this it appeared that Mr. Kennell—the name of the London tradesman—had such a dog for disposal, that if the creature only deserved half what his vendor said of him, Mr. Wayre might fairly banish all his regret at not being able to press tigers into his service.

The patient was delighted at this; he walked over his demesne with the doctor, which was a greater exertion than he had undertaken for weeks, arranged with him where the walls and fences should be repaired, and gave his new friend carte blanche to arrange all this; to the astonishment and chagrin of Ezra, when the latter came to know it. The manager's importance, and profit, possibly, were diminished by this, and his opinion of Dr. Fulham rose no higher in consequence.

During this promenade, and in their discussions within doors, especially over the wine, Dr. Fulham listened to his companion with such appreciative attention, and asked such judicious questions, that a third party, had one been present, might have thought he wished to lead him on. But on his past life Mr. Wayre was silent. He told the doctor, in tolerably plain language, that he was rich; that he was a widower, having lost his wife many years before; but this was about all, nor could the most dexterous questions draw him out further.

A night or two after this, Dr. Fulham was able to announce that the dog would be sent down the next day; he went over with the tidings, and so much improvement had his prescription, or his companionship, wrought in Mr. Wayre, that the latter gentleman actually drove him over to Bridgeley—no great distance, it is true—and was more than cheerful, quite hilarious, indeed, in his conversation.

Dr. Fulham always encouraged this certainly healthful sign, and while in the company of Mr. Wayre was as merry, allowing, of course, for professional decorum, as the tenant of Snowdon House himself, but this hilarity seldom lasted after he left that gentleman. On this particular night the change was very marked. After bidding Mr. Wayre good-night, and standing at his door, his face all wreathed in smiles, so long as the chaise and its driver were visible, he turned into his sitting-room, and threw himself into his armchair with a widely different expression on his face. The keen eyes were thoughtful, the knitted brow was harsh, and for a long time he sat there alone, ruminating on some problem which was knotty and difficult.

At last his mind seemed made up; he straightened himself in his chair, muttered, "I will do it; it is worth the chance," then drawing writing materials to him, wrote hastily a letter. The result of all this cogitation was not by any means an extremely long epistle, nor was it written to any one who might be considered difficult to address, for it was directed, when finished, to his daughter—for the doctor was also a widower—Miss Agatha Fulham, who was at that time residing with her aunt at a village in Cheshire.

Not many days before the events just narrated, the level rays of the evening sun struck on the single street and scattered outlying houses of a small village in Cheshire, when a man, who was evidently loitering in expectancy at a spot a mile or so from the village—where the lonely cross-road sank in a deep hollow—climbed the slope on the nearer side, and, shading his eyes with his hand, looked in the direction of the houses. This he repeated, and on the second time he saw a female figure turn an angle of the road which led from the village. He lifted his hat by way of signal, and then descended into the hollow again.

The road here was lonely enough in itself, but from this hollow another road, which was a mere waggon-track leading to some farms, branched off through a number of scattered trees which here and there grew together, and made the spot more lonely and retired still. In this little grove the young man waited until a light step was heard, crackling as it came over the dead dry leaves which strewed the ground; then he came forward. It was, as he seemed to expect it would be, the figure he had seen in the distance.

No especial greeting took place, but side by side the pair walked to and fro in the grove.

"I feared you would not be able to come, Agatha," said the young man, "not that you are late, but I feared that some difficulty was in the way."

"Perhaps it would have been as well had it so happened," returned the girl in a low voice. "I need but a single glance, a single look from your eyes, to tell me that I shall not be the happier for our interview. Am I not right, Alfred?"

"Your foreboding is but too correct," returned the other, or Alfred; "my last chance is lost. Mr. George Clayter has absconded, and I am allowed to leave—so end all my hopes."

"But why—" began the girl, who stopped suddenly.

"Speak on, Agatha," said her companion; "I would have everything explained to-day. We meet by your own wish, you know."

"My own wish! Great Heaven!" exclaimed the girl, and as she spoke the tears which had been swimming in her eyes, trickled in large drops down her cheeks. She rallied for a moment, and went on: "Why should you leave because your employer's son has gone—you have done nothing wrong?"

"Nothing wrong in your eyes, my dear Agatha," returned the young man; "nothing wrong in my own; but I have joined Mr. George Clayter in undertakings that the law would deal with, and but for his father being the head of the firm, I should at this moment be in Chester Gaol."

The girl gave a low cry and a shudder at hearing this.

"I thought to benefit myself, of course, and enable us, Agatha, to— Well, that is too painful to be dwelt upon," continued Alfred. "Mr. George Clayter thought to make his fortune. There have been several flagrant cases of mercantile fraud lately, and we should suffer from the indignation aroused. I must leave England directly; that is the condition on which I am allowed to escape."

A pause took place before anything more was said. The girl was unrestrainedly weeping, while Alfred eyed her askance with an air which seemed to reflect trouble and vexation more than the grief under which she laboured.

"Could I not brave a foreign country as well as yourself?" she exclaimed suddenly, turning towards him with a burning face, and eyes for the moment dry. "Why could we not face fortune together? Have I shown faint-heartedness that you should fly from me when trouble comes?"

"Faint-hearted! I wish I had but your courage, Agatha!" returned the young man, and there was something in his tone which rang truer and firmer than any of his preceding speech had done; "I should perhaps have dared my fate more successfully then. But you do not know what you ask. I do not go to any certain living, to any settled home. My clearest idea is to make my way to the extreme West, either of Canada or of the United States, where I hope I may at least live for a while. Should this fail, I must try for some employment on board ship. I cannot—dare not—must not take you with me."

"So you have told me before," said the girl quietly; "I see now that it is really true. I restore you the packet you sent me as your parting gift. I need no parting gift; I need nothing to remind me of this most unhappy passage in my life."

With this she offered a small packet, but the young man recoiled as if in terror at its sight.

"Unopened!" he cried. "You have not even seen its contents?"

"I did not wish to see them," returned the girl; "I want no parting gift, as I have said, and I cared not what the packet contained. It is yours."

"Keep it, Agatha! keep it!" he exclaimed with something almost approaching to a stifled cry; "you must; it is all I have left—all I can— There are fifty pounds in it, Agatha!" He grasped her hand as he said this, for the first time since their meeting. "I should not have given you any tawdry jewellery, or—"

"Were there fifty times fifty I should give them back to you, as I do now," said the girl; she still spoke calmly, but the slightest glance would have shown the effort by which she did so. "Alfred Dane, I will not accept your gift!"

"You are mad or bitterly cruel to reject it!" he returned; "and I beg—I implore you to keep it. Well, if you will not," he continued, in response to an angry gesture, "there is no help for it; but I dare not leave any address to which you could write should you alter your mind."

The girl laughed here for a brief instant; she had not even smiled since they met, and her laugh now was not a pleasant one.

"We may never meet again, Agatha," he resumed, after a pause which was probably painful to both parties; "I have to ask your forgiveness for all the pain and wretchedness I have caused you. Our fates have indeed been unhappy; mine not less painful, I am sure, than your own."

"Say no more, Alfred," replied the girl; "I know we do not meet again. Have you not told me so already? And I could not wish to renew such—"

She turned slightly from him, and pulled down her veil to hide her face. As she did so a distant clock chimed the hour.

"I must go at once," exclaimed Dane, as she had called him.

"Farewell, Agatha, if this our parting be for ever, try to forgive me when you think of me—at the worst, strive to think of me without bitterness. Good-bye."

He took her passive hand as he spoke, and tried to draw her to him; but she broke away, and through her choking tears, which even her thick veil could not conceal, said:

"No, do not by any pretence increase the agony which the remembrance of this night will bring. Farewell, Alfred, farewell for ever. You know, and I know but too well, that this is indeed a final separation. You say it is unavoidable, I feel that if you think so, so it must be. So it shall be. Farewell."

She moved from him, and, after pausing irresolute for an instant, the young man dashed off in the direction from which he had first come. As his retreating footsteps died away the girl leant against a tree, and for a few moments there were hysterical sobs and catches in her breath which seemed a prelude to a fiercer attack, but by a powerful effort she controlled herself, and walked steadily along the road until she reached the village, on the outskirts of which stood her home.

Miss Fulham, for it was she, looked anxiously at the house, with a relieved expression saw that none of its inmates were in sight, then hurried to a side-door and entered. She hastened to her own room, which she happily reached unnoticed. But scarcely had she taken off her bonnet, and bathed her swollen eyes and tear-stained cheeks, than a rap was heard at her door, and on her answering, the voice of Mary, the servant, was heard saying that Mrs. Gurdon wanted Miss Agatha.

"Tell Mrs. Gurdon that my head is so bad, I must really lie down for a short time," returned Agatha; "I will come down as soon as possible."

The servant departed with this message; Miss Fulham probably knew the temper of the person to whom it was to be delivered, for she at once darkened the chamber, and threw herself upon the bed. Scarcely had she done so when another tap was heard, and then Mrs. Gurdon—the mistress of the house, and Agatha's aunt—entered.

"What is the matter with you this evening, Agatha?" said the lady; "if your head is bad again, you must see Dr. Smith. For this last fortnight you have been fit for nothing; something is always the matter with you."

"I am very sorry; I know I have been of little use to you lately," returned the girl; "but I think I shall be well to-morrow."

"Well to-morrow!" echoed Mrs. Gurdon; "why, I can see even by this light that you look worse than ever. How can you be well to-morrow?"

"I feel I shall be so," answered Agatha; "the—the worst is past now."

"Well, I am sure I hope it has," said Mrs. Gurdon. "Here's a letter from your father, I suppose; I see the Bridgeley postmark on it." She threw a letter upon the pillow as she spoke. "I hope he has made up his mind as to your taking the situation; it is the best thing you can do, I am certain. Pretty news to-day about that Alfred Dane; it is well you had someone to look after you; a fine thing you might have made of it. I gave him my mind, I am thankful to remember, and kept him away from here, luckily. You will not see him again."

"Indeed, why not?" asked the girl; she was obliged to say something as the speaker paused, but the words came very huskily from her lips, and she moved still farther from the dim light of the window.

"Just what everyone expected," returned the mistress of the house; "all the village knew his goings-on could not last. Young Mr. Clayter has gone—obliged to go, too. It is said he has robbed his father of thousands, and our fine Mr. Dane turns out to be just as bad—mixed up with him, in fact, so he is going too. Old Mr. Clayter went down on his knees to his partners, or very near, though he is the head of the firm, to get young Dane off, guaranteeing to pay all the money himself, because if the constables had taken him all must have come out about Master George. Well, if you can't come down to-night, I hope you will be, as you say, well enough to work in the morning."

Without further adieu the loquacious and not too amiable lady departed.

Miss Chrissie's Protégé.

(A STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS.)

CHAPTER I.

"It's Seth, I'm sure."

Miss Chrissie was so excited at this moment that she forgot to put her garden-hat on over her efflorescent cap-border and her little, nodding, silvery curls; indeed, she forgot that the sun was shining with all his might as she started off down the short drive that led from the parsonage door to the high-road.

"Poor Seth!" Miss Chrissie kept saying, as she trotted along, panting a little over every short step; "poor Seth! I'm so sorry for him!"

Many a person in Miss Chrissie's place would have been planning a little speech wherewith to open the very difficult conversation she meditated, but the curate's little sister never had any mentor but her own kind heart, which generally told her the right thing to say at the right time.

She was a gentle, rosy, rotund little spinster, with a broad, sweet face that reminded one irresistibly of that of a kitten, and a soft voice and mild, purring ways which carried out the suggestion. But there was a very un-kittenish anxiety in her blue eyes, as she paused beside the iron gate beneath the pair of beeches that formed an arch above her.

"Poor Seth!" she repeated again, this time to give herself courage, for the man she was waiting for was very near her now, approaching with heavy, laggard step between the ill-cut hawthorn hedges.

"Good-evening, Seth." Miss Chrissie had cleared her throat before she spoke, but there was a quiver of dread in her voice all the same.

"Good-evenin'." He did not turn his head as he answered, merely shot towards her from his reddened eyes the furtive glance of some cowed animal.

"I have been watching for you for two days, Seth."

"Aye, well, I'd a'most not be here at all—" He paused involuntarily, and his voice had lost a little of its sullen harshness.

"Why was that? I thought the old home—"

He interrupted her with a gesture of the hand.

"There is no home now, Miss Chrissie, nothing but a grave."

"Are there not the old memories?"

"They seem to make me only lonelier and colder."

"Won't you come indoors, Seth? I have many things to say to you."

"Thank you, miss; but I'd rather not."

"And why not?"

"I don't feel as if I was fit for a decent house yet, and, besides, Mr. Grey mightn't like it."

"Mr. Grey is from home."

"I don't know as that makes any difference, miss; a man's house is his castle, and most folks wouldn't want me for a guest just yet."

His face was sourly smiling, but it had lost the hunted look it had worn when she accosted him.

"Mr. Grey is as much your friend as I. I never do things unknown to him, Seth."

"I didn't think you did," he said hurriedly; "but women have softer hearts than men, and often say a kind word where a man would only think it right to blame."

"You must have forgotten old times, Seth, if you think it is Mr. Grey's way to be hard on any one."

Miss Chrissie spoke with such cold severity as the man had never heard from her lips before.

"I beg pardon if I've offended, and I'll go indoors if you wish."

"Thank you, the sun always makes my head ache," Miss Chrissie said plaintively, as she preceded him towards the house.

It was noteworthy how the man's whole demeanour had changed again, and how the slouching gait and movements had come back.

"This way."

She entered the small parlour before him, and offered him a chair by the square centre table, and pulled up one blind and lowered another to exclude the glaring sun, and all this with the kindly thought of giving him time to come to himself.

The man drew a breath of suffocation, as though the narrow limits of the four green-papered walls oppressed him, and so they did, shutting him in there with old memories.

"I was with your mother when she died, Seth."

Miss Chrissie was sitting opposite him now, with the width of the green and crimson table-cover between them.

"Where did she die?"

He had rested his arm on the table, and his down-dropped eyes were fixed on the glowing arabesques that dazzled them.

"Down at Sally's."

He drew a strangled breath.

"I was afraid it might ha' been in the workhouse."

"Oh no, we took care of that amongst us."

Miss Chrissie heaved the faintest possible sigh as she spoke, the taking care had meant many small sacrifices on her part.

"Not as I'd a minded for my own part," he went on after a pause. "Charity is charity, and whether one takes it from you or the parish don't matter much, one is a pauper all the same. But I think she'd have rather been beholden to friends than to the union."

"Yes, I'm sure she would, and then Sally was very reasonable."

"And she died—how?"

The dreary hoarseness was in his voice again.

"Thinking of you, and praying for you."

"Did she say what she wished me to do?"

"No; she said the Lord would direct you."

He lifted his face from his supporting hand now, and looked at the curate's sister with his bloodshot, pitiful eyes.

"If she had lived, Miss Chrissie, I should have been ever so much braver to have begun anew," he said.

"I don't know, Seth. Perhaps you would have felt so just at the first; but I don't think the Lord ever takes our supports from us till He thinks we are strong enough to walk alone."

The tears were rolling over Miss Chrissie's round cheeks and falling on her pink, dimpled hands as she spoke.

"You see, Miss Chrissie, she believed in me; nobody else ever will now."

"I believe in you." He had risen to his feet, and the little woman rose too, and looked at him with eyes that were kind and true. "Do you think Mr. Grey and I have never talked of you? Do you think we believed all the evil that was told and hinted of you?"

"There was nothing said worse than the truth. I was a coward, an' a fool, an' I might ha' been a murderer." He tried to moisten his lips with his dry tongue as he spoke, twisting his battered cap in his trembling hands. "I understand all about it now, Miss Chrissie. I had so much time to think it out in. It has spoiled my life. I'm a gaol-bird, and men have a right to kick me, an' I've no right to blame them. But that is not the thought I find hardest. It is far worse to remember that if I'd struck him half an inch closer to the face I'd have killed him, an' then through all eternity I could not have altered that."

"Yes, that is awful to think of, Seth. Once death has taken a man, it never gives him back, though we break our hearts in effort or atonement. But, after all, you did not kill him, you see, and there are men who say they would have acted as you did in your place."

"I don't think they would, though it's kind of them to say it. But thinking things over does not mend them. It's just this way, you see. I've no character an' no chance in life. I've spoiled my whole future, an' I'm only twenty-five."

"I've been thinking so much about you, Seth, and finding out all I could for you, since I knew your time was nearly out. Have you never heard that there are employments any kind of men are put to and no questions asked?"

"Any kind of men—thieves an' worse? Oh, I know all about it! An' I may come to be glad of their company yet—but not just yet, Miss Chrissie, though I'm thankful to you, all the same."

"Could you not emigrate?"

"Yes; but I feel as if I'd have to tell the master in the new country how I was just out of gaol for half killin' the master in the old."

"And I don't suppose you'd tell him what made you do it, or how you had been provoked?"

"I don't think I would, Miss Chrissie."

The curate's little sister stifled a sigh as she looked up at the vast slouching figure, at the dull, heavy face, and furtive, bloodshot eyes which would always cause this man to be misinterpreted, which had already turned a jury against him, and made his sentence for a not uncommon assault doubly severe.

"I was present at your trial, Seth," she said, after a pause, kindly. "Mr. Grey and I were both there. We thought it would keep your heart up to know old friends were near."

"I did not see you."

"No, you never lifted your eyes."

"All that seems so long ago, Miss Chrissie, though it's only two years, that I scarcely mind how things were or what I did. I seem to have been just a lad then an' to be an old man now, an' all the time that has gone between has been so hard and shameful. But I've no right to come whinin' to you, Miss Grey, an' I'm goin' to stop it."

"Don't go yet, Seth," she interposed, for he was turning towards the door. "I have still much to say to you. And, first, will you answer one question? Was it about wages you struck Mr. Jacobs?"

"No, miss." He was standing quite erect now, his face a little flushed, and the half-forgotten manliness gleaming on it again. "I was a coward to strike him at all, for he was so small by the side of me; but I'm not a thief, to assault a man for makin' terms about his own. If he would not pay what I asked, he was quite free to get a man who would do his work for less."

"But it was stated at the trial that you had quarrelled about wages, and you did not contradict it."

"No; an' I never mean to contradict it. What does it matter what folks say?"

His head had fallen forward again, and his whole attitude had resumed its old hopeless droop. Miss Grey looked up at him with a new interest in her gentle eyes.

"Public opinion would not matter, if we did not owe our livelihood to its approval," she said thoughtfully.

He laughed harshly.

"If I'd undersell other men, I'd get work, even if I am a gaol-bird," he said.

"But I would not do that, Seth; it would only gain you more enemies."

"Do it! How could I do it? Where have I the money to start with, Miss Grey? And even if I had, it's not the little fiddling jobs of one neighbour and another that would pay, now that I'm sure to be out of all the big orders from the gentry."

"I have your tools, Seth. I kept them for you, when your mother died."

"Thank you," he said huskily; "it will feel like old times to have my hands on them again."

"And we thought, Mr. Grey and I, that we should try and keep you here at first, unless your mind is set on some other course. You have more friends in the parish than you think, and the worst of them would be ready to give you a helping hand."

"You are very good."

"We cannot offer you much, Seth, for in a way we have as little in our power as anyone; but we thought that if you'd care to stay among the old neighbours, you might fit up our stable for a workshop. We have had no pony for a year past, and the stable is empty, and quite at your service, if you think it worth taking. And then we've been thinking, too, that you could build yourself a boat in your spare hours, and take odd days, when work is slack, at the fishing you were so fond of. The rectory people would gladly buy fish of you, I know, and so would we, and many others. It's a scrappy kind of life I offer you, Seth, not half good enough for a skilled workman like you; but it is the best we can offer, and you must remember that rebuilding is tedious, and not very easy work."

"Yes, I know, and I take you at your word, Miss Chrissie. Heaven bless you for your kind thought!" His face was quite pale, and his lips twitched as he pressed them together. "Where a man has fallen there it seems to me he should rise. But are you sure Mr. Grey means this too—are you sure your good heart has not misled you?"

"Quite sure, Seth; my brother will tell you so, himself to-morrow."

CHAPTER II.

It was a hot August evening. The sun was ebbing towards the west in a sea of golden light, and the warmth that followed him rolled in slumberous waves over hill and dale and meadow.

"What a long, hot, horrid day it has been," Lucy Grant said to herself pettishly as she stood by the cottage door at home, and looked out over the yellowing landscape.

She could not hear any music in the birds' songs, or see any beauty in the lights and shadows that chased each other over the swaying cornfields, because she was not thinking of these things, or looking at anything but the far-off sheen of the sea, and that only dazzled her eyes, and made her head ache.

A little sparrow peeped at her over the edge of the porch, and said "tweet, tweet," in the friendliest way; a pair of dragon-flies darted past her, their gleaming mail flashing in the sun; and a white butterfly fluttered towards her as though to discover whether her pink gown was not some abnormal kind of magnificent flower.

"Tiresome things!" the girl said impatiently, and went indoors and flung her knitting on the white deal table, and sat down and cried a little.

Lucy could not have told what ailed her, but her father knew. She had one of the tempers that had first shown themselves more than three years before, and had been growing worse of late—more sudden and unaccountable, and more prone to end in rapid, passionate penitence.

"I am sick of everything," the rustic beauty said to herself a score of times daily, and then she would glance up at the old weaver, working away silently at his loom, unobservant of everything apparently but the web before him, and would notice that his face was growing thinner, and sadder, and greyer, week by week, and that the patient lines on brow and lip more rarely melted now before the warmth of a smile.

"I am just a bad girl, that's what I am," she would add with a catching of the breath, and then would bustle about with spasmodic activity, enlivening her work with pathetic heart-breaking snatches of merry singing, whereat the weaver would steal a sidelong glance at her, and then would look away, sighing.

"She never was right since Seth Gavin went to prison," he told himself, and then he sighed again, for she was his only child, and motherless, and how could he find in his heart to be hard on her?

In a way he was to blame that sorrow had come to her, for he had not known how to train her aright, and so she had fallen into those idle, dreamy, flirting ways, to which he had been far too lenient because she stayed at home, and let the lads follow her there. If she had been a gad-about, of course he would have seen the evil of that, and would have been stern enough, but it had not been unpleasant to himself to have the cottage filled with young life when his day's work was over, and to hear the choir practice in which Lucy took an alto, and to see Luke Smith, and Seth Gavin, and John Aldney, and all the most promising young fellows about the place doing homage to his girl as if she had been a queen. His vanity encouraged them to come, if her vanity brought them there, and now he and she had to bear the pain equally when they were left alone. Seth Gavin was just out of prison, and John Aldney was married, and Luke Smith had found a sweetheart with a tongue as glib and a voice as sweet as Lucy's, and the weaver's cottage was forsaken.

"Seems as if too many lovers were worse than too few," the village girls said with derisive laughter, as they passed the cottage-door, making Lucy shrink behind the muslin window-blind. "Seems as if one may fall atween a lot o' stools, and sit on the ground after all;" and then they noticed aloud how the honeysuckle trailed straggling from the porch, how the rustic seat Seth Gavin had built beneath the old apple-tree was falling to decay, and how untidy and untrimmed the flower-borders were.

After they had passed, the girl started to her feet with her face aflame, tied on her muslin sun-bonnet, and went out into the patch of garden, and nailed the climbing plants above the door, and cut the box borders trimly, and then turned determinedly to the rustic seat.

"He never made them one," she said, with an angry pucker on her brow; "and the time was when they'd have torn out my eyes about him, so of course they like to say evil of both of us now." And then a softer mood followed the hard, angry one as she remembered how he had stood there bareheaded four years before, looking down on his finished work and saying: "It's a bonny seat, Lucy, and it will hold two, with a squeeze."

Ah, but that was long ago, so long, before he had been a felon, or she broken-hearted!

"It's only a piece of dead wood, as dead as the old days are," she said sadly. "I wish I could as easily hide them out of my sight."

She pulled the decaying timbers apart, mechanically. She would not leave them there a ruin, to be a jest and byword; she would burn them and scatter their ashes to the winds as was done with sacrifices in the olden time.

Poor Lucy was unlucky in the moment she had chosen for her work of destruction, but then she was always so unlucky now that it would not have surprised her had she known it.

At that moment a man was coming towards her, over the downs, up from the sea, with a fishing-net over his shoulder, and a string of picked fish in one hand—coming with his heart filled with forgiveness and desire for pardon and reconciliation.

"If she refused John Aldney, and has grown so changed and still, then maybe I misjudged her, maybe she did care and is sorry. Well, it will do no harm to see her again, anyway, and hear the best or the worst."

So he had picked a dozen of the finest fish from that morning's haul, and was taking them as an offering to her father. And in spite of himself his heart was aglow with hope, pulsating to old happy memories.

"I wonder does she mind the evening I made her the wooden chair, when I would have kissed her under the apple-blossoms if I had dared?" he was asking himself with a little smile.

And then he stopped, for the cottage door was in sight, with its stocks and gillyflowers waving in the breeze, and its carnations and roses wafting him a scented message of peace.

But there was no peace in his heart; it seemed to lie like lead in his bosom, for the rustic seat round which so many happy memories clustered was lying in ruins, and Lucy, grown prettier since he had seen her last, was working with flushed, determined face and frowning brow, at its final destruction.

"She wants nothing near her that will ever make her think of me," he said, turning silently away, while the trees rustled above him, and the heavy-headed grasses nodded solemnly.

"Things were righting themselves so fast, that I was almost forgetting what I am. Well, that reminds me, anyhow;" and then he threw the net on the parapet of the rustic bridge, and with his face between his hands, stood looking down on the swirling stream that rushed eagerly towards the sea.

Things had been easier than he deserved, that was it. He had not found the avoidance among his intimates, nor the contemptuous dislike among the gentry that he anticipated. Indeed, had he only known it, his chastisement of one whom the old residents looked on as an upstart libertine had served him with these, though they had shown no public recognition of his service yet.

For Mr. Jacobs, the millowner, was not a gentleman, as the neighbourhood reckoned gentlemanliness, nor popular either with the class he employed, or the class to which he feigned to belong. But this, had he known it, would not have mattered to Seth.

"To show myself a brutal bully to a little bit of a dancin' chap like that, it was very low," he said to himself gravely, conscious now of the cowardice, rather than the criminality of his action. He never could atone for it, and that was the thought that was like a bone in his throat. If he had broken Mr. Jacobs's machinery, or burned his mill, he might have indemnified him by the labour of a lifetime, but that small scar above the rich man's ear would always stand on the debtor side of Seth's moral account, and he hated to owe aught to any man.

And yet, as he stood above the bridge, with his nets beside him, and his fish drying in the light of the setting-sun, he did not think he regretted his blow as much as he had done in other moments. It was but a part of the fatality attending all his intercourse with Lucy Grant.

She had spoiled him and weakened him in those old days, made a fool of him as no woman would who valued self-respect, and all for what? That she might have one more adorer in her train—one other man to flatter and spoil her.

Seth grew very bitter as he remembered all the incidents attendant on that black day in his calendar; how she had mocked and flouted him down there below the mill, till he could not bear it, and then, when she had left him, how he had followed her like the stupid, adoring oaf he was, and how he had seen her stop to answer the millowner, who had seemed to wait for her, and whose notice boded no good to any pretty girl, and how the latter had tried to kiss her before she broke from him, and sped upwards agile as a fawn.

That man might kiss her, when he, after all the years of his honest worship, dared not have touched her hand!

He had stood thinking this, in passionate, sullen anger, while his employer, unconscious apparently of his existence, came towards him, humming and twirling his cane as he walked.

"So, you find this a good place for idling too," the rich man said, addressing with conscious easy condescension the creature he employed and paid.

"Idlin' or killin', it's all one to me," the creature answered savagely, and then, before he knew how or why, a blackness of great darkness had fallen on the elegant Mr. Jacobs, and he lay prone on the hot earth, while the insects of a day crawled over him and investigated him.

"Mr. Jacobs is lyin' up in the wood; I think he is dead; I struck him. I'm goin' home now," Seth Gavin said to the crowd of rustics who stared at him open-mouthed, and then he went on mechanically towards his own house, and took the supper his mother set before him, and then sat down idly, with his face between his hands, and stared at the smouldering logs.

"There is a crowd of folks comin' up the road, Seth lad, an' police among them; come and see," Mrs. Gavin called excitedly, glad of anything that would rouse her son from his unusual torpor and apathy.

"I suppose so."

He took his cap down from the peg in the wall and waited.

"Seth Gavin, you must come with us," the blue-coated official said, appearing at the door.

"I am ready."

He looked peaceable enough, but he was a big fellow, taller by half a head than any of the crowd, and precautions were always wise, so they handcuffed him.

"What is it—what has my son done?" the old woman shrieked, wringing her hands.

"Murdered Mr. Jacobs. Is that enough?" the man answered gruffly, pushing her aside as her son was led out into the darkness of the coming night.

Then he was dead, the scented popinjay who had always worn a flower in his coat, and yet had such a hard hand over those who served him; dead with the light song warm on his lips, and the rose snatched from a girl's bosom in his hand! It was odd to Seth, at first, to think of him as dead, and hushed into the dignity of eternal rest and silence.

All that night Seth Gavin lay on the cold floor of his cell, with his arms beneath his head, and his face hidden.

"Sullen brute, hanging's too good for him!" the warder muttered, stirring him with his foot that he might rise to eat.

And the long days passed, and at last the day of trial came, and he was led out into the dock, into the daylight that mocked him.

He did not recognise a face in the vast throng that seemed to stare at him with stony eyes, neither that of the mother, who gazed at him through streaming tears, nor that of Mr. Grey, the curate, who had come to give him a character, nor that of Timothy Grant, the weaver, who watched him mournfully from a corner.

The trial which was about to take place had been delayed, the counsel said in his opening address, owing to the dangerous illness of the principal witness. Happily the cause of delay existed no longer. And then Mr. Jacobs stepped into the box.

The whole court surged round the accused, and the voices of the counsel died down to a murmur, and again roared like thunder. But he sat stolidly, making no sign, with his mighty arms locked across his chest, and his face hidden.

He was not a murderer, there was no man's blood on his soul! That thought kept repeating itself over and over like a refrain, while his trial went on, and the jurors, reminded of riots in Birmingham, and strikes in Manchester, grew more and more embittered against him. But he roused himself when the verdict of "Guilty" had been given, and when the judge was about to pronounce sentence.

It was quite time, his lordship said, that an end should be put to the brutal rebellion of animal force against authority; it was quite time the working classes learned that, though they might cheat their employers by defective work, and rob them by dishonest strikes with impunity, the time had not yet arrived for them to assault those who paid them. In spite, therefore, of the prisoner's previous good character, he felt it his duty to sentence Seth Gavin to two years' imprisonment with hard labour.

In the Ruin.

THE Abbey Church stands roofless 'neath the sky,
The Abbey pavement is but soft green grass,
Where steps of reverent pilgrims as they pass
Up to the ruined shrine, fall noiselessly;
The vagrant breezes as they wander by
Float unobstructed, where the storied glass
Jewelled the sunbeams in the time that was;
The palace built for praise is dumb for aye.
Nay, where the bluebells and the mosses climb,
And clothe with lovely life the carven niche,
The brown thrush builds her nest; as full and rich
Her music, as the strains of elder time.
God's priests lie mute, but God's fair creatures' song
Swells up in praise and prayer the summer long.

A Bunch of Cyclamens.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

It was a summer evening—not a gentle spiritualised English summer night, but a gorgeous sun-setting time when one looks down upon the rolling vastness of the Roman Campagna.

Two girls and a young man, the brother of one, had walked out from one of the little towns of the hills, and had wandered through the luxuriant woods that clothe those hills. They were gazing and resting. One, a Scotch girl, Mary Moraine, sat upon some ancient broken brickwork, the other girl leaned against the trunk of an old ilex-tree, the young man stood erect. There was a pronounced look of vigorous vitality, of energy, of action about him.

The masses of trees opened where they sat, and from their height the land swept grandly down, bearing on her bosom yellowing maize and wide gardens of trellised vines. Far, far away in the dim distance of the west, where the sun lighted up a silver line of whiteness, lay the sea, and the once great port of Ostia—it was almost like a vision; but still one could say with truth that one saw the sea. Above that visionary shining line rose the sky, flaunting scarlet and orange flames; below it swelled the billowy land of the Campagna, ocean-like, and vague, and vast, but lifeless. Like a dead sea it gave back no answer to those gorgeous wreathings of sunset glory, but seemed to lie and pant, breathless, silent, finished.

Weird, measureless, desolate is the Campagna at all times—at nightfall it grows to an intensity of desolation. One can never tread its wildnesses, nor gather its rank luxuriance of flowers and long grasses, one can never gaze down, as we gaze down now, without the thought of its centuries of buried greatness palling upon one, without, too, a shudder for the living death which stalks ghostlike across its plains and spoils its air with poison.

Mary Moraine and her friends, two young Americans, had wintered in Rome; they and their belongings would have left a week ago had not small nothings come in the way. So strangely powerful are these "nothings"! If we went on our way disregarding them, what events would get unacted! What linkings and what breakings of human lives would miss their very birth-time!

The Americans were two of the family of a Boston physician. Dr. Matthew Greeley had stayed at home while he sent wife and children to see Europe; but he had written a peremptory order to his son, also a doctor, to return home within a month from the date of his letter.

"Go home without seeing the towns of the mountain! not possible, mother!" declared the young man. "I must do them, whatever you and the girls do. You pack up your trunks and go right up to Florence—Rome is too much of a good thing now. I'll come round in a week and meet you, and not be far out of the governor's month, after all."

All very fine; but, however mothers may be controlled by energetic sons, sisters are rarely found so amenable.

The Greeleys went to Albano, and Mary Moraine and her aunt went also—what one section of their pension did the other would likewise do. The girls had set up a camaraderie before the arrival of the son, doubtless it would last after he went home, for his winter had not been in the genial south but in the stern north, and in hard work of doctoring.

"What idiots we were not to come up here before!" Euphemia, or Phemie Greeley was saying; "one lives here, one cooks down in Rome. I vote we stop a week, instead of tramping on to another place."

"Likely!" was young Mat Greeley's one word.

"And why not?" Phemie had a decision of her own. "You'll get towns, you've seen two or three of them, and they are all alike. Big white houses, yawning giant gateways, stucco in infinite dilapidation, broken stairways, washing hung out from windows at all altitudes, pictures everywhere—natural ones I mean, of course—also dirt everywhere, likewise of course. And where, I'd like to know, will you get such a road as this? Did you ever see such a wood before now? Answer me—answer me, Matthew John Greeley."

"Yes."

He pushed his straw-hat back from off his forehead, and his blue eyes laughed, while after the word of assent he shut his mouth tight.

"And what more?"

"No."

The same tight closing of the mouth.

"You are downright insulting!"

Phemie moved away, crossed the roadway, and climbed the woodland bank on the far side of it. Soon one saw nothing of her beyond a vision of vague whiteness, showing between thick myrtles and syringas, tall grasses and ferns, tree-trunks, and a wilderness of flowers.

"You'll be too severe, Dr. Greeley," said the other girl, Mary Moraine.

There was a soft languor about her attitude and her voice, but these seemed in no wise fitted with the bright and vivid colour of her. The Greeleys were fair to whiteness, she was fair with brilliancy; her hair was of ruddy chestnut, gleaming russet now as, with her hat thrown off, she sat with a stream of sunlight across her. Her eyes were brown, and surely could flash—how was it they were weighed down with that dreamy languor?

"I must sit upon her sometimes, Miss Moraine. Fancy my life with four rampant sisters; one must assert oneself. She's out of hearing, so I will turn confidential. But you are tired?"

"No," she said, "tell me."

All at once a temptation sprang to his tongue; should he indeed tell her a secret? He had a secret. The strong impulse within almost mastered him, but—fate was in that "but"—his eyes fell upon her, nay, more truly they seized that new phase of manner, and the impulse was beaten back.

Was she just tired, or—men in his condition are alert to catch meanings where no meanings exist—was she indeed utterly careless and uncaring about him and his confidences?

He did not cry out his secret, his treasure—no, not at all. He was a strong man, able to wait, and, changing his position, he firmly crossed his arms before him, and walked briskly a few steps away from her. When he turned, he spoke as if his words had been intended all along.

"She's perfectly correct," he said abruptly, "perfectly, there's nothing so exquisite as this Frascati wood. And no doubt the towns will all be alike, still they are down for me to see, and see them I will. But if I were you I'd rest here, you have been doing too much lately."

Lover and doctor in one, might he not be pardoned for a searching glance?

And Mary's cheeks flushed rosy-red for an instant, and the brown eyes flashed.

"Indeed no!" But as suddenly as they had come, did exclamation, and rosiness, and flashing eyes, all disappear. Mary became pale, and serious, and cold. There are moments when a girl must be either cold, or must show a warmth which no girl would show unasked. "Do not look at me professionally," she gave a little laugh; "do you not see that I'll be going in for rural dolce far niente?"

Somebody was approaching. A countryman, without doubt, coming home from some trafficking over the hills, for there was the stumbling, shambling tread of a donkey's feet in the loose stones of the hillocky sloping road, and the "Yah, yah!" of the donkey-driver.

He came into sight—not a picturesque Campagna villager at all, but the prince of local guides. Not even ragged to the due picturesque degree, but still nevertheless picturesque. He wore loose, grey, baggy trousers, a loose, blue, short coat, his throat was bare, and his shirt was thrown open; the scarlet wisp of silk he called necktie was knotted in the button-hole of his coat, and was flying over his shoulder as the wind of the evening had caught it; his face was shiny with heat, but the features were—what shall we say?—imperial? Yes, they had the close firm vigour, the classic purity, and delicacy of outline one sees in the old heads of the Cæsars as they stand in the museums of Rome. His eyes had the dark colour and the vivid life which those old marbles cannot give, and his black hair was cropped close in the antique severity. Above rose modernism—a round blue cap with a peak, and above the peak in shining letters, "Cicerone."

He was Domenico Saccucci, the guide.

"Ah, signor, and signorine," he cried, doffing his cap and shoving it on again over his left ear, "Fortune is good!"

"I am glad to hear it; she's fickle with some," answered young Greeley. "You have had some foreigners to fleece to-day, I suppose—eh?"

"Signor! No, no; my good fortune is that I see the signor himself again, and now I know there will be a good day, and bread and wine for Domenico."

Phemie heard voices, and made her way back. Her hands were full of flowers—pale syringa blooms, delicate cyclamens blushing from pinkness up to crimson, strong and tiny forget-me-nots, weary heavy-headed poppies—a hundred more.

"What are you talking about?" she cried.

"Domenico is talking blarney," said Mary, rousing from her—laziness shall we say?

The man looked quickly from one to the other girl.

"I do not understand," said he. Then prompt for business, his look of doubt fled, and his eyes were keen and alert. "Does the signorina say she will engage Domenico for to-morrow?—for the next day?—for some day?" Was there anything more cajoling than the air of courtly, graceful, beseeching deference with which he ended?

The donkey made use of leisure by munching contentedly behind his master.

"No," cried Phemie; "the signorina said nothing of the sort—we will have none of you, Domenico. Do you not charge too much—too much? No, we know the ways now—we take care of ourselves."

An intense look of melancholy was the man's sudden expression, and his hands clasped before him, then, after a moment he swiftly changed his tactics, and a laughing face, a face brimming over with fun, rose.

"The signorina is amusing herself. She knows the ways—yes. But does she know the byways, the points from which one gets the one point of beauty which only the good guide knows? No, no; the signorina will come to Domenico for that. To-morrow quite early shall I bring the donkeys to the hotel?"

"Cheek!" muttered Greeley. The young man was a bit sore from what he had taken as a rebuff of Mary's, and he felt combative. The guide would get his sharp words. "Justice all round, my man!" he said decidedly. "At Albano, we take an Albano man; at Tivoli, we take you; at Frascati, we take a Frascati man. You see?"

"I see well, signor. And is not that what I ask? For myself, I am of Tivoli—that is true; but my son is at Frascati, and my son is ill. Ah, signor, he is ill! And what can I do? I come this week, and I leave my own affairs—am I not old, and the world knows me? Tito is young, and he must not lose. If Saccucci is not ready as guide when the foreigners come they will take someone else. I do but guard his occupation for my son."

"You give him the money?" put in Phemie practically.

"Signorina!" He looked hurt. "That is of course. Certainly I give the money to Nina—Nina is Tito's wife—for Tito and for the baby."

He got his order.

By-and-by the three went home. Mary's hands had been full of flowers, like those of Phemie—it certainly was not the girl's natural humour, but that evening she was full of changes and of fancies. She was lazy; she was excited and unnaturally prone to running; then she would fall silent, only to dash out some spasm of gay song; again she would drop behind the other two.

She was behind as she came up to the hotel, and she seemed cautious.

"What folly," she cried, "for us to gather all these things! They live no time. Dr. Greeley," and here came a flush and a reckless dash of her tongue, generally so gentle, "shall I make you a posy of faded flowers?"

The young man looked gravely at her; then he was surprised. But Mary Moraine under any aspect was a charm for him—he did his best to copy her humour.

"Indeed, no," he answered. "I'll condescend to take one, but I'll be content with the freshest and best."

Her gaiety had gone. She separated a bunch of nodding cyclamens from the rest.

"There!" she said. "Are they not a fit emblem of myself—limp and faded? I feel just like that."

Again her face lighted, and with an energy of action that belied her words, she let her arms fall limp on each side of her and hung her head in mimicry of fatigue.

"Thanks," said he quietly.

Then they separated.

On the morrow, six young people went off on donkeys to Tusculum with the guide. Now and then some walked, but never Mary. • Domenico was always at her side, whether because he was wholly captivated by the girl's sweet ways, or whether he felt that she more particularly needed care, we do not pretend to say. However it was, he stuck by her, whether in the starting from the town, or over the rough broken fields, or up the steep path through the wood.

There is always a routine in these journeys when one has a guide, and, arrived at the end of this path, the order was to dismount and to roam about the ruins of Cicero's villa as long as they would. The sun was high, and the scorch and glare of his fire something almost too great to be endured.

Mary alone did not ramble. There was the wild vastness of the Campagna for her eyes to wander over, the white vague patches upon the hills where were the towns, high on the crest of one hill the jagged edge of ancient walls and battlements, the great dome of metallic-blue sky above, and just at her feet the tangled grass and the flaring poppies growing wild over the stones which once had made the entrance to the country-house of one of the world's greatest orators.

Perhaps she saw it all, perhaps she saw none of it. She was dreaming, so she thought.

Alas! there were worse things afloat than dreams! She had dreamed, and laughed, and played too long in the night air of Rome.

Saccucci looked round, and she had fallen prone on the old stones.

"Signorina! carissima!" and he was kneeling by her and lifting her up.

Well, that faintness passed off—we must not multiply details—and she would have Domenico keep it secret.

But the faintness came again on the way home, this time she could not hide it, and they took her into a cottage; it happened to belong to Tito Saccucci, Domenico's son.

On the big bed lay Tito himself, on the floor crawled the baby; Nina, the wife and mother, was at the door spinning; to sit and look at Tito would not make him well. Had she not first made him some drink with freshly-gathered lemons?—cure for all maladies. He had the glass at his hand, and he could drink as he liked. What more could she do? He was not so ill that she need weep! And the baby? he was happy, he was on the floor and he played with the cat; yes, he was as well as could be. So Nina stood against her door-post and span with the end of her distaff leaning upon her hip, and her brown fingers deftly drawing out the yellow threads of flax.

There was an excitement, a confusion for some minutes. The distaff was thrown down, Tito swallowed his lemon-juice at one gulp, the baby cried; the signorina had to be waited on and cured.

Well, it was only a few minutes, she was well again and everyone had gone away.

The donkeys were well ahead, and Domenico was setting the baby down on the floor after a toss in his arms.

"La febbre?" (the fever) said Nina, nodding outwards. "They do not know."

"Yes, yes, poor child!" and the man ran off.

Yes. That was it.

No one suspected it, not even Dr. Greeley himself. Would he, so suspecting, have gone off as he did round the mountains? For he had brought the ladies to be of his mind, and while they stayed for a week at Frascati and then made as quickly as possible for Florence, he went in and out of all the mountain towns, and was to meet them in the lovely City of Flowers.

Two days after he left them, the evil declared itself. Mary Moraine had Roman fever.

Messengers were sent, letters were sent, telegrams were sent, but no Dr. Greeley ever came to Frascati.

In her delirium Mary had called for him; Mat's secret was also Mary's secret. Alas! and alas! Was she going to die? away from her own people, and with love and help so near her, yet missing it all.

Her aunt was distracted; she had thought to give the girl pleasure, and there!—she had given her her death.

Telegrams went off to Scotland, and at last, when not one of the messengers had succeeded in finding Dr. Greeley, his mother telegraphed to the hotel to which he would go in Florence.

Dr. Greeley had altered his plans. When he got to Rocca di Papa he met a friend, and the friend, having seen just nothing, and being of the sort needing a guide, Matthew Greeley had taken charge of him, so to speak, and had gone hither and thither in quite a different course to that he had arranged for himself.

He was two days behind time when he arrived at Florence.

"Mrs. Greeley is here?" he asked in his quick determined way; "my mother? Give me a room near theirs. Let her know I am here, will you?"

The hotel-master was too polite to look surprised. He ventured this:

"Monsieur is mistaken, perhaps. Was it to this hotel——"

"Hotel de la Paix—I do not make such mistakes." The young man could not have told why he spoke so abruptly. "Do you mean they are not here?"

"No, signor—no. Some ladies—is it that?"

"Yes—seven ladies."

"Of one party? No, signor—no. What name did the signor say? There may be letters."

"There must be letters if they are not here. My name is Greeley—Dr. Greeley."

There were no letters, and for the next half-hour Matthew was in his room fuming. Perhaps we use the wrong word. If he had been a paterfamilias or a bachelor of middle-age waiting for his dinner, we might be allowed to say he was fuming; but he was young and a lover.

He did not fume; he at once rushed into infinite anxieties, and the anxieties were for neither mother nor sisters, but for Mary.

He took a small leathern case from the breast-pocket of his coat, and drew out a bunch of cyclamens tied together with a thread of grass.

What did he do with them? Digitized by Google

Just kissed them softly — kissed them, and felt their tender delicate heads.

He shuddered.

Bah! was he superstitious—he, the wise doctor, the determined man of energy?

A feeling had come over him—a feeling and a memory. The memory was of her wild words in which she had likened herself to the faded drooping blooms.

Idle folly! So he contemned himself, and, without waiting for dinner to be announced, he hurried down the wide staircase and took his seat at a little table.

Fortune was kind to him. He would have no crowded table d'hôte, for that had been over an hour and more.

He swallowed his soup. It might have been nectar or it might have been water.

The waiter came to take away his plate; another waiter gave the first a letter.

"This has just arrived since monsieur has been at the table."

The plate disappeared, and a telegram was before him in its place.

Involuntarily he pushed back his chair and turned so that his face was hidden.

This is what he read:

"We want you. Come, wherever you are. Mary has fever. Lose no time."

He did not lose any time.

He stood erect and pale when in a moment the waiter came, handing a second course to him.

"Show that to your master and give him that," said he, putting a twenty lire note upon the table. "Have a carriage ready at once; I shall be downstairs with my things in five minutes."

It was another day, and nearly midday. Fight as one will one cannot command trains any more than one can control time or tide.

Slumberous heat made the Campagna misty; all, if one looked out, would have shown vague, and vast, and unreal. But the blinds were closed, and the heat of the room got tempered by the light flying of the mountain air. There was something else than looking out of window to be thought of.

A blue-robed sister was watching, two ladies were watching also—on the little bed there was a girl lying unconscious. Her face was white and still, and on the pillow her radiant hair was tossed in waves. Now and again she moaned, now and again she moved restlessly.

There was a great clatter of wheels tearing along the rough stones of the street. The girl moved more restlessly. Was it that she was not wholly unconscious?

The noise was made by a carriage coming up from the station. Inside was a man all dusty, and pale, and anxious. With a hurried action he had just put something back into his pocket; it was something he had kissed passionately.

In another moment he was flying up the hotel staircase.

"Matthew—my son!"

"She is——"

"Alive—yes."

But the one word suggested a prophecy that the mother's tongue dared not speak.

His glance fell on the bed, and he saw and understood.

The three women drew aside, and for a moment Matthew Greeley knelt by the side of the little bed.

A spasm of restlessness had seized Mary as he had entered the room; now she lay still, and it seemed as if he had changed the restlessness to rest. Her hand was in his, and his face was bowed.

The lover must retire, the doctor must reign. Dr. Greeley lifted his head and stood upright, gazing into the brilliant brown eyes. Alas! alas! they moved, and wandered, and flashed, they had no answer for him, and yet, as he dropped her hand, Mary again moved restlessly.

The blue-robed sister smiled radiantly—perhaps before she donned that blue dress she had had experiences other than of nursing—she spoke quietly:

"Let her feel your touch, sir—she knows—it is the first sign of consciousness."

Dr. Greeley was not at home in Boston within the month, and the old Dr. Greeley was not in consequence angry. "Circumstances alter cases," the old copy-books used to say.

Mary Moraine did not die, and one day she, as well as Dr. Greeley, went across the "herring-pond," and renewed her winter companionship with the four Greeley sisters.

She has a great project that she will grow cyclamens largely up in her northern garden.

The Editor's Note Book.

M. DE LESSEPS and our principal shipowners have arrived at the terms of an agreement, which, so far as anyone unconnected with the trade can judge, appears to be fair enough from the commercial point of view.

BUT it must not be forgotten that the purely commercial point of view is by no means the only one from which the question must be considered, nor indeed is it by any means the most important. The free navigation of the Suez Canal is of vital importance to our interests, and it is the political aspect of the question which it behoves our Government to bear in mind.

AND it is exactly here that the Leadenhall Street treaty breaks down, for the one point on which M. de Lesseps and the shipowners are not agreed, is the one point which is of national importance, and the one on which the country will surely insist, notwithstanding all the polite things which have been said to and by M. de Lesseps.

M. CHARLES DE LESSEPS, who acted for the Company, cannot agree that the shares held by the British Government should be made to carry adequate voting power at the meetings of the shareholders. Whatever the opinion of the present Government may be on this matter, we have no very accurate means of judging. But I do not think that many months will pass before it is borne in upon M. de Lesseps's mind that the people of this country know perfectly well what is necessary to safeguard our interests in the Egyptian water-way to the East, and are quietly determined to have it.

UNFORTUNATELY for M. de Lesseps he has, in making not very extensive concessions to British shipowners, irritated the French shareholders, some of whom have expressed their dissatisfaction in the emphatic form of infernal machines. M. de Lesseps, like a good many other people, is experiencing the difficulties which attend upon running with the hare and hunting with the hounds.

IT is satisfactory to know that the judges, with a single exception, are unanimous in declaring that the bad example set in Mr. Charles Russell's speech in the defence of O'Donnell is not to be admitted as a precedent. It is difficult enough already to keep the minds of jurors fixed upon the circumstance that they have nothing to do with anything but facts, and counsel have already quite enough opportunities of confusing their hearers with ingenious speculation instead of adhering to truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL's excuse for the dramatic recital of the story of a series of events which never took place and which was entirely unsupported by any sort of evidence, was that, if the prisoner had been undefended by counsel, he would have been at liberty to make the statement himself. But it is obvious that when such a story is told by counsel an entirely false glamour is thrown over it, and there is serious danger that jurymen may confound the tale with the teller and accept it, as if it were a statement of facts within his own knowledge, instead of being mere sound and fury, signifying little or nothing.

IT is a curious thing that all the action which the Government of the United States has hitherto taken for the suppression of Mormonism in Utah has resulted in failure, and that President Arthur should be obliged to express himself in favour of the repeal of the Act on which the Government of Utah Territory depends, and the assumption by Congress of the entire political control there. That is to say, Utah has successfully defied the United States for many years, and it is found that the only way to abolish polygamy is actually to stamp it out.

THE Whalley will case reads like the plot of a novel by Mr. Wilkie Collins or M. Gaboriau, and is chiefly remarkable for an amount of perjury which would have astonished even a Welsh County Court judge. In the course of the case one more popular belief was declared by experts to be a delusion. There is no such thing, it appears, as "rubbing out" pencil marks with india-rubber. The filaments of the paper are only rubbed over the marks, which are as likely as not to reappear in the course of time, as, indeed, happened in the present case.

IT is not everyone who is a judge of hanging, and it must be left to experts to decide whether the theory of the present or that of the late executioner is the more in accordance with physiological facts, but it is very easy to decide that the employment of a hangman as to whose sobriety there can be the slightest doubt is altogether improper, and that, if he makes a public-house exhibition of himself and the implements of his trade, he ought to be dismissed forthwith.

It would have been pleasant to think that the offer of a peerage to Mr. Alfred Tennyson had been intended simply as an honour to literature, and that it had been accepted as such. The connections of Mr. Tennyson's family with courtly society, and the fact that Mr. Tennyson himself is specially a persona grata with the Prime Minister, would, however, in all probability, have had more to do with the matter than any respect for literature, which, unless it is allied with money or rank, does not receive much favour from Court or State in this country. But, as a matter of fact, the offer appears only to have existed in the too fertile brain of a writer for the newspapers.

MANY people will think that Mr. F. C. Burnand is a little too severe, week after week, in Punch, on amateur actors and on scions of noble families who take to the stage as a profession whether they have the necessary talent or not. Amateur actors are all very well in their way, and "everybody"—including the genially caustic editor of Punch himself—has at some time or another figured in their ranks.

BUT the thing becomes a nuisance and a subject for derision when one finds an entire column of the Daily Telegraph, in leader type, devoted to a notice of a performance of "The Merchant of Venice" by a club of Oxford undergraduates. There is no earthly reason why these young gentlemen should not amuse themselves with amateur acting, but that their immature efforts should be treated in a great daily paper with as much detail and as much gush as is commonly devoted to a first-rate performance at a leading London theatre is simply ridiculous.

THE production of "Claudian" at the Princess's Theatre is a remarkably interesting theatrical event, in that it proves that an alliance between the poetical drama and that which concerns itself more immediately with strong situations and sensational effects is not only possible but distinctly advantageous. From almost all points of view, indeed, "Claudian" is an excellent play, and, as it has besides the good fortune to be mounted with that keen appreciation of the artistic and that subtle attention to detail of which Mr. Wilson Barrett is so perfect a master, it seems certain to maintain the hold on popular favour which it deservedly won on the first night.

THE one objection to the play is that, from the very nature of the story, there is a certain similarity between various links in its chain of events, but the main interest is, after all, so strong that the defect is scarcely apparent while the play is in progress, and only assumes any large proportions when colder after-consideration comes to a closer analysis than is possible during the performance itself. Except in the comic scenes, which are even puerile at times, Mr. Will's dialogue is as good as Mr. Herman's construction, and both authors may be congratulated on a well-earned success.

MR. WILSON BARRETT has rarely given the public a more carefully finished or a sounder piece of acting than his "Claudian," which for delicacy, pathos, and sustained power, deserves to rank among the most remarkable performances of our time. Never for one moment does he falter in the execution of a most arduous task; and never for one moment does he lose the hold on the audience which he secures on his first entrance. His natural advantages of feature, voice, and bearing are exactly what are wanted for the part, and a studiously simple but most picturesque costume completes the picture.

THE principal female character is played by Miss Eastlake with many touches of sympathetic art, but with a certain tendency to monotony which impairs its general effect; Miss Emmeline Ormsby is very interesting and effective; Miss Mary Dickens—I quote from the Standard—"made a most successful appearance" in a very pretty and pathetic little part; and Miss Helen Bruno delivers her one important speech with considerable force and impressiveness. It is a pity that the authors could not have contrived to provide an adequate part for so sound and capable an actress as Mrs. Huntley.

THE same feeling of regret will also be felt by all who see the play that so little is given to that excellent actor, Mr. E. S. Willard, and that Mr. George Barrett, who is deservedly a favourite with the Princess's audience, absolutely has no chance of making anything of the inane comic lover. Mr. Speakman, on the other hand, has a fair opportunity and makes the most of it, and there is some thoroughly good acting in Mr. Hudson's nefarious Tetrarch. Minor parts are well filled by Mr. Frank Cooper, Mr. Huntley, and Mr. Fulton, and, indeed, as is always the case at this theatre, every part, down to the very smallest, is represented with the utmost care.

SCENERY, dresses, and stage management are all admirable, and the earthquake in the second act is a wonderful piece of stage effect, and I feel sure that the general opinion on the first night, when the play went without a hitch, was that Mr. Wilson Barrett and the little army of workers whom he leads so courageously and so ably may be congratulated on a victory well-earned and well-deserved.

Remarkable Memories.

THE memory for figures, or power of mental calculation, is well-known to all of us, either by its presence or its absence. Jedediah Buxton, George Bidder, and Zerah Colburn, are instances too familiarly known to need detail here. George Watson, the Sussex calculator, could tell the dates of every day since he was a child, and what he was doing on that day; he could show many other strange freaks of memory; but was a heavy, ignorant fellow generally, very vain of his one acquirement.

The memory of languages is quite a distinct faculty, so far as can be judged from recorded instances. Mithridates, we are told, could converse, in their own languages, to the natives of twenty-three countries which were under his sway. Cardinal Mezzofanti appears to have had the faculty in a stronger degree than any other person that ever lived. While educating for the priesthood, he learned Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish, French, German, and Swedish. As a professor at some of the Italian universities he constantly added to his store; until, at the age of forty-three, he could read in twenty languages, and converse in eighteen. In 1841, when he was sixty-seven years old, he was as well acquainted with Portuguese, English, Dutch, Danish, Russian, Polish, Bohemian, Servian, Magyar, Turkish, Irish, Welsh, Wallachian, Albanian, Bulgarian, Illyrian, Lettish, Lappish, as with the language he had first learned; while to Arabic he added Persian, Sanscrit, Koordish, Georgian, Syriac, Chaldee, Samaritan, Chinese, Coptic, Ethiopic, Abyssinian, and other Asiatic and African tongues. At the time of his death, in 1849, Mezzofanti could write, and converse fluently, in more than seventy languages.

All the other accounts of memory for words are poor as compared with this; nevertheless, many of them are sufficiently remarkable. John Kemble used to say that he could learn a whole number of the Morning Post in four days; and General Christie made a similar assertion; but it is not known how far either of them verified their statements.

Robert Dillon could repeat in the morning six columns of a newspaper which he had read overnight. During the Repeal debate in the House of Commons, now nearly fifty years ago, one of the members wrote out his speech, sent it to the newspapers, and repeated it to the House in the evening; it was found to be verbatim the same as that which he had written out. John Fuller, a land agent in Norfolk, could remember every word of a sermon and write it out correctly when he got home; this was tested by comparing his written account with the clergyman's manuscript. Seneca could repeat two thousand words on hearing them once. Scaliger could repeat a hundred verses or more after having read them a single time. Magliabechi, who had a prodigious memory, was once put to a severe test. A gentleman lent him a manuscript, which was read and returned; the owner some time afterwards, pretending he had lost it, begged Magliabechi to write out as much as he could remember; whereupon the latter, appealing to his memory, wrote out the whole essay. Cyrus, if some of the old historians are to be credited, could remember the name of every soldier in his immense army. There was a Corsican boy who could rehearse forty thousand words, whether sense or nonsense, as they were dictated, and then repeat them in the reversed order without making a single mistake. A physician of Massachusetts, about sixty years ago, could repeat the whole of "Paradise Lost" without a mistake, although he had not read it for twenty years. Euler, the great mathematician, when he became blind, could repeat the whole of Virgil's "Æneid," and could remember the first line and the last line in every page of the particular edition which he had been accustomed to read before he became blind.

One kind of retentive memory may be considered as the result of sheer hard work, a determination towards one particular achievement, without reference either to cultivation, or to memory on other subjects. This is frequently shown by persons in humble life in regard to the Bible. An old beggar-man at Stirling, known about fifty years ago as Blind Alick, afforded an instance of this. He knew the whole of the Bible by heart; inasmuch that if a sentence were read to him, he could name book, chapter, and verse; or if the book, chapter, and verse were named, he could give the exact words. A gentleman, to test him, repeated a verse, purposely making one verbal inaccuracy; Alick hesitated, named the place where the passage is to be found, but at the same time pointed out the verbal error. The same gentleman asked him to repeat the ninetyeth verse of the seventh chapter of the book of Numbers. Alick almost instantly replied: "There is no such verse; that chapter has only eighty-nine verses." Gassendi had acquired by heart six thousand Latin verses, and, in order to give his memory exercise, he was in the habit daily of reciting six hundred verses from different languages. Saunderson, another mathematician, could repeat all Horace's odes, and a great part of the other Latin authors. La Croze, after listening to twelve verses in as many languages, could not only repeat them in the order in which he heard them, but could also transpose them. Pope had an excellent memory, and many persons have amused themselves by looking through his writings, and pointing out how often he had brought it into play. He was able to turn with great readiness to the precise place in a book where he had seen any passages that had struck him. John Lynden had a very peculiar faculty for getting things by rote, and he could repeat correctly any long, dry document, such as an Act of Parliament, after having heard it read; but if he wanted any single paragraph, he was obliged to begin at the beginning, and proceed with his recital until he came to what he required. There was a French novelist, who, being a printer, composed a volume in type, and thus the book was printed without having been written. Bishop Warburton had a prodigious memory, which he taxed to an extraordinary degree. His "Divine Legation" would lead one to suppose that he had indefatigably collected and noted down the innumerable facts and quotations there introduced; but his only note-book was an old almanack, in which he occasionally jotted down a thought. Scaliger obtained so perfect a knowledge of one Latin book that he offered to repeat any passage with a dagger at his breast, to be used against him in case of a failure of memory.

Cookery.

A LITTLE DINNER-PARTY.

AT this time of the year it often happens that people wish to entertain their friends at a little dinner-party, but because of the expense, or because of the difficulty of cooking a dinner of several courses by an ordinary range, they are obliged to forego this pleasure. These questions, however, both of difficulty and of expense, resolve themselves into one of management.

First, then, as to the cost of the dishes given in the bill of fare. It will be seen by the recipe for hare soup, that sufficient for a party of eight or ten persons can be made at little more than the cost of the hare; indeed, if the suggestion is followed to reserve a portion for an entrée, it will be less. The price of fish varies so much that it is not possible to estimate it; but sometimes one kind is more moderate than another, and it should always be possible to have a nice dish of fish at a cost not exceeding six shillings. A piece of braised beef is a handsome dish, and as only a portion of it will be consumed by the guests, the cost will be small. The same may be said of a goose, which is now often sold by weight in London at so low a rate as eightpence-halfpenny a pound for prime qualities. Ptarmigan are inexpensive, and as two birds will make the salmi, three to four shillings should cover the cost of this dish. The sweet dishes are cheap enough, and can be prepared the day before they are required.

Having thus disposed of the question of expense we come to that which is generally less easy to set aside—that of cooking a dinner of several courses. One cause of failure in quiet little entertainments is that too much strain is often put on the roasting department. An inexperienced housekeeper will arrange for a roast joint, poultry, and game, and although the cook may be on her mettle, and try to accomplish what she is assured is done in other houses, it is ten to one if all the dishes are not injured. It will be seen in our bill of fare that the work for the range is pretty equally divided between boiling, stewing, baking, and roasting, and that some of the dishes can be ready a little beforehand, so that the cook's attention may not be diverted from the fish and roast, which require watching at the last moment. In a kitchen where there is only one pair of hands to do everything, even when these are both clever and experienced, a good deal of management and forethought are required to secure the success of "only a little dinner." Every preparation should be made early in the day, all things bought and sent in certainly before noon. The soup will, of course, be made the day before, and only require to be finished when wanted. The fish on coming in will be treated with vinegar or lemon-juice as directed, and the flavour will thereby be much improved. The goose will be all the better, too, for being stuffed early in the day, and the giblets will require to be well boiled in order to make the gravy rich and of fine flavour. The same must be said of the ptarmigan, which would not suffer by being prepared the day, before if necessary.

No entrées are given in this menu, because nearly all the dinner being of made dishes, they are not required as in the case of plain roast and boiled.

MENU.

Hare Soup.
Brill à la Crème.	Purée of Endive.
Braised Ribs of Beef.	Chutney Sauce.
Roast Goose.	Salmi of Ptarmigan.
Victoria Pudding.	Orange Cream.
Strawberry Tartlets.

HARE SOUP.

Roast a fine hare for a quarter of an hour, and having cut away the meat in long slices from the back bone, put it aside to make an entrée, or, if economy is not an object, use the whole of the hare. Cut up the body of the hare, and put it with the gravy which has dripped in roasting into the stock-pot with a slice of lean ham or bacon bones, four onions fried, a carrot, turnip, celery, a small bundle of thyme and parsley, half-a-dozen peppercorns, a blade of mace, and two quarts of stock. When you have skimmed the pot, cover closely, and let it boil gently for three hours; then strain the soup, take off the fat, and having allowed it to boil up, thicken with French potato and ordinary flour. Stir in a teaspoonful of powdered sugar, add salt if necessary, and a little cayenne-pepper, and when about to serve, a glass of port wine.

This soup is finer if half a pint to a pint of claret is used instead of the same quantity of stock. In this case port wine will not be needed.

BRILL À LA CRÈME.

Choose a thick and perfectly fresh brill, pass a knife down the backbone so as to detach without removing the flesh or in any way injuring the appearance of the fish. Put two or three spoonfuls of French vinegar in a dish, pass the brill through it on both sides, and having lightly rubbed with salt, let it lie for an hour or two, then press between the bone and the flesh a stuffing made as follows: Soak the crumb of a French roll in cold milk, squeeze it as dry as possible, put it in a stewpan with an ounce of butter, the yolk of an egg, a pinch of salt, and a few grains of cayenne-pepper. Work the mixture over the fire until it is smooth and compact, then take half its weight in fresh lobster, pounded in a mortar, or of preserved lobster, and half a teaspoonful of essence of anchovy. Put this stuffing into the fish. Having done this, lay the fish, black side downwards, in a well buttered tin baking-dish, with a gill of sauterne or other wine of a similar character, a teaspoonful each of French chili, of shalot vinegar, and of essence of anchovy. Bake for about an hour, basting the fish frequently with the liquor, taking care it does not become the least brown. By the time the brill is done have ready a good white sauce made as follows: Mix a dessertspoonful of fine flour in two of cold milk, stir on to it a gill of boiling cream, or of milk which has been reduced from half a pint to a gill by slowly boiling it; stir the sauce over the fire for five minutes, beat in two ounces of fine fresh butter and the yolk of an egg, stir until both are well mixed in, strain the liquor in which the fish was cooked into the sauce, stirring briskly as you do it. Put the brill on a dish, pour the sauce over, and serve very hot.

BRAISED RIBS OF BEEF.

Choose the long rib, and, having removed the bone, roll the meat round tightly, securing it with bands of broad tape or calico. Put the meat either into the braising-pot with a little minced beef-suet or dripping, and fry quickly until brown on both sides. This done, put the bones, broken up small, a tablespoonful of salt, a dozen peppercorns, two onions lightly fried, a carrot and turnip cut up small, a bundle of sweet herbs, and sufficient broth or water to come half-way up the meat. Let the pot boil rapidly for five minutes, then draw it to the side of the range and let it simmer gently for two hours. Once during the cooking turn the meat, and when it is tender take it out and keep hot whilst you prepare the gravy, which strain, and having taken off all the fat, boil down to half-glaze in a stewpan without a lid. Now put the meat and the gravy, which, if necessary, may be enriched by the addition of a little gelatine, into the pot, and having turned the former about until well glazed, put it on its dish, with a purée of endive, prepared as follows:

PURÉE OF ENDIVE.

Choose a fine white head, wash, pick, and pour boiling water over, let it lie for ten minutes, then squeeze perfectly dry, chop, and put it into a stewpan with a teaspoonful of salt, and a cupful of white broth or milk. Having stewed the endive until tender, add enough potato-flour to make the sauce thick, and when ready to serve stir in a little lemon-juice.

ROAST GOOSE.

Mix four ounces of onion, put them in a stewpan with an ounce of butter, cover closely, and let them cook gently, without taking the least colour, until they are tender, then mix them with four teaspoonfuls of fresh sage, dried quickly on the hot-plate, and rubbed to a fine powder through a sieve, and season with black pepper and salt. Put this stuffing in the body of the goose some hours before roasting it, and let it lie breast downwards. Roast for an hour and a quarter to an hour and a half, basting frequently, and browning the bird equally.

The gravy for goose should be made of the giblets, and if household stock is at hand will be very good without the addition of beef. Fry the giblets nicely, allow two large onions, also fried, and a small bundle of sweet-herbs, and boil for two hours. Strain, allow the gravy to cool, remove all fat, season to taste, and let it again boil up. If liked, thicken slightly with potato-flour. Gravy, unless in a small quantity by way of garnish, should not be put upon the dish with game or poultry of any kind, as it is apt to cause inconvenience to the carver, and enough of it cannot be given with each serving.

Part of the liver of the goose, after it has been lightly cooked, can be minced, and added to the seasoning, and is a good addition to it.

CHUTNEY SAUCE.

This is suggested as a change, and perhaps a refinement, on apple-sauce. Chutney is a pickle which should be home-made; although the season is somewhat advanced, it might still be made by the recipe given in the Correspondence Column of HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 125.

Make a gill of claret hot, stir in a teacupful of chutney; then stir both together over a slow fire for three or four minutes, but do not let the sauce boil. It should be both hot, sweet, and rather thick, a little cayenne and sugar being added if necessary.

SALMI OF PTARMIGAN.

Lightly roast a pair of ptarmigan, let them get cool, cut up into joints, remove the skin, reserve the best pieces for the salmi, and use the other portions with the skin for the gravy. Put these trimmings into a stewpan with three gills of plain beef gravy, a gill of claret, two onions lightly fried, a small bundle of sweet-herbs, four peppercorns, two cloves, two shallots, and half a teaspoonful of salt. Boil gently for an hour, or until reduced to half a pint. Having strained and taken off the fat, let the gravy boil up, and thicken it with an ounce of butter and an ounce of flour, which have been worked together over the fire into a smooth paste. Put in the pieces of ptarmigan, let them get hot through, and serve with triangular pieces of fried bread round the dish.

VICTORIA PUDDING.

A quarter of a pound of breadcrumbs, three ounces of suet shred very finely, a quarter of a pound of apple marmalade, the juice of half a lemon and the peel grated, two ounces of sifted loaf-sugar, one egg, and a small pinch of salt. Mix all together; put the pudding into a buttered mould, and boil for three hours. Make a sauce by mixing two teaspoonfuls of potato-flour in cold water, and a quarter of a pint of boiling water. Stir in a tablespoonful of apple marmalade, a little lemon-juice and flavouring, simmer for five minutes, stir in half an ounce of butter, pour round the pudding, and serve.

ORANGE CREAM.

Boil the finely-shred peel of three oranges for ten minutes with four ounces of lump-sugar and three gills of milk, strain and dissolve in it half an ounce of gelatine, whip it with the juice of the oranges and that of one lemon; or, if preferred, instead of the last, half a teaspoonful of citric acid dissolved in a little water.

Whipped cream can be added; but the cream will be found excellent without this addition.

STRAWBERRY TARTLETS.

Fill puff-pastry cases with strawberries preserved whole, and on the top pile whipped cream.

Books for Presents

AND

Christmas Cards.

"KEEPSAKES," and "Books of Beauty," and other expensively-got-up forms of Christmas presents, had their day, and a very flourishing day, too, some forty years ago, and were succeeded by gift-books which improved printing and engraving processes made it possible to produce at much more reasonable prices, and now the custom of giving books as Yule-tide presents appears to be rapidly dying out. Except with firms who cater principally for boys and girls there is hardly even the pretence nowadays of making any special effort at this time of the year. Probably Christmas literature has been almost altogether killed by the development of the Christmas Number system, just as magazines generally have exerted a great, and as many people think, a paralyzing, influence on modern English literature as a whole. And it is noticeable that the subject of Christmas is the one subject which appears to be most studiously avoided in the few books which are published at Christmas-time.

IN noticing last year the publications of MESSRS. GRIFFITH AND FARRAN, of St. Paul's Churchyard, we described their selection as being both extensive and varied, and the remark is equally applicable to the very large collection which they have sent this year. The facsimile reproductions of the old-fashioned Lion's Masquerade, Peacock at Home, Elephant's Ball, and Butterfly's Ball (1s. each) are curious, and mark the extraordinary difference between what is demanded by our children and what satisfied our fathers, and contrast strangely with the pretty Holly Series (6d. each), half-a-dozen books of rhymes with coloured pictures by Ida Waugh, which are sure to be favourably received in the nursery. The Fool's Paradise (2s. 6d.) is a selection from Mr. Hotten's two volumes, made up from the funny "Münchener Bilderbogen," the humour of which is specially appropriate to the pantomime season. Of a very different class is Keble's Evening Hymn, with illustrations produced, it is to be presumed, in America, to the artists and engravers of which country are also due the numerous illustrations to Mrs. Sandford's From May to Christmas at Thorne Hill (5s.), a bright and lively book for children, but perhaps rather too American for our boys and girls. Yet another American production is an illustrated edition of Edgar Poe's ever popular Raven, in which the genius of the poet has had but a faint influence upon the artist. Nora's Trust (2s. 6d.), by Mrs. Gellie, and The Count and the Cottage (3s. 6d.), by Emma Marshall, are illustrated books for girls, and Growing Up (2s. 6d.), a story of some West Indian children, by Jennett Humphreys, with sufficiently uninteresting pictures, is described as a story of girls which boys may read. Stronger food for male youth is provided in the other half-dozen or so volumes provided by this firm, the titles of which will show the stirring nature of the subjects with which they deal. From Cadet to Captain (5s.), a tale of Military Life, by J. Percy Groves; In Time of War (3s. 6d.), by James F. Cobb; Middy and Ensign, or, the Jungle Station (6s.), by G. Manville Fenn, a very ingenious olio of wild adventure and incident; Paddy Finn, or, the Adventures of a Midshipman (6s.), by the late W. H. G. Kingston; and Friends though Divided, a Tale of the Civil War (5s.), by G. A. Henty, who seems to have taken the place in the affections of English boys, so long occupied by Mr. Kingston. All these books are sound in tone and can be recommended as presents for boys.

MESSRS. BICKERS AND SON, of Leicester Square, have published a series of seven translations, by Professor R. B. Anderson, of the works of Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson, the Norwegian novelist, who is well known among his own people and in the north of Europe generally, but whose stories are perhaps a little too local in their interest to become largely popular amongst the young people of this country, for whom the present issue is presumably intended, and who will be more repelled than attracted by the odd-looking Norwegian names. Messrs. Bickers and Son's other publications have not the charm of novelty, but Southey's Life of Nelson, Edgar's Heroes of England, and Dr. Kippis's Voyages of Captain Cook, will always be attractive to high-spirited boys, and the Tales from Shakespeare of Charles and Mary Lamb are always useful as a sort of Shakespearian primer.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE AND CO., of Bedford Street, have, in the "Queen's Gift Series," quite a library of little illustrated books of rather unequal merit, the drawing of the pictures generally being a good deal below the standard required even for children's books nowadays, and it will be a very inexperienced young lady or gentleman indeed who fails to remark the extreme badness of the drawings in The Birthday Party. The Afternoon Tea Painting Book (1s.), with illustrations by J. G. Sowerby and H. H. Emmerson, contains a large collection of pictures to be coloured by youthful amateurs, which ought to provide plenty of occupation for thousands of little paint-brushes. "Aunt Louisa" is again to the fore for the benefit of her little friends, with a volume of Ships, Birds, and Wonder Tales, with twenty-four pages of original illustrations, admirably printed in colours by Kronheim, and Messrs. Warne's collection is completed by two story books for young people, Only a Child, by M. A. Ellis, and Blindman's Holiday, the latter of which must not be confounded with Mr. W. W. Fenn's collection of stories and essays, which was published some months ago under the same title.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE AND SONS, of the Broadway, Ludgate Hill, have had the happy thought of publishing versions of Robinson Crusoe and the Swiss Family Robinson in words of one syllable, with a copious supply of pictures, coloured and otherwise. The other books comprised in Messrs. Routledge's collection are very varied in character. They are Nights with Uncle Remus, another series of stories by Joel Chandler Harris, which will be acceptable to people who have not yet tired of the peculiar humour of Brer Rabbit and Company; Bacon's Essays, a volume of Professor Morley's Universal Library; Old Wives' Fables, a collection of tales of ogres and witches and all sorts of wonders, by Edward Laboulaye—translations we presume—with any quantity of amusing illustrations; a curiously, and to say truth, not a very pleasantly illustrated Coloured Bible for the Young, the value of which, from any point of view, is not quite apparent; the Children's Christmas, a set of nine carols and choruses with music; the Bible Emblem Anniversary Book, by the compilers of the "Floral Birthday Book," a work which consists of texts for every day, with more or less appropriate illustrations, poetical and pictorial; Robin Hood, a collection of poems, songs, and ballads relative to the popular outlaw, edited by J. Ritson; King Arthur and His Knights of the Round Table, founded on Sir Thomas Malory's history, by Henry Frith; and, by the same author, Ascents and Adventures, a series of anecdotes of mountain climbing.

SINCE the above paragraph was in type, we have received another large parcel of books from MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE, the most important of which are a number of illustrated story and poetry books for young readers, typical among them being Snow Flakes, and Little Bird Red and Little Bird Blue, by M. Betham Edwards; The Old Farm Gate, and Sunday Talks with Mamma, and For Very Little People, by Mrs. Sale Barker. A volume of little drawing-room plays called Lazarella, and comprising pieces by such well-known writers as Mr. E. L. Blanchard and Mr. W. Yardley, will be welcome at this season to many a troupe of juvenile comedians. Of the other publications issued from the Broadway, we have only space to mention the re-issues of those popular favourites, Elizabeth, or, The Exiles of Siberia; Grimm's Household Stories; Hans Christian Andersen's tales; and Every Boy's Book; the last named of which has again been revised and brought up to date under the able editorship of Mr. Edmund Routledge, and is as complete an encyclopædia of sports and amusements as any boy can desire.

MESSRS. DEAN AND SON, of 160A, Fleet Street, are inexhaustible caterers for the little ones, and send quite a bewildering assortment of coloured picture-books at most moderate prices. Among these are Buckets and Spades, nursery rhymes with music; So Happy, and At the Mother's Knee (each 3s. 6d.), verses and pictures; The Twinkling Eye series (6d.); the Graphic Alphabet series (6d.); Fresh Gathered, and Over the Hills (each 1s. 6d.), the latter, perhaps, the best of all; At Home and Abroad, and Dotty's Pets (1s. each); The Rose and Lily series (each 6d.); and The Little Gem packet (1s.), containing no fewer than twenty-four little books of coloured pictures. Certainly mamma or auntie must be very hard to please if she cannot find suitable presents among Messrs. Dean's publications.

MESSRS. CASSELL AND CO. (LIMITED), of Belle Sauvage Yard, only send Treasure Island, a story for boys, constructed on somewhat familiar lines by Robert Louis Stevenson, and Sunlight and Shade, being Poems and Pictures of Life and Nature, very profusely and beautifully illustrated.

MESSRS. HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S collection comprises a number of story-books of a graver tone than is the case with the Christmas books of most of the other publishers, and may be equally divided into books for girls and books for boys. The former are, In a Corner of the Vineyard, a village story by Isaac Pleydell; Nelly Channell (3s. 6d.), by Sarah Doudney; Hermie's Rosebuds, and other Stories (3s. 6d.), by L. T. Meade; and Busy Hands and Patient Hearts, and Seppel (each 2s. 6d.), translations from the German of Gustav Nieritz. The books for boys are, A Brave Resolve, and The Beggars, by J. B. Liefde, presumably translations; A Life of George Washington, by William M. Thayer; Grey Hawk, Life and Adventures Among the Red Indians, by Dr. James Macaulay; and Wild Adventures Round the Pole, a truly thrilling nautical story, by Dr. Gordon Stables.

ONLY two books have reached us from MESSRS. MACMILLAN, of Bedford Street: Hannah Tarne, a story by the author of "Mr. Grey-smith," with illustrations by W. J. Hennessey, which will be found suitable for girls; and Two Little Waifs, a pleasantly written tale of two little English children temporarily lost, or rather mislaid, in Paris, from the agreeable pen of Mrs. Molesworth, and illustrated by Walter Crane, which is sure to be popular with younger readers.

In concluding our notices of Books for Presents, we may remark, as we have had occasion to do on previous occasions, on the strange reluctance which publishers appear to have to disclosing the prices of their books. Why the price should not be printed on the title-page it is difficult to understand.

MESSRS. EYRE AND SPOTTISWOODE, of Great New Street, have issued some very novel and extremely pretty calendars, illustrated with coloured floral subjects in excellent taste, and their collection of Christmas Cards is as varied and attractive as ever. Floral subjects predominate, but there is something suitable to all tastes.

From MESSRS. S. HILDESHEIMER AND CO. comes quite a bewildering selection of cards, executed with all the artistic care and taste for which this firm has gained so distinguished a name. Very pretty and ingenious are the folding cards, which, when opened, disclose bouquets of artificial flowers, and of a similar kind is the group of the Nativity, the latter having the additional advantage of being appropriate to the season, as is also the series of Winter Berries and Leaves, prettily frosted, and also the wreaths of leaves and berries in threefold ornamental colours. The series of half-a-dozen Etchings Round about Stratford-on-Avon, by Wilfrid Ball, are also distinguished by much artistic merit. To attempt to enumerate all the subjects with which Messrs. Hildesheimer's artists have dealt would require more space than we can spare, and we must content ourselves with saying that we have come upon nothing which is not in good taste.

MESSRS. HILDESHEIMER AND FAULKNER are also represented by a large assortment of cards, which are quite up to their usual standard of excellence. Among those which may be specially mentioned are some exquisite studies of flowers, by W. J. Muckley; some quaint and novel miniature screens, also decorated with floral subjects, by M. E. Duffield; a set of capital cats, by L. and H. Coudery; the prettily-bound selections from the English poets; and Ernest Wilson's novel landscape arrangements.

MESSRS. RAPHAEL TUCK AND SONS, whose last year's issue of cards, after designs by members of the Royal Academy and other distinguished artists, will, no doubt, be remembered by our readers, have not this year attempted so ambitious a flight, and their cards for this season, although containing many pretty pictures at most reasonable prices, are, for the most part, on familiar lines, and not specially remarkable for novelty of design. It would seem indeed as if Messrs. Tuck and the other first-class publishers of Christmas Cards had already done all that can possibly or reasonably be hoped for.

Courting in Texas.

THIS is how a fond couple of Texan lovers come to an understanding, according to one who pretends to know.

He sits on one side of the room in a big white rocking-chair; she on the other side in a little white oak rocking-chair. A long-eared deerhound is by his side, a basket of sewing by hers; both the young couple rock incessantly. He sighs heavily, and looks out of a west window at a myrtle-tree; she sings lightly, and gazes out of the east window at a turnip patch. At last he remarks: "This is mighty good weather for cotton-picking." "'Tis that," the lady responds, "if we only had any to pick." The rocking continues. "What's your dog's name?" asked she. "Cooney." Another sigh-broken stillness. "What's he good for?" "What is who good for?" says he abstractedly. "Your dog, Cooney." "For ketching 'possums." Silence for half an hour. "He looks like a deerhound." "Who looks like a deerhound?" "Cooney." "He is; but he's sort of bellowed, an' gettin' old an' slow, an' he ain't no count on a cold trail." In the quiet ten minutes that ensues she takes two stitches in her quilt, a gorgeous affair made after the pattern called "Rose of Sharon." "Your ma raising many chickens?" "Forty odd." Then more rocking, and somehow the big rocking-chair and the little rocking-chair are jammed side by side, and rocking is impossible. "Makin' quilts?" he observes. "Yes," she replies, brightening up, for she is great on quilts. "I've just finished a gorgeous 'Eagle of Brazil,' a 'Setting Sun,' and a 'Nation's Pride.' Have you ever seen the 'Yellow Rose of the Prairie'?" "No." More silence. Then he says: "Do you love cabbage?" "I do that." Presently his hand is accidentally laid on hers, of which she does not seem to be at all aware. Then he suddenly says: "I've a great mind to bite you." "What have you a great mind to bite me for?" "Kase you won't have me." "Kase you ain't axed me." "Well, now I ax you." "Then now I has you." Cooney dreams he hears a sound of kissing, and the next day the young man goes after a marriage-license.

Household Gardening.

SEVERE weather, even if it is not present, may occur at any time, and owners of cherished window-plants should be on the alert, or the work of a year, or much longer, may be destroyed in a night. While it is impossible that plants that are in a growing state can have too much light, or be placed too close to the glass in mild weather, it is not safe to trust them there during cold nights.

PLANTS IN ROOMS.

Numbers of plants are killed every year which might have been saved by removing them from the windows to a table or mantelpiece, when frost is imminent. It is obvious they have as much light there after nightfall as if they were left close to the glass, while they have the inestimable advantage of several degrees of higher temperature. During the day, when there are fires in rooms, the plants may be safe enough near the windows, but at night they are often in extreme danger.

A FROST INDICATOR.

A little water in a saucer placed near the glass, or a damp sponge, will indicate the presence or absence of frost, and if there is the slightest suspicion of the formation of ice remove the plants at once, and stand them in the best position at command for making them safe.

FROST-BITTEN PLANTS.

Although many persons will prevent their plants being injured by prompt action, others will fail to do so, and will be surprised and annoyed to find that the frost has reached them when they are examined early on some cold morning.

When this is the case it is not uncommon for the plants to be removed and placed near the fire, with the object of thawing them. This is the very worst thing that can be done, and is almost sure to end in killing them.

Frozen plants should certainly be quickly taken from the windows, but they should be stood in a cool, not a warm position; indeed it cannot be too cold, provided they are out of the reach of frost.

The change to a warmer temperature cannot possibly be too gradual, and it is often of great advantage to sprinkle them with cold water, as this, even if apparently "stinging" cold, will, and must be a few degrees warmer than the frosted plants, or it would not retain its fluid state.

Sprinkling plants with warm water would be certain death to them, but the quite cold application has often saved their lives.

PLANTS IN FRAMES.

Whatever these may be, let them be kept dry during severe weather. When the soil in which a plant is established is quite dry it will endure far more frost than when it is wet.

Auriculas, for instance, those most charming of Alpine plants, that so many people might grow in a box with a glazed roof over it, will need little or no water now. Thousands of the most valuable sorts are regularly wintered in cold frames, and provided they are kept dry, not one in a thousand is killed, or even injured during a very severe winter.

Carnations of the choicer varieties, and no flowers are more beautiful, are similarly preserved, and no water is given, except when the soil approaches a dry state. When this occurs, water is essential, but it is applied with the greatest care, not a drop being spilt on the foliage. That is a very important precaution, and, however simple it may appear, should never be overlooked in the management of plants in cold frames during the winter months.

PLANTS IN WINDOW-BOXES.

Boxes on the outside of window-sills cannot be kept dry, but still as the plants in them are hardy, they are seldom injured if they are not watered in frosty weather. We have known persons give a little warm water to the plants when the soil was crisp. This should never be done, as the practice is decidedly unsafe. A layer of moss or cocoanut-fibre refuse spread on the surface of the soil is often of great benefit, but no water should be given until the frost has left the soil.

SNOW AS A PROTECTOR.

When snow falls during frosty weather it should never be removed from plants in the open air, except in some instances when its weight threatens to break them. No material that can be applied is equal to this, and no matter how long the plants may be covered with it, they never suffer through the absence of light. This is evident by the bright green grass which is so refreshing after the snow has melted, even if it has covered the ground for months.

COVERING FRAMES.

The fact above noticed demonstrates that plants, when frozen, do not suffer if kept in total darkness, for the grass can have no light when deeply buried in snow. Yet it never blanches, that is, turns a light colour, as it would do if it were not frozen. It is precisely the same with all other plants. We have often kept frames containing half-hardy plants, such as bedding Calceolarias, Pansies, Hollyhocks, and other kinds above noticed, thickly covered with straw night and day, for weeks, and when the frost departed the plants were as fresh as ever after their long period of darkness; but we were careful to let them be slightly frosted before covering them. When plants in frames, therefore, are sent to sleep by frost, let them sleep in darkness. Do not remove the covering until a thaw occurs, and then remove it gradually, letting them have light by degrees, and all will be well.

BULBS IN POTS.

Examine Hyacinths, Tulips, and other bulbs that were potted and buried a month or more ago, and withdraw them if they have grown more than half an inch, those that have not grown to that extent to be left covered until they have.

The growths made under the covering will be nearly white. In this state it is not advisable to place them in the sun; indeed, they should not for a week be exposed to the full daylight.

There is no better plan than to quite cover the tender-looking crowns with moss, and keep it damp, the moisture being refreshing. In the course of three or four days most of the moss may be removed, and in about a week the crowns will be green, light then being essential.

The pots will now be crowded with white fleshy roots, and these must never be dry. The soil must not be soddened, but must at all times be decidedly moist, and on the very first symptoms of its being otherwise water must be given copiously. Let the plants have all the light possible, being careful to have them out of the reach of frost, and in due time fine spikes and beautiful flowers will be produced.

HYACINTHS IN WATER.

The glasses in which the bulbs were placed, and stood in a cool, dark cupboard, must now be brought to the light, at least those that are fairly filled with roots, as these roots will have forced growth from the crowns of the bulbs.

As in the case of Hyacinths that have been covered with ashes, so with these in water that have started into growth under the conditions indicated: they must not at once be taken direct from a dark place and stood in the full sun, but their exposure must be gradual.

If there is, as there will be, an appreciable waste of water in the glasses, add more of the same temperature, so that it nearly, but not quite, touches the bulbs.

It is seldom that the water needs changing, and much injury is often done by withdrawing the roots and sponging them; this should never be attempted unless they become covered with brown filmy matter, and then they must be cleansed with great care, a soft feather being used for that purpose; and so long as the water remains tolerably clear it may be left undisturbed.

If a doubt exists as to whether the water should be changed or not, the safest plan will be to pour say a fourth of it out, without disturbing the plant, and add fresh. Rain-water is the best, but ordinary tap-water will do very well; but, as before observed, it must not be colder than that already in the glasses, nor should it be many degrees warmer, as the roots of plants like an equable temperature.

COLEUSES IN WINTER.

A Sheffield correspondent has suggested that notes on the culture and wintering of these plants would be acceptable to many readers besides himself.

Coleuses undoubtedly rank amongst the most beautiful and easily-grown of ornamental-foliaged plants, and in greenhouses and windows in the summer few plants are more effective.

They are equally striking in the winter, provided they can have the requisite heat for keeping them growing, and this is sixty degrees. They will exist in a temperature of fifty-five degrees, but below that they are not safe.

An ordinary greenhouse is too cold for them after September; they are really tropical plants, a fact that is often forgotten when they are seen growing so freely in flower-beds in the summer; but it must be remembered that the heat then exceeds that which we have stated as being necessary for their healthy growth.

There are not many greenhouses that are heated with hot water, in which a small frame or case cannot be fixed in one corner over the hot-water pipes. A layer of slates over these, covered with an inch or two of sawdust, forms a warm floor for small tender plants, and the heat is retained by the glazed light that covers the case.

Cuttings of Coleuses inserted in pots of sandy soil, and kept constantly moist, will strike in a warm frame of the kind mentioned, and form beautiful plants next summer. We have preserved dozens of plants in the manner suggested, but could never keep them alive in a temperature suited for such comparatively hardy flowers as Pelargoniums.

The plants under notice are, however, very cheap in the spring, rooted cuttings being purchasable for a few pence, and as they grow rapidly from May onwards, no one need deny himself the pleasure of growing a few richly-coloured Coleuses. At the proper time for obtaining plants we will give the necessary cultural particulars, and make a selection of some of the most handsome varieties.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTION.

THE BRAMBLES IVY will be glad if anyone will give him the verse which accompanies "Venetia Valse," beginning "Upwards ascending," etc.

ANSWERS.

ANXIOUS MOTHER.—If you could let your boys have the companionship of other boys, you would find all these tastes would come of themselves, and you would not have to trouble yourself to direct them. Theatricals are an excellent way of passing the evening. Let the boys get up some simple farce with a few characters in it, such as "Box and Cox," or "The Area Belle"; you will find a good many instructions in a little book entitled, "Theatricals and Tableaux Vivants for Amateurs," by Charles Harrison, published by L. Upcott Gill. Routledge publishes a very good book of charades, but impromptu charades are better than any you can buy. Boys like bagatelle, and the "game of the race" very much as a rule, and some of them find a lasting amusement in chess. If they are at all artistic they might amuse themselves with making a toy-theatre, or some of those pretty paper-models that you buy in sheets.

BRTA.—1. "Butler's Lives of the Saints," 12 vols., 1s. each, Richardson. 2. Depends somewhat on the kind of wine, generally about twenty-seven gallons.

BROCKLEY.—Put the petroleum on the steel with a piece of flannel, and do not wipe it off. The old plan of rubbing steel over with mutton fat has always been found to answer in keeping steel from rust.

BROOKS OF SHEFFIELD.—1. You can read a will on payment of a shilling at the New Will Office, at Somerset House, Strand, and Victoria Embankment, and have it copied for a few shillings, according to the length. 2. Goose-tongue is an herbaceous plant, about a foot high or more, bearing white heads rather less in size than a daisy. It is found in moist meadows, especially in hilly districts, and is not the same thing as tarragon. 3. We do not know. 4. There is no English translation. 5. Saffron has grass-like leaves, and large crocus-like flowers of a purple colour. The dried stigmata form the saffron of the shops, which, when good, has a rich, deep orange colour, and is used as a flavouring and colouring ingredient, especially on the Continent, in culinary preparations, liqueurs, etc. Hay-saffron consists of the stigmata with part of the style carefully dried.

C. C. G.—An article on "Quinces" will appear next week.

C. H. (Sherborne).—Thanks, but we have received many copies.

CHICOT.—1. We are sorry you do not approve of the advertisements, but it would be impossible for us to give the quantity of matter we do for a penny a week, or sixpence a month, without the assistance of advertisers. 2. Nicole Frères are among the best manufacturers. The Smith American Organ Company also supply very beautiful musical boxes.

CYDONIA.—You cannot do better than recommend your friend "Loudon's Encyclopædia of Gardening," 1871, 21s., and in conjunction with it "Brown's Practical Treatise on Forestry," 1830, 31s. 6d., Blackwood.

E. L. H.—Ferdinand II., King of the two Sicilies, succeeded to the throne November, 1830.

FUNGUS.—There is a useful little book entitled, "Mushroom Culture for Amateurs," by J. W. May, L. Upcott Gill, 1s. The subject of mushroom culture in cellars is fully treated therein.

G. B. (Derby).—If you wish to sell your old MS. you had better apply to Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson, and Hodge, 13, Wellington Street, Strand.

HEART'S DELIGHT.—The verses are the two last of a poem entitled, "A Denial," by Mrs. E. B. Browning:

So farewell thou, whom I have known too late
To let these come so near.
Be counted happy while men call thee great,
And one beloved woman feels thee dear!
Not I!—that cannot be.
I am lost, I am changed; I must go farther, where
The change shall take me worse, and no one dare
Look in my face and see.

Meantime I bless thee. By these thoughts of mine
I bless thee from all such!
I bless thy lamp to oil, thy cup to wine,
Thy hearth to joy, thy hand to an equal touch
Of loyal truth. For me,
I love thee not, I love thee not!—away!
Here's no more courage in my soul to say,
"Look in my face and see!"

HEREBY.—The term "Tyburn Ticket" was not, as you suppose, applied to a passport for the gallows, but was the popular name for a certificate given to the prosecutor of a felon, when the prosecution ended in a conviction. This kind of certificate was originated by statute (10 & 11 William III., c. 13, s. 2); its abolition took place in the year 1818. As the holder of a document of this kind was exempt from all "parish and ward offices within the parish wherein such felony was committed," these tickets were very valuable, and frequently sold for a high price.

H. L.—The charitable bequests in trust of the City of London Companies embrace a vast comprehensiveness of benevolent design, as remarkable as the entire amount must be magnificent, and, if it could be arrived at, as interesting to detail. They comprise pensions to decayed members; gifts of money, bread, meat, etc., to the poor; loans of various amounts to young beginners in business; funds for the benefit of hospitals, schools, exhibitors at the universities, for lectures and sermons, prisoners in the City gaols, etc. Persons desirous of benefiting by the funds of any of the Companies, or of obtaining more information respecting them, had better apply to the respective clerks, at their Companies' halls, for the necessary forms of application, etc.

HOUSEWIFE.—The directions for making pastry would take up too much space in this column; they were given fully in a valuable and original paper in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 32, and if you like to send three halfpence in stamps to the publisher, he will forward the number to you. Recipes for many kinds of cakes were given in Nos. 19 and 70, but if among them you do not find what you require please write again.

J. J.—Yes, if stamps are sent. Some time must elapse before MSS. can be read, as we receive so many.

M. H. (Altincham).—We are much interested by your allusion to Mr. Walter Besant's account of the herb which cured Professor Palmer, and by your testimony to the value of lobelia inflata as a curative agent.

M. O. B.—You could strengthen the vinegar by freezing it. Remove the ice which forms on the surface. The water of the vinegar alone freezes, leaving the acetic acid in solution in that which remains.

MONA.—Cremers, Regent Street, is the best place to get toy theatres. They are to be had from five shillings up to any price.

NURSE G.—Iceland-moss is not so much used now, but you might find it useful by way of a change. It is a species of lichen found in the arctic regions, and on the upper parts of lofty mountains. Dr. Pavy's recipe for its preparation is as follows: "Wash one ounce of the moss in cold water to remove impurities. Then heat with water up to nearly the boiling-point, and reject the liquid, which has extracted much of the bitter principle. Next boil with a pint of water for ten minutes in a covered vessel, and strain with gentle pressure while hot. A mucilaginous demulcent liquid, with mild bitter tonic properties. It may be flavoured with sugar, lemon-peel, white wine, or aromatics; or milk may be used instead of the water, by which a nourishing liquid is obtained."

PORNER.—We are much obliged by the offer of the verses ("The Post Boy"), but, unfortunately, we cannot use them.

ST. LEONARDS.—Skins dressed with alum and saltpetre will be soft and pliable. Reduce to a fine powder one spoonful of the former to two of the latter; sprinkle the powder on the flesh side of the skin, fold up tightly, and hang in a dry place. The process is completed in two or three days time by scraping the skin with a blunt-knife until clean and supple. We believe that skins can only be successfully dyed by skilled workmen.

THE BETROTHED.—1. Yes, a red nose may come from other causes than a too free use of alcohol. Do you remember the old lines:

Nose, nose, nose, nose,
And who gave you that jolly red nose?
Sinament and ginger, nutmeg and cloves,
And that gave me my jolly red nose.

2. "A Complete Guide to the Game of Chess," by H. F. L. Meyer, cloth 7s. 6d (Griffith and Farran), will be the best book for you to get.

THE BRAMBLES IVY.—With respect to your enquiry as to "the cause of an echo," sound being produced by waves or pulses of the air, when such a wave meets an opposing surface, as a wall, it is reflected like light and proceeds in another direction, and the sound so heard is an echo. When the echo of a sound returns to the point whence the sound originated, the reflecting surface is at right angles to a line drawn to it from that point. An oblique surface sends the echo of a sound off in another direction, so that it may be heard elsewhere, though not at the point where the sound originated. If the direct and reflected sounds succeed each other with great rapidity, which happens when the reflecting surface is near, the echo only clouds the original sound, but is not heard distinctly, and it is such indistinct echoes which interfere with the hearing in churches and other large buildings. Thus you will see that nothing short of the reconstruction of a building can prevent an echo when once it is there. Heavy curtains and hangings might, however, deaden the echo a little.

T. T. A. I. M.—The poem is "Faithful in Vanity Fair"; Suggested by One of David Scott's Illustrations of "Pilgrim's Progress." The book in which it is to be found is entitled "Thirty Years; Being Poems Old and New," by Miss Mulock, Macmillan and Co., 6s. The first verse runs as follows:

The great human whirlpool—'tis seething and seething:
On! No time for shrieking out, scarcely for breathing;
All tolling and moiling, some feeblier, some bolder,
But each sees a fiend-face grim over his shoulder;
Thus merrily live they in Vanity Fair.

WEE WIE.—1. Your MS., like so many others we receive, had no name or address written on it; therefore, we have been unable to communicate with you. 2. It is clear that if we were to advertise such a person as you require, she would at once become the fashion and "very expensive."

Puzzles for Prizes.

Prize Winners in No. 135.

1st Prize, 10s., "Trivia."

2nd Prize, 5s., "Idonea" (Frederick Waite, Esq., 40, Moscow Road, Bayswater).

"Trivia" is requested to send name and address.

AN ADAPTATION OF SHAKESPEARE.

Imogen, only daughter of Lear, an old military officer, has been betrothed from her infancy to Hamlet, only son of an old comrade of Lear's, and ward of a merchant, Iago. Imogen, however, has seen Romeo (Hamlet's fellow-student, and brought to Lear's house by Hamlet), and has fallen deeply in love with him, as he with her, at their first interview. Romeo cannot bear to deal treacherously towards his friend, Hamlet, and therefore will not utter his love; but by his appearance and manner betrays the secret to his sister, Portia, who determines to aid him. Hamlet, also, guesses the secret, and is sorely perplexed between his love for Imogen and his affection for Romeo.

On the other hand, Benedick, Imogen's cousin and foster-brother, discovers her indifference to Hamlet and passion for Romeo. Knowing the fiery nature of Lear, and ascertaining his chivalrous (almost obstinate) adherence to his plighted word at all costs, heightened in this instance by his devotion to the memory of his old fellow-officer, Hamlet's father, Benedick does not dare to plead his cousin's cause openly, and in his perplexity consults his follower, Touchstone.

Meanwhile, Iago, as Hamlet's guardian, has made Imogen's acquaintance, and, becoming deeply enamoured of her, determines to secure her for himself, by fair means or foul. At first, he tries to break off the proposed match by insinuating slanders against Hamlet to Lear; but the latter remains immovably bent on the match. Iago then enlists the aid of Falstaff, who soon ingratiates himself with Lear by lying tales of the wars. Falstaff undertakes to carry off Imogen, as she walks in the garden with her nurse, and convey her to a house of Iago's.

Touchstone overhears the plot and tells Benedick, who, seeking Romeo to consult with him, comes instead to Portia, and finding that she also is trying to bring Romeo and Imogen together, proposes that they should work in concert. They agree to counterplot Iago, and Portia suggests a plan. Falstaff is allowed to carry off Imogen and her nurse (whom he has bargained for as his share of the plunder), but is attacked on the way by Benedick and Touchstone disguised as robbers. Touchstone easily drives off Falstaff, while Benedick takes charge of Imogen and his foster-mother (the nurse), and substitutes for them Portia and Aguecheek, a senile admirer of Portia's, whom she has persuaded to dress up as an old woman. Falstaff returns, and unconscious of the exchange, carries them off to Iago, and boasts of his prowess in beating off the robbers, only to be confounded by the unrolling of Portia and Aguecheek. Iago, furious, menaces Portia, who confronts him boldly, while Aguecheek takes refuge behind her. Just then, Hamlet and Romeo, who have left Lear in despair at the loss of his daughter, and have traced Falstaff, rush in in time to defend Portia. Hamlet attacks and kills Iago (who is masked), and is horror-struck on finding who it is. Romeo, meanwhile, is astounded to find his sister in place of Imogen. Portia explains the mystery, and they return to Lear, where they find Benedick and Imogen just arrived.

Hamlet, remorseful at having killed his guardian, determines to resign Imogen to Romeo, and to retire into a monastery. Lear, softened by his grief at the supposed loss of his daughter, consents. Benedick and Portia make up a match, and Touchstone is duly rewarded.

TRIVIA.

"Trivia" is the only competitor who has sent in answers to both Puzzles. His Threepenny-Bit Puzzle is a model of clearness, and can be read almost as easily as print of the ordinary size. Besides the Lord's Prayer, he has written forty-eight extra words. "Idonea's" writing is also extremely clear, but does not quite equal "Trivia's" in this respect. He has introduced seventy-five words besides the Lord's Prayer. "Enoch" makes a very good third. His circle includes fifty-three extra words, and he has left a space in the middle unfilled.

OUT OF THE RUNNING.—The following Prize-Winners come under the conditions of Rule 3, for thirteen weeks from the date of the Number in which they gained a Prize: No. 124.—1st Prize, "Ferdinando"; 2nd Prize, "Ambrosia." No. 125.—Equal Prizes, "Frensham," "Ryland," "Malblume." No. 126.—1st Prize, "Hookwood"; 2nd Prize, "L. C. L." No. 127.—1st Prize, "Manhattan"; 2nd Prize, "Malblume." No. 128.—1st Prize, "Irish Exile"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 129.—Equal Prizes, "Abracadabra," "Acacia," "Ethel May." No. 130.—1st Prize, "The Arabs"; 2nd Prize, "Allice." No. 132.—1st Prize, "Atlas"; 2nd Prize, "Ethel May." No. 133.—1st Prize, "Syd Gardner"; 2nd Prize, "Medway." No. 134.—1st Prize, "One and All"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 135.—1st Prize, "Trivia"; 2nd Prize, "Idonea."

Answers have also been received from—A. Montgomery, Enoch, Ellen Golds, Emma Jane, Fedel Leo, Festina Lento, George David, Minnie, Sans Souci.

Odds and Ends.

A STORY is told of a college president who suspected that some of the students had planned to rob his hen-roost. Near the enclosure were two large apple-trees at the back of the house; so he quietly went out and waited till they came. Of the two one ascended the tree, the other waited below. When they were ready to commence operations, the doctor made a slight noise, and the one below started off with an exclamation of surprise. The one in the tree asked in a whisper: "What's the matter?" To which the doctor replied, also in a whisper: "All's right." "Here, catch hold," said the upper one, handing down a rooster, "here's Old Prex." And, handing down a hen, "Here's Mrs. Prex." "And here," handing down a chicken, "here's Miss Prex. I think that'll do." The doctor quietly got over the fence with the fowls, and went to his house. The poor robber of the hen-roost descended to find his companion gone. What they said when they met will probably never be known; but in the morning the two young gentlemen received a polite invitation to dine with the president, an honour they could not very well decline. Possibly they were embarrassed when, seated at the table, they saw three fowls roasted for the dinner, and we can imagine their sensations when the doctor said: "Now, young gentlemen, will you have a piece of Old Prex, Mrs. Prex, or Miss Prex." How the dinner passed off, and how the young delinquents got off, deponent sayeth not. On that theme history is dumb. But nothing more was heard of the escapee, the doctor thinking that the mortification was sufficient punishment.

DURING a sea voyage a ventriloquist made friends with the engineer of the ship, and was allowed to enter the engine-room. He took a seat in the corner, and pulling his hat down over his eyes, appeared to be lost in reverie. Presently a certain part of the machinery began to squeak. The engineer oiled it, and went about his usual duties. In the course of a few minutes the squeaking was heard again, and the engineer rushed, oil-can in hand, to lubricate the same spindle. Again he returned to his post, but it was only a few minutes until the same old spindle was squeaking louder than ever. "Confound the thing," he yelled, "it is bewitched!" More oil was administered, but the engineer began to be suspicious as to its cause. Pretty soon the spindle began to squeak again; and slipping up behind the ventriloquist, the engineer squirted a half pint of oil down the joker's back. "There," said he, "I guess that spindle won't squeak any more." The joke was so good that the ventriloquist could not keep it.

MISS MULOCK tells us that it takes a heroine to be economical; for will not many a woman rather run in debt for a bonnet than wear her old one a year behind the mode?—give a ball, and stint the family dinner a month after?—take a large house and furnish handsome reception-rooms, while her household huddle together anyhow? She prefers this a hundred times to stating plainly, by word or manner: "My income is so much a year—I don't care who knows it—it will not allow me to live beyond a certain rate, it will not keep comfortably both my family and my acquaintances—therefore excuse my preferring the comfort of my family to the entertainment of my acquaintances. And, society, if you choose to look in upon us, you must just take us as we are, without any pretences of any kind; or you may shut the door and say good-bye!"

THOMAS WALL, who lived early in the last century, and from whose note-book we gather that his wife was what is popularly known as "a bit of a Tartar," penned the following significant lines:

"Ye gods, ye gave to me a wife
Out of your grace and favour,
To be the comfort of my life,
And I was glad to have her.

"But if you, mighty powers divine,
A greater bliss design her,
T' obey your wills at any time
I'm ready to resign her."

In Notes and Queries it is stated that the Standard newspaper reported that "the remains of the late Mr. John Payne Collier were interred yesterday in Bray Churchyard, near Maidenhead, in the presence of a large number of spectators," with other particulars. In the Eastern Daily Press the announcement appears as follows: "The Bray Colliery Disaster: The remains of the late John Payne, collier, were interred yesterday afternoon in the Bray Churchyard, in the presence of a large number of friends and spectators." So much for literary reputation at the age of ninety-four!

THE St. Paul's Gazette (Minnesota) declares that the Crow Indians, computed at 800 families, reckoning 3,000 heads, are the richest people in the world. They are the owners of 6,500,000 acres of good land, which at one dollar an acre gives a value of 6,500,000 dols. They have 11,500 horses, worth twenty dollars apiece; that is 230,000 dols. They receive an annual allowance of 800,000 dols. from the United States Government. Reckoning up all these items, we have a total of 7,530,000, or 3,510 dols. a head.

AFTER the battle of Blenheim (fought August 2nd, 1704), the Duke of Marlborough, having recognised among the wounded prisoners a private soldier whom he had noticed for his daring valour during action, said to him: "If your master had many soldiers such as you he would be invincible." "It is not men like me he is short of," smartly replied the prisoner; "it is a general like yourself."

ACCUSTOM yourself to submit on all and every occasion, and on the most minute, no less than on the most important circumstances in life, to a small present evil, to obtain a greater distant good. This will give decision, tone, and energy to the mind, which, thus disciplined, will often reap victory from defeat and honour from repulse.

If you would lift me you must be on higher ground. If you would liberate me, you must be free. If you would correct my false views of facts, hold up to me the same facts in the true order of thought.

SIR PETER LELY made it a rule never to look at a bad picture, having found by experience that whenever he did so, his pencil took a tint from it. Apply the same rule to bad books and company.

A BLACK servant, named Peter, was sent to purchase some fish, but he was to be sure and see it was fresh. Peter accordingly went to the nearest fishmonger's, and, seeing a lot of fish on the usual marble slab, put his black face near them and began smelling them. The fishmonger, seeing this, called out to Peter: "Hulloa, you black scoundrel, what are you smelling my fish for?" Peter, looking up knowingly, replied: "Me am not smelling your fish, massa, me am only talking to them." "Well, what do you say to the fish?" enquired the fishmonger. "I was asking them how their brothers were out at sea," replied Peter. "And what reply did you get from the fish?" asked the amused fishmonger. "Well, the fish said they couldn't exactly tell, as they hadn't seen them for six weeks."

AN Irishman, driven to desperation by the stringency of the money-market and high price of provisions, procured a pistol and took to the road. Meeting a traveller, he stopped him with: "Your money or your life!" Seeing that Pat was a novice, he said: "I tell you what I'll do. I'll give you all my money for that pistol." "Agreed," Pat received the money, and handed over the pistol. "Now," said the traveller, "hand back that money, or I'll blow your brains out." "Blaze away, my hearty," said Pat; "never a drop of powder there's in it."

SCENE: Class-room in a London Board school. H.M.I. examining a third standard in geography: "What is the name of that island which lies nearly midway between England, Ireland, and Scotland?" No response. H.M.I. (encouragingly): "Well, what name would you give to an island if all the women were banished from it?" One boy, who thinks he has got it, quickly raises his hand. H.M.I.: "What do you say, my boy?" "Scilly isle, sir."

"My dear, come in and go to bed," said the wife of a jolly son of Erin, who had just returned from the fair in a decidedly how-come-you-so state; "you must be dreadfully tired, sure, with your long walk of six miles." "Arrah! get away with your nonsense," said Pat; "it wasn't the length of the way, at all, that fatigued me; it was the breadth of it."

WHY is it that when a plumber comes to mend the pipes, he always has to go back after his tools? Probably because a long and careful examination convinces him that he can't repair the damage without tools.

STUDNEY SMITH once commenced a charity sermon by remarking, "Benevolence is a sentiment common to human nature. A never sees B in distress without asking C to relieve him."

A MILLIONAIRE, on going into the college library, saw a volume labelled Virgili Opera. Turning to his friend he said: "By Jove, Tom, I never knew Virgil wrote music."

It is maintained that the most inspiring natural sight which a glazier can contemplate, is the gleam of early day breaking through the windows.

A JURYMEN remarked: "May it please yer honor I am deaf in one ear." "Then leave the box," replied the judge; "a juror must hear both sides."

CHAPTER I.

A FACE whose greatest beauty depends on expression defies description—how then is Clare Stanhope to be presented to the reader?

I will just remark that if her mouth was rather large, it was exquisitely shaped, and her smile was perfect. And then such eyes! they matched in colour the hazel of her hair, but grew darker at times when excited feeling gave them an especial charm, and they revealed depths of silent sympathy. In daily life it more frequently happened that a merry imp peeped out of them, full of quiet mischief.

That impish spirit had fled, blinded by tears, as Clare stood at one of the windows of Fairlea Lodge, on the first morning in August, 1883.

She looked across the park towards the Hall, to which the Lodge was a sort of succursale; having for years been either a jointure house, or a retreat for the unmarried daughters of the Fortescue family. This Lodge was now occupied by the two maiden aunts of Herbert Fortescue, and Clare Stanhope was their guest.

She looked towards the three-gabled mansion where the family of her friends had lived for four centuries. The diamond-paned windows were sparkling in the light of the summer morning, the peacocks which fed from their master's hand were sunning themselves on the stone balustrade of the terrace; and, as a background to the picture, the trees of the pheasant-haunted wood rose above the house, looking stately and cool in the blue distance.

And this was the home which Herbert Fortescue had been summoned to resign to a stranger, an American.

She had been told of this extraordinary claim by a letter from Herbert received that morning. The American professed to be the heir of Herbert's uncle Reginald, his grandfather's eldest son. Should this statement be substantiated, Herbert would have to give up the dear old place, the hall with its minstrels' gallery and faded tapestry, the guard-room and its ancient weapons, the gallery with portraits of the cavaliers who had worn them.

But why think of such details, when the loss of Fairlea estate would involve the loss of position—fortune—bread!

It was too terrible.

She held in her hand a letter written in reply to one she had that morning received from Herbert, in which he told her he was a beggar, and therefore released her from her engagement. In answer she told him no change of circumstance could change her love.

A clock striking eleven warned her that she must get her letter posted without delay, if she wished it to go by the day mail. The post-office was two miles distant; but the old housekeeper, who had been her nurse, was going in the dog-cart to the neighbouring village.

Clare took the letter to Mrs. Dickson's room.

"Will I post a letter, and be sure not to forget it? That I will, and I think, my dear, you may trust your old nurse," said Dickson, as she laid the letter carefully beside her gloves and purse, and then went to put on her bonnet and shawl.

During her short absence there came into her room a delicate, fragile-looking old lady, one of the two sisters in whose service she lived.

Miss Fortescue had in her hand a card box which the gardener had filled with ripe strawberries, and she looked round for a piece of string. She found a ball of packthread on the table, and she also saw Clare's letter, and perceiving that it was addressed to her nephew, for whom she destined the strawberries, she placed it among the green leaves which covered the fruit. Then she closed the box and tied it up in cartridge-paper. The gardener had remarked that the box was a very slight one; but Anne Fortescue's only fault was obstinacy in small matters, and she thought as she sealed the packthread that her neat parcel looked extremely secure. Her opportunities for the exercise of her feeble will had been scanty enough when she lived in the Hall during the lifetime of her father. That gentleman never allowed his daughters to go beyond the park gates, unless they went in the large yellow carriage drawn by four bays, sixteen hands high. After possessing about as much freedom as that enjoyed in historic times by a queen of Spain, she found great contentment in the Lodge, and the veriest trifles amused her.

So it happened that she found a pleasure in using for the first time a parcel post label, and in affixing the right number of stamps, after weighing the box in Dickson's scales.

She had sent off the post-boy, when she met the housekeeper on the stairs, and said:

"I found a letter from Miss Clare to my nephew on your table, Dicksie, so I enclosed it in a box I am sending him."

"Oh, did you, mum? Miss Clare wished me to post it, not knowing as you would be sending this morning," replied the housekeeper in a tone of annoyance.

"I've been sending Mr. Fortescue some of our late strawberries."

"Law, mum! Send strawberries to Mr. Herbert when he could buy up Covent Garden, if he wanted to?"

"But ours are late, and such fine ones," said Miss Fortescue, who saw she had given Dickson dire offence.

"She always were a meddlesome Mattie, but never means harm. I shall let Miss Clare think I posted the letter, it's no use vexing her by saying I couldn't keep my promise to post it myself."

While Dickson grumbled, and Anne Fortescue had a sensation of mild regret at having vexed her, Rhoda, her younger sister, and Clare Stanhope were talking together about the real misfortune which seemed about to fall on the present occupier of Fairlea.

Rhoda had also received a letter from Herbert that morning, and he had imposed on her the task of breaking to Miss Fortescue news of a change which would in some degree affect them all.

"I cannot understand," said Clare, "why this man did not come forward sooner. Or, at least, why his relations or guardians did not make the claim when Herbert's father died."

"It all comes of the way our family has been divided, Clare. My poor father was harsh and arbitrary, and my brother Reginald had his strong will and violent temper. They used to quarrel dreadfully, and at last there came a climax. Reginald had been staying with some friends in Yorkshire, and when he came home, he walked into my father's library, leading by the hand a young woman, whom he introduced as his wife. She was the daughter of his friend's gamekeeper, and Reginald brought her to my father without any preparation, and, of course, my father got into an awful passion. I don't know what passed between them in the library, but Anne and I were just coming in at the hall-door as Reginald and his wife were coming out. Directly I saw her I guessed what had happened, for a dubious sentence in a letter from Reginald had given me a hint which, at the time I read it, I only half understood. I was sure there must have been a terrible scene in the library, and at the same time, something in the bride's proud, pale face told me she was a good, noble girl, who had married for love and not for money or position. The carriage in which we had been driving was just turning from the door, and the off leader, who had been very troublesome during our drive, began to rear. One of the footmen went to her head, and a groom came running from the stables. She was a splendid bay mare, and Reginald, who had been far less affected than the poor bride by his interview, looked on for a moment with interest. Then he said to his wife:

"When we come back, Mrs. Fortescue, you will be mistress here, and we'll have the best team in the county. There are my sisters—Anne, Rhoda, this is my wife."

"Anne shrank back timidly, but I, who am fifteen years younger, had never been afraid of my father, and only thought just then of the poor pale bride, and I went to her, holding out my hand, and said:

"My brother's wife is my sister."

"There came into her face a look of surprise and pleasure I shall never forget. All the pride and coldness disappeared as her strong hand clasped mine. I could not resist that look, and though Reginald had been a constant source of anxiety to all of us, I was very fond of him. I kissed his wife, and I felt her give a great sob. Then Reginald hurried her away, and beckoned to the man with the fly that had brought them, and they drove off. But before he went he turned to me and said:

"You've always been a kind sister to me, Rhoda. Good-bye!"

"And his wife gave me a last look from the window as they drove away, the tears running down her beautiful face."

Rhoda Fortescue paused; the remembrance of the scene she had described was visibly before her.

"That," she said, after a silence, "was in 1855, twenty-eight years ago, and only once did we hear from Reginald. It was when he sent me a little note from Southampton—just a few words:

"We sail for Melbourne this morning. My wife sends her dear love. You are the only one of my kindred whom I ever wish to see again. God bless you!"

"Six years afterwards a notice of his death was copied into several English papers from some Melbourne gazette, accompanied by a statement that he was heir to the entailed estate of Fairlea, and had died without issue."

"Then," said Clare eagerly, "it is possible that, after all, this man may not be his son."

"He seems to have satisfied Herbert on that point, and Herbert would not be prejudiced in his favour."

CHAPTER II.

ON the second morning after Clare had given Dickson the letter to post, she looked hopefully for one in return, but none arrived. Herbert was occupied and worried, she thought—she would hear from him to-morrow. But to-morrow came, and day followed day, and still no letter came.

Then she began to ask herself how it was that the outpouring of her sympathy and love had awakened no response. A week—two weeks—passed away; never during the three months of their engagement had Herbert been so long silent. A thousand doubts tormented her. Perhaps he thought she had not understood that marriage was for him impossible, or that a hopeless engagement would but distress and hamper him. Perhaps his love could only live in an atmosphere of sunshine.

By day she strove to drive away her worrying thoughts by incessant occupation, and at night she lay down to rest determined to sleep the sleep of utter forgetfulness; but with the grey summer dawn her eyes would open, and she would wake with a start, and all the passionate regrets that she had resolutely quelled would resume their mastery. She often rose and looked out on the pale primrose sky, and watched the tinted clouds that await the rising sun, and strove to calm her heart, not all in vain, by thoughts of other worlds than this; but the mental strife of those long, lonely hours stole the colour from her cheek and the lustre from her eyes.

She had slept rather longer than usual, and was looking the better for it, as, after breakfast, she sat near a window washing in a sketch of summer foliage on her drawing-block. She did not look up when the parlour-maid brought in a card to Miss Fortescue, saying:

"I was to ask you, ma'am, whether you would please to see the gentleman?"

Miss Fortescue passed the card to her sister with a frightened look, and Clare started as Rhoda read aloud the name of "Mark Fortescue." There was no prefix.

"We had better see him," said Rhoda.

"My dear!" remonstrated Miss Fortescue.

"If he is the true heir, it is not in Herbert's interest that we should treat him with discourtesy."

Clare looked up as Jane returned, expecting to see a thin man with a long hooked nose and pointed beard, such as Brother Jonathan is represented by caricaturists. There came, instead of that lank person, one who might have been Herbert Fortescue's brother, only that he was taller, broader, and much tanned by American suns and Atlantic breezes.

"I am very much obliged to you for granting me this interview," said he, holding out his hand to Miss Fortescue, who reluctantly touched it with the tips of her fingers, while she forced the conventional smile which she thought due to any one received beneath her roof.

Rhoda, as she shook hands with him, and looked into his honest eyes, felt a sudden conviction that conscious imposition was on his part impossible.

"My sister, Miss Rhoda Fortescue," said Anne, who was always being shocked by Rhoda's informal ways, and thought a too late introduction better than none.

Then Mark looked steadfastly towards Clare; but Miss Fortescue thought her complaisance had gone far enough. She would not present her nephew's enemy to his betrothed.

"Is that lady a relation, too?" asked the audacious stranger.

"No," said Rhoda; "a friend who is staying with us."

Mark took this to be introduction sufficient, so he strode towards Clare, and rather shyly held out his hand. Clare hesitated a moment. She was angry with Herbert, wounded and indignant, but she could not take the hand of his rival. She would not see it, and bowed.

For an instant Mark stood looking at her, the blood slowly mounting to his temples, then he bent his head slightly, and turned away, not so much embarrassed as greatly discomfited.

Miss Fortescue, who would have shaken hands with her worst enemy rather than be uncivil, thought this young man had brought in with him an atmosphere of ill-breeding, and attempted to steer into the calm waters of conventionality by indicating a seat, and asking a commonplace question:

"Have you been long in England, Mr. —?"

No, she couldn't call him Fortescue, it might be admitting his right to the estate. It was dreadfully awkward and disagreeable. He ought never to have been admitted.

"I have been in England about a month, and I have ventured to come to you, Miss Fortescue, because I have no doubt you have influence with your nephew, and——"

"Oh dear no; really I could not interfere in any matter of importance affecting his interests."

She looked so piteously incompetent that Mark turned to Rhoda, who had at once impressed him as the stronger character.

"Cannot you induce Herbert Fortescue to listen to the terms I propose, instead of declaring he will have all or nothing? I don't want to take to myself his patrimony. Why should my grandfather have entailed his estate on his son's elder son? Brothers ought to share and share alike. I, as Reginald's heir, and Herbert, as the younger brother's heir, ought to divide the estate between us."

"In England an estate always goes to the eldest son," observed Miss Fortescue with the dignity of one who is instructing the ignorant. "What," she added, "would become of an estate divided between five or six sons?"

"What would become of the four or five younger sons, I should rather ask?"

"In a few generations," said Rhoda, "an estate so divided dwindles to a potato-field, and the unfortunates who try to live on their land would be better without it; but Fairlea will certainly bear dividing once, and if your claim is as just as I am sure you believe it to be, such a distribution of the property on your part would be most generous."

"Only just, it seems to me. My people were, I think, to blame in leaving us in ignorance of our true position so long. But directly I proposed a division of the land, Herbert Fortescue concluded I knew of some flaw in my title, and declared he would defend his rights with his last shilling."

"No doubt it would be desirable to have a legal opinion," said Anne Fortescue mildly, and irrelevantly.

"As many opinions as you please," said Mark rather impatiently. "I am most anxious to have my claim investigated at once; but if we are to have a long Chancery suit like the Roger Tichborne business, our estate will dwindle till there won't be much left to divide."

There was a little silence. Miss Fortescue was sorely puzzled. Lawsuits were terrible; needless compromises worse.

During the pause Rhoda opened a desk, and produced a small book, in which was pasted a notice of Reginald Fortescue's death and the statement that he had died without heirs. This she placed in Mark's hand, and looked at him keenly while he read it.

He considered for some moments with an air of perplexity, and at last exclaimed with more of Yankee intonation than had hitherto affected his speech:

"I reckon my mother inserted this notice. After my father's death she got an idea in her head that my grandfather Fortescue could take me from her if he knew of my existence. Whether he could have done so I can't say, but she thought so."

"And she never told you you were heir to an estate in England?" said Rhoda enquiringly.

"She was always telling me I was to remember I was a gentleman born; but my poor mother died when I was still a little chap, and I was left at the school in Melbourne where she had sent me. She had fixed everything so that I should be well cared for. When I grew up I went to look up her family in New York. I thought they would be able to tell me why mother had given me a notion that I was better born than herself. I found my grandfather dead, and only my cousin Matt left, and he could not tell me much, for my grandfather, the gamekeeper, was a very silent man. But Matt showed me a letter from my mother which he found in grandfather's desk. I left it with my lawyer. Here's a bit I copied from it."

He handed a sheet of paper to Rhoda, who read:

"DEAR FATHER,

"I send you some more money to put into Matt's business, as you've kindly done before. I get good interest here, but don't like to have all my eggs in one basket, as the saying is, and I save all I can, for my boy may want money for the lawyers, who will prove his rights by-and-by. He's a regular Fortescue, and no mistake, and down at Fairlea his face will be almost enough to make them own him lord of the manor at once."

"That's strong, is it not?" said Mark, as Rhoda returned the sheet of paper. "But I did not feel sure till I came to England and consulted a lawyer. You may know the firm of Furnival and Clement, Miss Fortescue, in Bedford Row."

"A highly respectable firm," said Anne, feeling she was bound to speak the truth even of a foe. As she spoke, a little Japanese gong was gently struck in the hall, and Mark guessed it to be an intimation that lunch was ready.

He immediately rose and thanked his hostess for having given him the interview.

"I hope you will represent to your nephew how ready I am to go shares with him," he said, as he held Rhoda's hand. Even she did not think it desirable that he should be invited to stay for luncheon, but she frankly clasped his hand and said :

"I will tell him what you wish."

He bent his head to Clare, and would have passed on, but, with a little quick movement, she held out her hand. He gave her a look of pleased surprise, and it seemed to her as if Herbert's eyes were meeting hers at that moment. She would hardly have owned to herself, even in her secret heart, that the grey eyes of her lover seemed to have become the windows of a larger, nobler soul than that which dwelt in Herbert's breast.

CHAPTER III.

"SOCIETY" had for some weeks been leaving London, and now that Parliament was prorogued, there were, as Horace Walpole once said in his day, "not ten people in town."

Herbert Fortescue, walking moodily past empty houses, asked himself how he should exist, when he had ceased to own the rents of Fairlea. He had slowly come to believe that neither he nor his father had been the lawful heirs to that estate; and he felt that he would soon have to give place to his cousin from the States. When he had sold his horses and the bric-a-brac that was scattered over his lodgings in Clarges Street, he would but realise enough to keep him from actual penury, and he shuddered as he pictured to himself the life before him.

Had Clare Stanhope clung to him in his adversity, her uncle's legacy, which he had hitherto thought a most contemptible sum, would have helped to eke out his income; but she had evidently accepted his resignation of her hand, and had not even written him a kindly word of sympathy.

He had looked rather eagerly for a letter, the contents of which he thought he could easily divine; not so much from insight into Clare's character, as from a full appreciation of his own merits.

"No letters?" he said when his valet brought him, on a tray, a broken card-basket, from which oozed strawberry-juice and crushed strawberries.

Herbert glanced at the address, recognised Miss Fortescue's old-fashioned sloping hand, looked at her present with disgust, and said, as he threw himself back in his chair: "No letters—ugh! Throw that mess away."

Not being fond of fruit the valet gave the box to the landlady's child, who ate the strawberries, stained himself all over with the juice, and threw the leaves with Clare's letter into the fire, where they sputtered to his heart's content. Such was the fate of the sweetest little letter ever penned.

It never occurred to Herbert that a letter from Clare could have got among his aunt's strawberries, for he did not even know she was staying at the Lodge. The letter she had received from him he had sent to her own home, and it had been forwarded, for Clare's visit to Fairlea had been an unexpected one.

And now, because she seemed to have taken him at his word when he told her that for him marriage was impossible, he complained of her worldliness and cruelty—certainly she might have written. Thinking thus, he chanced to glance upwards, and found he was passing a house from which the owner had not yet fled; for carefully tended flowers were in the balcony, curtains gently waved in the open windows, and the favourite colley was lying on the doorstep. Yes, Miss Morley was at home, though a portmanteau in the hall gave token of intended travel. She was, in fact, in her room with her maid, superintending the packing of her dresses.

Herbert rang, and was admitted.

He threw himself into a delightfully comfortable chair, and looked around the room into which he had been ushered.

Shades of blue and grey pervaded the furniture; water-colour drawings of snow-capped mountains hung on the softly-tinted walls; and the air was scented, not by French perfumes but by carnations, whose deep red looked the richer from their contrast with the cool shades around them.

Herbert had been just long enough alone in this pleasant room to feel mentally refreshed by it, when Miss Morley came in.

She was not beautiful; but she had a charming manner, and was always perfectly dressed. As she advanced to meet her visitor, clad in the most becoming of tea-gowns, Herbert thought her almost pretty.

"You are still in town, Mr. Fortescue. So kind of you to look me up. I begin to feel like Alexander Selkirk—don't you?"

"London can be no desert-place till Miss Morley leaves it," said Herbert.

Instead of replying, Kate Morley laughed. Her laugh was as pleasant as her voice.

"It is just tea-time," said she, "and I think I have heard you say that you don't despise tea."

"On the contrary, I am thirsty, as well as dreary and altogether crushed. You may have heard, Miss Morley—for bad news travels fast—that I am ruined and done for."

"I've heard some man from America is claiming your estates; but I hope he is another Arthur Orton."

"I have every reason to believe he is the real heir."

"Oh, Mr. Fortescue!"

Her look of real regret, her tone of sympathy, touched Herbert. He was low-spirited, and the atmosphere around her was soothing.

She was the daughter of a physician, who, when he died, left her a house in Bloomsbury and three thousand pounds a year. Miss Morley sold the house, rented another in a more fashionable neighbourhood, and invited, to live with her as chaperon, a widowed aunt.

It seemed strange that Kate Morley—pleasant, ladylike, and well-to-do—should have passed the age of thirty without marrying; but she was difficult to please. She liked the company of artists and literary men, especially when, in her decorous house, they conformed to the usages of society; but she knew that she would hate Bohemianism in a husband. A soldier would have suited her; but a good-looking captain of hussars was so manifestly attracted by her money that she refused his offer, not without regret. A young curate won her favour—the second son of an earl, who had inherited a small fortune from his mother. He had little time to devote to society. He wanted a wife—and he thought he had found one in Miss Morley, whose almsgiving was most liberal, and who listened to his schemes for the extinction of pauperism with interest. But when she found that he was eager to get work in the East of London, and would expect his wife to live there, she looked on him as quite a lunatic. "Pas de zèle" was her motto.

But she certainly regretted the curate; she was not likely to have another offer from the son of an earl. She first met Herbert Fortescue at the house of his solicitor, and after dinner the young man had found her at the piano. She had a well-trained voice, and as she had a lesson or two for every new song, her style and expression were good.

"Do you like that song?" she said. "It is one of Madame D.'s. She is coming to dine with me on Thursday; if you would care to come and meet her, I should be very happy to see you. Thursday, eight o'clock."

Herbert went, and found the dinner and the arrangements perfect. The invitation was repeated at intervals, and Herbert never felt less bored than when he passed an evening at Kate Morley's.

When Herbert was taking leave of her, Miss Morley laid her hand lightly on his arm. It was a fair hand, and on one finger glittered a costly diamond ring. Another hand had once lain on Herbert's for a moment; it wore no diamonds, it was slightly tanned, and at that moment somewhat flower-stained, but its touch had thrilled to his heart.

He looked at Kate Morley's hand, and asked himself, not without emotion, whether it meant the possibility of three thousand pounds a year. He placed his own hand over hers, and looked up in her face. She was certainly almost pretty, and she was a lady. He was so fastidious, that had she at that moment made play with her eyes, or attempted any kind of effect, he would have felt repelled. But she had the good taste to be always herself, never agitated by strong feeling, but kindly, well-bred, and ever at her "level best."

As Herbert looked into her eyes she met his glance frankly, yet with a shade of sadness; and then she looked away, not with down-cast glance, but thoughtfully; and with a little sigh, she said gently:

"You have not lost Fairlea yet. There is hope that things may not be so bad as they seem."

"Don't tell me to be hopeful, suspense is such an awful bore. I could bear it better if I were not so much alone. But all the fellows I know are out of town, and I want to be here when my lawyer, to whom I have telegraphed, comes from Norway. I fear you, too, will be gone in a few days."

"I hardly think so. It is so difficult to fix on a spot that is not swarming with excursionists. Can you recommend a place really pleasant and new?"

"Certainly not. I cannot be so disinterested," was, of course, Herbert's reply.

On his way home, Herbert reflected that she was some years his senior; but she would save him from a life of drudgery—a word which it was his custom to apply to every kind of systematic employment.

CHAPTER IV.

CLARE STANHOPE had been sketching a group of horse-chestnuts which stood in the park, and was passing the Hall on her way to the Lodge, when she became aware of a man who was seated on the terrace balustrade. At first she took it to be Herbert Fortescue, but in another moment she perceived that it was not Herbert, but Mark.

This was not the first time she had encountered him since he called at the Lodge. Once he had delivered Clare's dog from the jaws of a ferocious cur, and had walked some distance with her, lest the attack should be repeated. Another time he had found the Miss Fortescues weather-bound in a bye-street, where they had visited an old servant, and had fetched their carriage for them. And when he was favoured by such opportunities, Clare could not help seeing that he held any service he could render to the elder ladies amply rewarded by a word or a smile from her.

There was no smile for him, but rather a look of repulsion, as she saw him seated on the terrace, anticipating the moment when all around him would be acknowledged his own, his head somewhat thrown back, and a little cloud of smoke testifying to the cigar which rendered his enjoyment complete.

"Whatever else he means to share, he means to have the Hall," thought Clare. "Well, it is his right; but it is not good form to behave as if he were already in possession."

She was turning to take another path when Mark saw her, and with a leap cleared the balustrade and gained the lower level of the park.

"Mayn't I carry some of your things?" said he, raising his hat; "your camp-stool, and—"

Clare told him she was accustomed to carry all her drawing-implements; and she did not resign them.

He looked so chagrined that she could not find it in her heart to wish him good-morning and so dismiss him, and he walked a few paces by her side.

"I've been all over the old house, Miss Clare," said he, after a little silence.

He had heard her called Clare, but he was ignorant of her surname. This use of her christian-name was disagreeable to Clare.

"I imagine you are pleased with your future property," she said very dryly.

"It's a grand old house, and I conclude it would have been a difficult thing to divide."

What did he mean? Had he given up his intention of sharing the estate, or did he intend to share it still, retaining the house for himself?

Mark answered Clare's questioning eyes.

"Fairlea is not mine," he said, "nor ever will be. I've been down to Yorkshire where my mother was living when my father first saw her, and I wanted to look up her old friends. Well, for a time I'd no luck, for my grandfather, the keeper, was there only a few years. The village people said, 'Ay, there coom'd a maan o' the naam o' Smithson, and a gentleman born married his lass.' Many remember just that. At last, one evening, the woman who kept the village store came to me and asked if I was the son of the gentleman from Somersetshire and Jane Smithson, if so, she was glad to see me, for she'd been my mother's bridesmaid. I told her my mother's name was Mary. You can't think how surprised that woman looked; and she said, 'Eh, then! he maun a married Mary 'way there 'cross the water.' To cut a long story short, Miss Clare, I found my father had married Jane Smithson; before he left England; and when he went to Australia, his wife would have her younger sister go with them. They did badly at first, the work was too hard for my father, who seems to have been unfit for such a life, and when Jane, his first wife died, he fell ill. I learnt this from a letter which Mary, the youngest sister, wrote to the woman at the Yorkshire shop. She said she would try if good nursing would bring him round, and she found that making tea-total drinks for the diggers paid well, and she would be able to keep herself and him till he was fit for work. There the letter ended, and she never wrote another to her Yorkshire friend. Can you wonder that my father married her? She was one of those people who never speak of the dead, so I never heard my father's name pass her lips, and had no notion she was a second wife till I got her marriage-certificate. She made a good deal of money, sent me to a good school in Melbourne, and told me I was a gentleman by birth. As marriage with a deceased wife's sister is lawful in Australia, I don't doubt she thought it had become so in England. However that might be, Fairlea belongs to Herbert and can never be mine. I wrote and told him so this morning. Aren't you glad, Miss Clare?"

"I'm glad for Mr. Herbert Fortescue's sake," said Clare with an effort, "but I'm sorry for your disappointment. And," she added, looking up in his face, "how well you bear it!"

"Oh no, I'm very much cut up about it," replied Mark in his usual even tones. "I didn't want the money; but I did want the position. Birth is a thing you can't buy. I thought I was an English gentleman."

"So you are, and always will be," exclaimed Clare, and then she checked herself and blushed at the earnestness of her tone.

As to Mark, the red blood leaped up to face and brow, and a new light shone in his eyes.

"I should have valued Fairlea," he said, "chiefly because it would have raised me in position to your level."

"You would in position have been my superior, for my father does not own a single acre. But I don't so much value position."

"You value birth?"

"It's a good thing to come of honest folk."

Mark walked on in silence, looking on the ground, then, raising his head, he said softly and as if thinking aloud:

"You can't think what a strange and wonderful thing it is to me to talk to you—to hear you talk. I've never been used to English ladies. I've met with a few on board ship, or in railway cars, but none like you. England is a beautiful language, as you speak it."

Clare laughed, but she could not keep down a blush of pleasure. Mark's admiration was so genuine, and he so unsophisticated.

"I'm glad," she said, "I don't maltreat Her Majesty's English."

"That's not what I mean; it's your voice—your tone. I hope my telling you so is not impertinent."

"Oh no; I know what you mean. You did not happen to be thrown among American ladies; and some people in New York speak through their noses."

"It's not that either—they are altogether different. No one is like you, and I know that I shall never meet anyone who could seem to me in any degree the same."

He spoke without hesitation, but not without a feeling of shyness, which brought the deep colour to his bronzed cheek. Clare was in his eyes an almost celestial being, and it would seem that in an angelic presence men have always felt afraid. But, shy as he felt, his words had the ring of truth's pure gold; and Clare felt that he loved her as she had never been loved before. Of such love Herbert had been incapable, and this she vaguely felt; but her heart had not recovered from its recent wound—it was not yet prepared to own another lord.

"I hope we shall always be friends," she said, and her calm speech did not disappoint Mark. He had not expected heaven's gates to open for him; it was much that Clare had set them ajar.

He was looking down on her, as a man might gaze on a vision dim but sweet—a vision suggesting vague possibilities—when there was a sound of voices and of footsteps on the terrace stairs, and he found himself face to face with Herbert Fortescue and a lady.

What brought them there can be briefly told. Herbert's solicitor had written to inform him that a man was now in London who had been present at the burial of Reginald Fortescue's first wife, and that the clergyman who had married him to Mark's mother was still officiating in the church in Melbourne where the banns had been published. He added that he was still investigating Reginald's history, for sometimes extraordinary circumstances would come to light to invalidate a claim to property; but, as every fresh discovery furnished another link in Mark's chain of evidence, he strongly advised his client to accept such terms as the claimant might offer without delay. When his right should be fully established, a compromise would be, of course, far more difficult to effect.

This letter Herbert had taken to Miss Morley, to whom he was now formally engaged, and who, to his great comfort, relieved him as far as possible from the bore of managing his own affairs.

Beneath the crust of conventional manner and the garb of fashion Miss Morley concealed from casual observers the shrewdness of a woman of business.

"Keep Fairlea Hall if possible," she said, "even at the sacrifice of a large portion of the land. You can add to your property after a few years of economy, but you cannot buy position or family portraits."

"The economy will be no end of a bore," said Herbert despondingly.

"You will be able to keep a couple of hunters, and I shall not be much expense. The county ladies would only hate me if I dressed better than they."

This, when she was bringing him three thousand pounds a year, extracted from Herbert an expression of gratitude and admiration.

Then Miss Morley proposed that he should take her to Fairlea, for she felt she would like to judge of the condition of the house before Herbert had sacrificed property in order to retain it.

Accompanied by her aunt, who was a discreet chaperon and continually effaced herself, she had been examining every room with satisfaction, when, on descending the terrace-steps, she saw before her a larger edition of her fiancé, and with him a girl who, as she met Herbert, grew suddenly pale.

It was a strange meeting, and perhaps each of the four who met so unexpectedly might have adopted the exclamation of Miss Miggs at that "conflicting moment."

They paused and looked one another in the face with unfriendly glances.

Mark saw before him the owner of all he had so lately thought to share, and the sight of him certainly produced no pleasing sensation.

Herbert had caught on Mark's face, as he bent over Clare, an expression which showed he would strive to rival him in love as well as in position, and for that one moment he could have been fain to slay him on the spot.

Clare knew that Herbert had quickly found another love, for his engagement to Kate Morley had been duly announced, and if she was pale it was not from wounded affection.

Miss Morley felt no very deep emotion—only a passing jealousy of the girl whose name she guessed intuitively, and whom she found so young and charming, needing no dresses by Worth to give her—as she stood there in her homespun—a distinguished air.

As this incongruous quartette stood thus, at the bottom of the terrace-steps, anger or annoyance blazed out of their eyes for two or three seconds; then the gentle influences of civilisation came to their aid, and each face became a decent mask.

Mark was the first to speak.

"I've taken the liberty of going over your house, Mr. Fortescue," he said, holding out his hand, which Herbert remembered it was his policy to take.

"Very glad, I'm sure," said he.

"How do you do?" said Clare in the coolest and most cheerful manner. "Pray introduce me," she added, glancing towards Miss Morley.

And as Herbert, with dry lips which would hardly articulate, presented the girl he still loved to the woman whose monotonous excellence had already begun to weary him, Clare was avenged.

But the momentary return to savage instincts had given way to good manners.

"I reckon you left town before a letter from me reached you by second post, Mr. Fortescue," said Mark.

"Yes; we started early. I shall be glad to talk over any arrangement you may propose."

"I have nothing to propose," replied Mark, amusing himself for a moment with the anxiety which even Herbert's habitual non-chalance could not wholly conceal.

"You will of course understand that I should not yield to your claim unless you are prepared to make terms with me, and so avoid a Chancery suit," replied Herbert nervously.

Mark smiled.

"All right. There will be no Chancery suit. I withdraw my claim. My father's marriage, though lawful in Australia, is illegal here. I shall return to the country where my name is Fortescue."

Herbert gasped.

"Are you sure of this?" he said, and found that he was trembling so that he could scarcely stand.

"Quite sure. I have no claim to your estate, Mr. Fortescue. You are monarch of all you survey," and serene in his strong character and more robust physique, he looked with pity, not unmingled with amusement, at the effect of his words upon Herbert.

It was a relief to Mr. Fortescue that Miss Morley and Clare kept up a flow of very small talk for a few minutes.

He was recovering a little from the shock of sudden joy as Clare turned towards the Lodge.

"Good-morning," she said. "We shall meet again, I hope, for no doubt you will be calling on the Miss Fortescues."

This time Mark succeeded in taking from her her camp-stool and drawing-block, and the concession gave his voice a cheerful ring as he said:

"Good-bye, Mr. Fortescue. Glad to see you at Daisy Place, Pitfield, if ever you come to Victoria."

Herbert and Miss Morley were married while yet the leaves, though gold and copper tinted, clothed the wood of Fairlea Manor.

In Herbert's beautiful home it is his wife's chief care to please him. Yet he often remembers, with a bitter regret, the changeable moods and bright intelligence of one who has not reached a dead level of superficial excellence.

Mark has returned to Victoria, and as Clare gave him leave to write to her, every Australian mail brings her a letter. They are only friends, she says, but she betrays great interest in the arrival of the Melbourne packets, and wears a ring made from an Australian nugget, which used to appear on Mark's little finger.

Miss Fortescue cannot understand why Herbert married a doctor's daughter instead of Clare, and is beginning to connect the circumstance with her having sent a letter with her strawberries.

"My child," she lately said, "if I could think I had blighted your young life——" but Clare interrupted her:

"My dear Miss Fortescue, do I look like a blighted being? On the contrary—I may say so, as Herbert is so happily married—I feel I am under great obligation to 'The Parcel Post.'"

On Christmas Eve.

HEAP on the logs! till the bright sparks quicker
Upwards fly in a glittering train.
Heap on the logs! till the red flame's flicker
Comes and goes on the diamond-pane.
Window may quiver, and door may rattle,
Shaken and swayed by the tempest's din;
Little we reck of the stormy battle,
Safely housed in the warmth within.
Faces happy with youthful gladness,
Flush and beam in the ruddy light;
Faces furrowed with lines of sadness,
Leave unheeded their cares to-night.
Snatches of music, and song, and laughter,
Cheerily mingle, and rise, and fall,
Ringing up to the oaken rafter,
Echoing back from the silent hall.
Surely but once, in the year's swift changes,
Comes the message of peace to earth;
Surely but once, as around it ranges,
Comes the season of happy mirth!
Hope! that the shadows of life can brighten;
Joy! that is governed by reason's rule;
Love! that the burdens of life can lighten;
Reign in our hearts on this eve of Yule.

Snowdon House.

(A SHORT SERIAL STORY.)

PART II.

AGATHA rose after a few very bitter moments, during which she mastered the tears which began to flow, and with her lips set in a look of determination which implied some resolve, drew up the blind, and admitted the light—now the fading light of evening—into the room. She looked at the letter which had been given to her with a sad smile before she opened it.

"I do not think that my father, sadly driven as he is, will counsel my seeking a situation in a lunatic asylum," she said. "No, when we are compelled to resort to such work, it must be for our own profit. I know he has often thought of such a scheme. I trust he has decided upon something which will enable me to leave this hateful place. How can I live here now?"

She opened the letter as she said this, and, seating herself close to the casement, began to read it. Ere she had read many lines she started, passed her hand nervously across her forehead, while over her face, which had become pallid, there came again a scarlet flush.

"Good Heaven!" she muttered, "can it be possible?"

She read and re-read the letter, which was indeed of strange import to her. It was of no great length, and to quote it may save a great deal of explanation. It ran thus:

"MY DEAR AGATHA,

"Your last letter reached me on the same day with one from your aunt, which dealt with almost the same subjects, but in a very different spirit, and from a very different point of view. This correspondence would have added a great deal to my other troubles, as you feared would be the case, but for something which has determined me to make a total change in my plans. I have frequently mentioned Mr. Wayre, of Snowdon House. You have learnt that he is not only the wealthiest patient I have ever secured, but that he has given me some assistance, and seems inclined to do more. I understand him thoroughly, and I now ask you plainly—do you think you could consent to marry him? He is twice your own age, and more, but he is manageable, despite some eccentric points—only eccentric in a social sense—and rich—very rich. I am sure from what I know of him that this could be managed, and speedily. I would not propose such a scheme if I saw any chance of your doing better; but a penniless girl, with no friends of influence, has but a poor chance of doing so much. You would have a fine position here, and he would stand my banker to a large amount if I wished to improve my practice. This last consideration, although of course of importance, would not, as I am sure you know, Agatha, of itself have influenced me to write on the subject. If you think the alternative thus offered more pleasant than any other opening now presenting itself, leave your aunt as soon as possible—at once if you can—and return home. In any case write to me by first post.

"Your affectionate father,

"FRANK FULHAM.

"P.S.—Mr. Wayre is a widower, but I know from his own lips that there is no one in the world with any claim upon him."

It must be owned that this was a letter calculated to startle a young woman, and demanding some intense thought, even if its receipt had not been preceded by such painful and exciting circumstances.

"It is well," said Agatha, after a reverie which had lasted so long that the last tinge of daylight had faded away, and lights were shining from the white-curtained windows of the few houses visible from where she sat; "it is well that this was not made known to me earlier! It is well that every spark of hope should first have been trampled out, or I might— My father is right!" she exclaimed after a brief pause. "I know better than he does how right he is. Since love, and romance, and all the brilliant colours with which I had decked the future are gone, let me take that which is in my reach, and try to do my duty." An involuntary shudder checked her speech here, and she clasped her hands over her eyes. "I have no choice," she went on as she hastily arranged her hair and bathed her eyes, "I must not look back. Others have suffered and lived on before me; surely I can do as they have done."

She went downstairs, where she found, in the parlour, Mrs. Gurdon with Mr. Gurdon, whom we have purposely placed second on the list, as his wife was first and chief in the house. The three children, who completed the family, were also there; these were to some extent under Agatha's charge, and her frequent indispositions had of late increased the housewife's responsibility, and, it is probable, had somewhat soured her temper.

But besides these, there was present one person who was thoroughly objectionable to Agatha, although his frequent visits were undoubtedly made upon her account, and were as undoubtedly encouraged by Mrs. Gurdon. As this visitor will not personally figure again in our tale, it will be enough to say that he was a tolerably well-to-do tradesman in the village, and regarded by Mrs. Gurdon as a great "catch" for her penniless niece, and the temper referred to was greatly soured by Agatha's persistent avoidance of this worthy resident.

He rose and made a formal bow as Agatha entered, while Mrs. Gurdon looked up with something akin to a smile, intending, perhaps, to show to her niece that if she behaved well, even now all might go right, and no more be heard of the dreaded situation at Dr. Smith's.

"Had I needed encouragement in my resolve, it is now supplied," thought the girl; "here, then, is one of the alternatives to which I must be reduced if I slight my father's letter. I will speak at once, while I have the resolution strong upon me. I will say what cannot be recalled, and I know will never be forgiven."

Thus resolved, she took her seat, and devoted herself to the younger members of the circle.

To two or three attempts at conversation on the part of the stranger—whose name, by-the-bye, was Tummell—she gave brief replies, until, presently, Mrs. Gurdon unconsciously sprang the mine which was prepared. She did this by telling her that Mr. Tummell had been good enough to come with an invitation to join him in a little excursion a few miles out from the village, and had kindly included Agatha in the party. Mrs. Gurdon concluded by saying that she had accepted the invitation on Agatha's behalf with thanks.

"It is very kind, no doubt, on the part of Mr. Tummell," returned the girl, "but it will be impossible for me to accept the invitation."

"Impossible!" interrupted the lady; "why impossible? What do you mean?"

"I mean that I must leave you before the date you mention," said Agatha quietly. "I was about to ask you, indeed, how soon you could spare me."

"Spare you!" ejaculated each of her listeners, not including the children, of course, while Mrs. Gurdon continued:

"What whim have you taken into your head now? I thought you were anxious to get a situation?"

"So I was," replied the girl; "but my father wishes me to return home, and I shall be glad to do so as soon as possible, without inconvenience to yourself."

"Inconvenience!" exclaimed Mrs. Gurdon with a toss of her head, and in a tone which spoke volumes. "It is quite a new thing for you to study our convenience, and, as far as I am concerned, you may leave to-morrow."

There was a good deal more said on the subject, not all being so acid in its flavour; the visitor, indeed, and, as far as he dared, Mr. Gurdon, offering some slight arguments against her departure; but the good lady of the house had her way, as was the custom there. Mrs. Gurdon felt herself slighted by this resolve so unexpectedly announced, and determined to have no half measures. So, in accordance with her decisive speech, it was arranged, ere they separated that evening, that Agatha should leave by the midday train on the morrow.

This was prompt execution, but it suited both parties. Mrs. Gurdon was glad to get rid of the relative whose presence had never been agreeable to her, and who had shown a perverse determination not to do the only thing which could, in Mrs. Gurdon's opinion, make a provision for her. Agatha was, of course, glad to leave a spot which was identified with so much that was painful, and accordingly she gladly took her seat at the appointed time in the train which arrived at Bridgeley that evening, having telegraphed her immediate compliance with his request to her father, who met her at the station.

The doctor's first exclamation was one of surprise at her looking so ill, but she explained that it was only through the excitement and unpleasantness of leaving her aunt so suddenly. Dr. Fulham had known all along that his daughter was far from comfortable with her relative, so was not surprised at this report. Medical men, too, however quick and accurate they may be in discerning the symptoms of their patients, are no more gifted than ordinary people when they have to deal with their own families, and so the unmistakable traces of grief and anxiety so plainly visible in Agatha's face were accepted as being the result of so trivial a cause.

Late as was the hour of her arrival, Agatha held a long conversation with her father, which lasted far into the night, and in which she exhibited a resolution and a willingness to agree to the doctor's proposals which greatly delighted that gentleman, who had perhaps expected some difficulty with her. Then, in addition to this particular scheme, there was a docility in the girl which was what he had not looked for, and which was so far beyond all he had seen in past days, that he could not help muttering, when he had bidden her good-night, and was alone:

"After all, Jane Gurdon has done her some good. I had no idea of finding Agatha so much improved by the visit."

The dog was sent to Mr. Wayre in due course, under charge of a keeper from the London dealer, and in accordance with the advice of Dr. Fulham, the animal was paraded through Shaletown, where it was seen by most of the "hands," while even those who did not see the dog must have heard of it to a certainty, as Nero's appearance made a marked sensation in the place.

A crowd of admiring boys and girls followed the keeper with his charge quite up to the lodge-gates of Snowdon House, so that there was no question as to the creature's destination being well known, and from the outspoken comments of the crowd, which were overheard by Mr. Wayre, he felt that there was at last some hope of a time of rest and safety for him and his property.

The doctor came over that evening on purpose to be introduced to the hound, the keeper staying all night in order to do what was necessary in this way, for, as the man said: "He would be blown if the dog hadn't got as much sense as a Christian, or a Lord Mayor, for the matter of that, and knowed people as he was introduced to, and was as harmless as a babby. But just let anybody as wasn't introduced to him try any games," and so on.

Safe quarters for the creature's use during the day were provided, and Ezra was installed as its custodian, not greatly to the manager's delight.

Wayre expressed himself highly pleased with his acquisition, and at once resumed work in the improvement of his demesne, which for some time had been suspended.

The doctor still paid his visits, which had, indeed, come to be considered as much friendly as professional; as much to give advice on general subjects as on the health of Mr. Wayre, and the latter looked forward to these calls with much eagerness.

One day, however, the doctor did not come, and Mr. Wayre's temper suffered in consequence; as Ezra found, and his wife, and the men who were at work in the grounds, all of whom interchanged remarks at the lodge-gates uncomplimentary to their employer.

The next day Mr. Wayre was restless and fidgety in his manner; once he ordered the chaise to be got out, but countermanded it directly. Nothing could please him, and Ezra, in the safe security of the lodge, denounced his master's temper in language which formed a suitable counterpart to that which he himself had received during the morning.

A little later in the day the master was standing by the side of a trench in which some men were digging, when he was startled by a tap on the shoulder, for he had heard no footsteps approaching on the soft turf, and then a voice said:

"Here at last, Mr. Wayre."

It was the doctor, and the patient turned quickly round with an exclamation which was intended half for welcome and half for an expression of his disappointment, but both were checked in surprise at what he saw.

By the side of the doctor stood an elegant and particularly handsome young woman, who bowed as she met his eye, while Fulham said:

"This is my daughter, Mr. Wayre; she came home last night, and I thought you would not mind my bringing her over, as I wished her to see what could be done in the way of improving such an estate as this."

"I am extremely happy in thinking that Miss Fulham will be good enough to watch our progress," said Wayre, lifting his hat as he made the most conventional speech the doctor had ever heard him deliver; "at present, Miss Fulham, you see us at our worst, I hope."

"I see that your grounds are capable of being made very beautiful, sir," returned the young lady; "indeed, they are beautiful now. The view in every direction is so charming, that if it were not for—" She paused here, as if slightly embarrassed.

"Ah, if it were not for those detestable ironworks!" exclaimed Mr. Wayre. "Yes, I could see what you meant, but I have shut them out from nearly every window of the house, and by a belt of transplanted trees and quick-growing shrubs at the south-east corner there, I will hide them from—" Yet this cannot interest you, Miss Fulham, you will not care—"

"But I do care," smiled the young lady, as the speaker paused; "you forget, or rather do not know, Mr. Wayre, that I have just come up from the heart of a rural district, where we had nothing more exciting to study than such things as trees and shrubs; the crops, of course, diversified it, and so did my poultry."

"Yes," said the doctor, "to Agatha, Bridgeley will seem a centre of gay and fashionable life, I have no doubt. We need no better amusement than this."

Mr. Wayre, however, would not be content with this assurance, and took his visitors into the house, where the doctor's stay was prolonged beyond even his usual measure. When they left, the host would not hear of their walking home, but ordered out the chaise in earnest, and accompanied them to Bridgeley.

The conversation was chiefly carried on between Dr. Fulham and Mr. Wayre; when Miss Agatha spoke, it was in answer to some direct appeal from one or the other, generally from her host. At parting the latter exclaimed, as though he had just remembered it:

"Do not fail to run over to-morrow, doctor, and—by Jove! 'tis well I thought of it—Miss Fulham must be introduced to Nero, not that he is ever out in the daytime, but I hope sometimes to see you both of an evening, and it is as well to be on the safe side."

"And who is Nero, sir?" asked the girl.

Ezra was driving, and as he heard this question, muttered something between his teeth.

An explanation was of course given, to which Miss Fulham listened with evident pleasure, and declared that if possible she should like to go over soon and see such a noble creature, for she doted on dogs, especially large ones, there was something in them so much like a lion.

"Well, Miss Fulham, if that be your taste, I am confident you will not be disappointed in Nero," returned Mr. Wayre; "he is lion-like enough, I fancy, to scare many an actual king of the forest, as I believe it is correct to call the lion."

A little more on the subject was said, and then the carriage drove back.

Ezra was in no good temper again to-day, and when he went to have his tea at the lodge, began, as his wife said, "a cussin' and swearin'" about the doctor's daughter.

"She not know who Nero was!" exclaimed the manager; "she with her pretty, innocent ways, and her fondness for big dogs! She knew as well what Nero was, and why he was here, as master did himself—perhaps it will turn out she knew a good deal more. She is invited here to-morrow, and she will come, Sukey, you may take your oath of that."

Mr. Ezra was not disposed to be a lenient critic of Miss Agatha Fulham, that was plain, but he was sagacious enough to be very civil and attentive to her when she came on the next day, for Ezra's prophecy was exactly fulfilled. The young lady was delighted with Nero, and patted his massive head with her gloved hand, at the very commencement of their interview. It is true that Nero's master, and Ezra, Nero's keeper, were present, and that the terrible quadruped was always gentle to those who were so presented to him; nevertheless, few girls would have had the courage to put their hands within snapping distance of his great white fangs, and Mr. Wayre was pleased by her daring, at which Ezra himself was a little astonished.

So this visit was a success, and as the workmen were not likely to be soon got rid of at Snowdon House, and as many occasions arose when the opinion of a third party, especially a lady, was valuable, there was nothing strange about the request which Mr. Wayre made to the doctor, and in consequence of which the latter brought his daughter with him in his daily visits.

Mr. Wayre owned that these visits were the only relief to his dulness which made it bearable; sometimes, indeed, he anticipated them by going over to Bridgeley with the chaise, where, taking up Dr. and Miss Fulham, they would drive out to some pleasant or interesting spot, which showed, as Mr. Wayre readily owned, that the patient must be getting a great deal better,

The alterations at Snowdon House, too, were extended, and included large improvements in the somewhat dreary mansion itself, and so went on some months, the keen eyes of Dr. Fulham watching and noting everything, we may be sure, until one day, when these alterations were all finished, the workmen all banished, and the estate had resumed its pristine quietude, the doctor arrived to pay his daily visit without his usual companion.

This omission naturally called forth an immediate enquiry on the part of Mr. Wayre.

"Oh, I have left her busy—packing up," returned the doctor; "women, you know, always make such a momentous business of that."

He said this with a light air and a smile, but the face of his listener showed no smile in return.

"What do you mean, sir?" he asked; "you talk as if I understood you. I don't."

"Why, surely I have spoken about it to you. I must have done so often," replied Dr. Fulham with an expression of surprise, which did him credit if it were not natural; "she's going away to-morrow to a friend—a relative—in London. She will probably stay there until she gets a situation. She thinks of being a governess, you know."

"No, sir, I do not know this," retorted Wayre, who paused for a second, then went on abruptly: "Come into the house, sir; I have something to say to you."

Without a word the doctor followed him, and took a seat in the gloomy square parlour as he had been accustomed to do, and waited the promised communication. Mr. Wayre did not speak at once, nor did he even look at his companion; his eyes, his knitted brow, his tightly-closed lips, were turned from him. The host was gazing intently from the window, but a less astute observer than the doctor might have told, with no great difficulty, that he saw nothing of the landscape which lay beyond, but that his brow was bent in consideration of mental, not external objects.

Turning suddenly, he began just as suddenly:

"This unexpected information, doctor, leads me to speak a little earlier than I intended—only a little, for I have had the intention in my mind for months. I am an old man, I know—"

"No such thing," interposed Fulham; "I do not mean to call myself old for many a day—why should you?"

"I am somewhat older than you in years, far older in health, and in trouble also," continued Wayre; "but we need not bandy argument; I merely wish to show that I do not shrink from the avowal, or disguise the fact. I was a miserable, lonely man when you first came here, and I believe that but for you I should have sunk into—into what I dread. Yet your skill alone might have failed; it has been your daughter's society that has wrought the charm. To look forward to her visits, day by day, has brightened my existence."

"I am pleased to think we have been of any service to you," said Fulham as the other paused here. "I hope the improvement—"

"I am glad that this opportunity has presented itself of speaking to you first, and alone," continued Mr. Wayre, without any reference to the speech the doctor had commenced; "I can speak more freely. I do not like to say I am in love with Miss Fulham; such an expression has a romantic flavour only fitted for younger people, but I will offer her my home, my kindest attention, my wealth. She will not have a bad position as Mrs. Wayre of Snowdon House, where her will shall be law, and I will strive to cause her as little regret at the acceptance of my offer as possible."

"You astonish me! this is so utterly unlooked for!" exclaimed the doctor when Wayre had finished speaking. His listener did indeed look astonished, but until that moment his piercing eyes had followed every change in Wayre's countenance, every movement of his lips, with the keen, watchful air so familiar with him. "Has Agatha any idea—have you said—"

"You surely must know I have not spoken to her," interrupted Wayre. "Had I done so she would have told you; and, besides, you know, also, that I have never seen her out of your company for ten minutes at a time."

"I really cannot say what her answer would be," pursued the doctor. "Not that I have any doubt as to her liking for your company. If you have found pleasure in her visits here, she has found equal pleasure in paying them. They have been looked forward to on her part, and, now I recall everything, I can see that great part of our evening conversation has been devoted to what has passed here in the day, or what we anticipated for the next day. I am sure she regards you as her best friend in the world—I will venture so far as that."

"What do you advise me to do?" said Mr. Wayre. "Will you act as my ambassador, or shall I drive over to your place to-night? I take it for granted that you, at all events, as a man of the world, will see the advantage—perhaps I don't mean exactly that, but I do look for your support. If she is going away I must have my answer to-night. I cannot afford the time for a seven years' courtship, you know."

"I hardly know how to answer you," returned the doctor slowly, and seeming to reflect as he spoke. "I will do what I can, readily, for you have my good-will. Come over to-night yourself; it will look better, and have a great effect. I fancy few girls would like to be asked in marriage by proxy. Yes, come over."

"I will, as you counsel it," replied Wayre. "You know Mr. Darley. He is my solicitor. Call on him to-morrow, and he will satisfy you as to my power and will to behave liberally."

"There is no occasion, I am sure—" began the doctor, who might have found it difficult to finish his sentence well, if the other had not gone impetuously on.

"There is occasion, sir," exclaimed Wayre. "I shall do what is right, and I wish you to know it. I can reward those who are true and kind to me, as I can punish and have punished those who are ungrateful and unjust to me—or those I thought to be so," he added with a change in his tone. "No man is a judge in his own case. I never thought again to see a face which I should prefer to other faces, or hear a voice that should sound sweeter in my ears than other voices. With—with what happened many years ago, and does not concern us now, I thought I had done with all that."

The conversation was carried on for a long time after this, the most genial manner marking Dr. Fulham's behaviour, and when he left he promised to use his best endeavours in behalf of his friend. A prolonged hand-shaking testified to their mutual good-will and appreciation.

The doctor had ridden out upon the only steed of which he boasted—carriage he had none—and on this he went back at a better speed than was usually gained from that quadruped. Evening was just closing in as he arrived at his house, and Miss Fulham, who had been at work in the sitting-room, had left off on account of the fading light, and was seated, thoughtfully gazing into the dark and little-frequented street as her father came in; and this work on which she was employed was not of the light and interesting kind called "fancy." It was good, honest, hard sewing, and was therefore work in more than one sense. The inmates of Dr. Fulham's household—they were not numerous—had to work in earnest.

As her father entered, she turned towards him with something like a sigh, quitting her reverie with a perceptible effort.

"Now, Agatha—" began the doctor. There was something in his tone which at once arrested the attention of the girl, and her abstracted look changed for one of the deepest attention. Her colour, too, went and came. She felt that it did, but the shade in the room—a dark and cheerless apartment at best—was too heavy to allow of this being seen by her father. "Now, Agatha," he said, "all has happened exactly as I expected. What I foretold is realised to the very letter. He will be over here to-night—he may be on the road now—to speak for himself."

"Mr. Wayre?" asked the girl.

"Mr. Wayre!" echoed her father, with an approach to irritation in his tone; "of whom could I be speaking, if I did not mean Mr. Wayre? At the bare mention of your going away, he took fright, spoke out at once; and, as I told you, is following to speak to you. You will be mistress of Snowdon House, Agatha—absolute in everything, I am sure. He has referred me to his lawyer, but, as you know, I have already made enquiries which have satisfied me that he is a far richer man than is commonly believed."

"I must go on with it then, I suppose," replied Agatha, who spoke in a tone very different to the eager, excited manner of her father; "this is the last moment for turning back."

"Turning back!—last moment!" cried Fulham. "What is the meaning of this? Who wishes to turn back? For what have we been striving, scheming—I must speak plainly, Agatha—for months past, but for this? Here we stand between poverty, disgrace, with all the miserable straits which failure brings, and comfort, peace, respect, luxury. How can you speak of turning back? Is it not as much for your sake, Agatha, as my own, that I have striven?"

"You are needlessly warm, father," said the girl; "I have not refused to join you hitherto, and I shall not refuse now. I am as little enamoured of poverty and all its straits, as you can be. I only wish to make sure, at this last moment, that we know our own minds, and are sure we wish for the success which seems within our grasp."

"Wish for it!" repeated the doctor scornfully; "how can we fail to do so?"

"You certainly cannot, you ought not to, expect any display of enthusiasm on my side," continued his daughter; "it has been difficult enough for me to sustain the part you have assigned to me. My future will not be the one which girls would—had they the power—pick out for themselves; so much the better, perhaps. I do not pretend to regret—" A momentary catch in her breath here checked her speech.

"I should think no girl would indeed pretend to regret anything in our lives and prospects," retorted the doctor; "you know well enough what it is here—by what shifts and stratagems I have been enabled to hold on until now; yet, dreary as such a life is, you were glad enough to leave the roof of your churlish relative to join me; you were glad, when there was a chance, of getting away from Cheshire."

"Yes," said the girl after a pause; "as you say, it was fortunate that I had a chance of leaving Cheshire." This, by-the-by, was not exactly what Dr. Fulham had said, but it was probably near enough. "And, since you continue in the same mind—since, I mean, that we are both in the same mind—I will go through with our plan. Do not fear for me, or my performance, father," she continued with a sudden change of tone and a laugh; "I see nothing before me better than to be Mrs. Wayre, nothing half so good as to be mistress of Snowdon House, and so I shall be quite prepared to enter on the negotiation."

Fulham appeared rather astonished by this abrupt change, but a good deal relieved by it nevertheless, and he echoed his daughter's laugh with loudness, if not with heartiness.

It was now almost dark, so the gas was lighted, the blinds drawn down, and the doctor was about to go to another room to have his cup of tea, when the noise of wheels was heard. It came closer, then stopped at their door.

Agatha glanced at her father, gave a significant wave of her hand in the direction of the sound, then sank into a chair, and took up a book at random from the table, on which lay several volumes, for this was the doctor's consulting-room, as well as Agatha's parlour when they had no patients—and they had not many.

The next moment the attendant boy announced that:

"If you please, sir, Mr. Wayre, from Snowdon House, is here, sir, and wants to see you."

Miss Chrissie's Protégé.

(A STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS.)

CHAPTER III.

DID Lucy Grant know why Seth Gavin was in prison? Did she know why that cruel blow had been struck among the woodland blossoms and the singing birds? Oh yes, she knew perfectly, and a far crueller blow had fallen on her own heart by the knowledge.

She had been quite conscious that he followed her that day, after she had quarrelled with him below the hill—quite conscious of it, and glad of it too, for she was growing weary of teasing and making him jealous, knowing, deep down in her heart, that there was no one like him, for strength, and patience, and tender love, to her.

"I'll let him overtake me, and then we'll make it up once for all," she said with a flush on her cheeks, knowing how much the "once for all" involved.

She was listening to his footsteps so intently, hearing, with quicker heart-beats, how they came nearer, that she never noticed the handsome, smiling Mr. Jacobs disposed in the most picturesque attitude beneath the big beech—never knew he was near her till he spoke. Then she stopped just long enough to fling a glance backwards and answer—she knew not what—while her lips smiled and her eyes were filled with a saucy gladness. The moment's pause and the blush accompanying it meant encouragement to the stranger, who hitherto had found encouragement frequently enough among the beauties of humble rank.

"What sweet flowers, but far less sweet than your own eyes!" he said, trying to seize her; but the girl broke from him, with as pure a sense of outraged dignity as could have stirred in the breast of a queen.

"Wretch! to look and speak like that, as if he thought me a fool, or worse!" she pouted, hurrying upwards, fleet as a fawn.

For a moment she longed to stop and claim Seth's sympathy and protection, but consideration for his interests deterred her. It would only make bad blood between him and the rich man, and Mr. Jacobs gave Seth frequent employment.

"Perhaps I shall tell him a little about it when I see him. I shall be cooler then, and he will care less," she concluded.

But all that evening he did not come, and before night she knew he was a prisoner.

"It is my fault—all my fault," she wailed, standing pallid as a ghost before her father. "Oh, I shall never forgive myself."

"How was it thy fault, child?" the old weaver asked pettishly.

"He saw me and Mr. Jacobs, and he is so jealous, and we had quarrelled."

"Saw what? What is the man at the mill to thee—a man of bad character like that, who has brought sorrow to many a lass before now?"

"It was nothing—nothing, indeed, father. I met him often, and he only stared at me, but to-day he spoke, and I, not thinking of him at all, but only of Seth, who was behind, I stopped, and then he tried to kiss me, and Seth saw him, I know, and that is how all has gone wrong. Oh, father, father, I don't care if the mill-owner is dead, but I do care if Seth has killed him."

"Heaven help Seth and thee, and me, and all of us!" the old man answered, groaning.

But Mr. Jacobs did not die, and as tidings of his slow convalescence crept up the hillside, Timothy Grant's heart rose. After all, things would not be so very bad for Seth. Jealousy is a potent motive for a rough action, all men allow, and a month's imprisonment, or perhaps, indeed, only a fine, would be all he need fear.

But at the trial things took a turn the Grants never anticipated. Mr. Jacobs swore, and honestly too, that the only motive he could assign for the attack made on him was a refusal on his part to employ Seth Gavin again at the rate of wages paid him hitherto; and to this Seth listened in apathetic indifference.

"There was another motive, I know," the old weaver interrupted querulously to the people near him, but they bade him silence impatiently, intent only on what the witnesses had to say.

Timothy Grant had entered the assize town that day with the light step and hopeful bearing of a young man. He left it tottering feebly, and his face was ashen-grey, for, to his judgment, Seth Gavin's young life was ruined, and the ruin had been wrought by Lucy Grant.

If the Greys were not very wide awake in a general way, they had made a decided hit for once in getting Seth Gavin as gardener, groom, carpenter, and factotum at no wages whatever. This was what the neighbourhood said, and neighbourhoods have generally the knack of expressing truths in an ill-natured way.

Gentle Miss Chrissie, actuated solely by the desire to help a fellow-mortal in distress, had found a treasure in the skilled mechanic who brought his best powers gratefully to her service. And it was wonderful what he could do—wonderful in the eyes of the delicate, scholarly curate and his mild, sweet, little sister. Why, in an evening he could get through more in the patch of garden than Mr. Grey was equal to in a week, and then, what window-boxes and rustic chairs he made, and what dishes of plumpest fish he caught! Half his time was given to the service of the parsonage-house, and yet in the other half he managed to do as much good work as daysmen achieved in full time. But that was because Seth never wasted an hour gossiping at the beershop, or came home, after an outing, with a headache.

Seth Gavin was the steadiest man in the whole country-side, and not because men held aloof from him now, as they had done at first, more in discomfort than contempt, but because those prison years had taught him to find in his own thoughts companionship enough.

Miss Chrissie had only meant to do a kind action in taking up Seth Gavin, but the kindness had borne more immediate fruit than is generally the habit of that slow-growing plant. Never before had her roses and gardenias looked as if a skilled hand attended on them; never before had her fowls slumbered peacefully, undisturbed by precipitate descents from crazy perches; never before had a hundred little comforts found their way to the parsonage.

"Seth is the cleverest creature," Miss Chrissie confided to her brother at the breakfast-table; "I don't know what he is ignorant of. He told me this morning how to cure the pip in chickens; and we never had eatable butter till he showed Nancy what was wrong with the churn."

"Yes, he can take a hand at anything—he is a fine fellow. I've been thinking a good deal about Seth lately, Chrissie."

"Have you?" Miss Chrissie's heart sank, she could not have told why; perhaps because the curate's "I've been thinking," so often involved a sacrifice for her.

"Yes, I've been thinking that no man would take a pound a week, and do for us what Seth Gavin does for nothing."

"Indeed I dare say not."

"Of course he does it out of gratitude because we took him up, but it is not fair that we should have all his services for nothing."

"No; but we could not afford to pay him, and indeed I don't believe he ever thinks of payment."

"Yet, all the same, Chrissie, justice is justice."

Miss Chrissie's mild face had grown indignantly pink. If she prided herself on anything it was on her fairness to every one; yet here was her brother actually seeming to accuse her of something.

"Well, if you think I've been doing anything unjust, it's more than Seth does," she said huffily.

"No, you haven't, Chrissie, you have been most kind and merciful when he needed a friend. But things are altering now. He has been here a year, under my eye, and so I can give him a character that will put him straight."

"He does not need a character. The whole neighbourhood——"

"But I mean him to leave the neighbourhood." Miss Chrissie's face fell. "It's only fair to him."

"Where do you mean him to go?" she asked in a small, subdued, disheartened voice.

"To Scotland. I saw Lord Calmont's advertisement accidentally in the Field yesterday. He wants a gamekeeper. To a man who knew something of carpentry, he would give excellent wages."

"But Seth is not a gamekeeper," Miss Chrissie protested with faint rebellion.

"It's all the same, a man like that may become anything he has a mind to."

"But would Lord Calmont not object?"

"I don't think so. I used to know him a little, and I shall write and tell him all the truth about Seth, and leave him to judge for himself."

"Do you think—is that best?" In spite of herself there was an anxious look on Miss Chrissie's face, and a sorrowful frown between her eyes.

"I think so."

The curate smiled at his sister as he spoke, and Miss Chrissie smiled back, though feebly. She had sacrificed too much to her brother in the past to hesitate at yielding her protégé now.

"Did you see Seth Gavin to-day?"

That was a frequent question of Lucy Grant's when her father came home, after leaving his webs with their owners, for though she and her former lover had never met since his return from that horrible life of which she never could bear to think, interviews between him and the weaver were not infrequent.

"No, not to-day."

The old man came over to the fireplace, and seated himself tiredly on the wooden settle, and looked thoughtfully at the smouldering embers.

"Any news down in the village, father?"

Lucy took up her knitting mechanically, but her hands trembled. She could hardly have told why. Perhaps she remembered that Timothy had looked just so, when he brought her word that her old playfellow was a felon.

"No news that I'm ready to believe yet," he answered fretfully.

"Then you have heard something?"

"Yes; they say that Seth has got a main good place in Scotland, and goes there soon for good."

"Well, why not? Movin' round is all the fashion; few folks die in the parish they were born in nowadays."

Lucy's cheerfulness was so assertive that the old man looked up at her curiously.

"I'm sorry to lose him. I thought you would ha' been sorry too," he said after a pause.

"Why should I be sorry? I haven't spoken to him for more than three years."

"And yet I thought once, Lucy, that you an' Seth might ha' made things right before now."

"Oh dear no, Seth is far too grand for the like of me," she said, speaking out of the bitterness of her sore heart; and then she rose and went outside, as if the stillness of the little kitchen oppressed her.

"These young ones—how they spoil things for one another," Timothy said with a sigh. "There is a small wrong-doing, and then a great fire of pain, and that is life. Well, it must burn itself out; friends are not wise who interfere."

Lucy's pain was burning itself out, she knew how cruelly. All the sorrow, and regret, and shame—for it was shame to have branded Seth Gavin—had concentrated itself now into despair.

He was going away without ever having spoken to her, without ever having heard her explanation, or known she loved him—going away thinking hardly of her, doubtless. And, bad as things were now, they would be worse when she had lost sight of him. Indeed, she scarcely knew how she could bear existence if she never saw his face or heard his name, or knew how he fared. She tried to think of the coming days in which she would look towards his place in church and find it vacant, in which she would see her father come up from the valley or over the hill without ever hoping he might utter a name that would set all her pulses stirring.

She was very miserable. Had she deserved quite so much misery? she asked herself often. Many a woman had done worse than she without faring so ill; but those women were luckier. He blamed her for his ruin, of course, and he could not forgive her, would never speak to her while they lived. That was a little cruel, and yet Lucy could not blame him. She was too dispirited to think of censuring him or any one.

"I shall speak to him myself. I shall offer him my good wishes, whether he will or no," she told herself valorously, still meaning to accost him, and still deferring the evil day.

And then another echo stole into her world of sound, an echo like the swish of a sabre after the hiss of a whip—Seth Gavin would not go alone to Scotland. Bessie Vance, who sat near him in church, and was often at Miss Grey's for an evening's sewing—Bessie with the pretty, glad young face—was going with him.

"Hear about your old sweetheart, Lucy?" the village girls asked with the bold discourtesy that passes for frankness in remote districts. "Bess Vance will be his wife now, instead of you, as we had thought."

"Bess thinks a gaol-bird good enough," another said with a coarse laugh, passing on.

He was to marry Bessie Vance! Well, once no one would have compared Bessie to her, for all her pearly teeth and face of cream and roses. But Bessie had never injured him.

Now that he was happy, now that things had all turned out well for him, surely he might have been great enough to come to her and offer her his pardon, and renew their old friendship. So much she would have done for him; but then he was a man, and men's ways were sometimes hard.

"I must speak to him. I shall suffer less when I have spoken," she said, and resolved to put herself in his way.

All the harvest-work in the Deepdale Valley was over. The harvest-festival had been celebrated everywhere, and the golden corn lay in bushels in the granaries. But the small produce of the curate's acre-patch was only now being threshed out by the homely, almost disused flail.

With his coat off, and the rustling straw lying about his feet, while his sturdy arms swung the flail with mighty strokes, Seth Gavin was looking his best. And so the girl thought, who entered at the door and stood just a faint shadow on his breadth of daylight.

"Is it you, Lucy?" he asked, pausing to gaze at her incredulously.

"Yes; I was passing here, and I heard you at your work, so I thought I'd step in out of the rain to speak with you."

"And right welcome you are—as welcome as sunshine," he said heartily as he threw the flail aside and piled the straw into a rustling golden throne for her. "Sit here, an' let me look at you. It's many a day since we have had a chat."

"I don't think that was my fault, Seth."

"No, maybe not."

His face had saddened and grown grave again.

"It's maybe bold of me to come after you to-day," she said with a short uncomfortable laugh, "but I wanted to give you my good wishes. You are going to Scotland, they say, and you will be happy and well-to-do there."

"Well no, Lucy. I don't mean to go after all. I let Mr. Grey ask the place for me, because I wanted to see if I could get it, with all there is against me; but I don't think I ever meant to take it. Somehow it's more like what I want just to stay on here, and work down folks' bad opinions. But I did want Mr. Grey to tell all the ill he knew of me, that I might see how a stranger would feel about it."

"And you could get the situation?"

"Yes; an' so I feel now that I can choose to stay in the old place, not that I must do it."

Lucy drew a short quick breath, whether of pain or relief she could not have told.

"Bessie will be pleased you are staying," she said after a pause.

"I think so."

"I have heard about you and Bessie," she went on steadily, after a pause, "and I'm very glad you have settled things if she will make you happy. All the folks speak well of her, now that she is to be your wife."

He did not answer for a minute. He had taken up his flail again, and stood leaning on it, and looking out on the ducks rioting and revelling in the rain.

"Bessie is a good girl an' wise," he said dreamily.

"Yes, and you're a good man, Seth. I think I scarcely knew how good till it was too late."

She was looking up at him now, her hands clasped about her knees, her eyes fearless and very bright.

"Then you are my friend, in spite of everything?"

"Was I ever anything else? I don't think so, though you have kept away from me as if I'd been an enemy."

"I did not mean it, Lucy. I was goin' back to you one night, an' I saw you break up the old seat I'd made for you—you remember?"

"Oh, Seth!"

"Yes, you were tearin' it down as if you hated it."

"Only because it was worn out and done—only because I loved it too well to leave it in ruins."

"I did not know. I was goin' back to you with my heart full of old times, goin' maybe to ask if you would not take me up when the whole world was against me, and I saw that, an' then I turned away again."

"What shall I do—oh, Seth, what shall I do?"

The rapid, hopeless tears were falling, the weak hands wrung each other feebly. All her undeserved pain had culminated now. He had loved her through all the time of his prison-life—had loved her, and was coming back to her, and she had lost him through such a pitiful chance!

"Do—why, nothing! What does it matter what I did or thought?" he said with a certain husky roughness in his voice.

Of course he belonged to another now; of course he had no right to come and comfort her; and yet it was hard that he should stand so far aloof and speak so harshly.

"It would not matter to everyone; but it does matter to me," she said, with a desperate effort to be calm, "and I think, for the sake of old times, you might have come and spoken."

"I had so little to offer, an' I was afraid of bein' tempted to ask."

"Ah, that is so like you men, so like some of you, at any rate." And then a new thought came, and took the momentary bitter blitheness out of her. "And yet you were not afraid to ask of Bessie, having as little to bestow on her."

"Bessie an' I are only good friends, Lucy. We were never more. David Clyde is her sweetheart. I know all about it."

She did not lift her glance or speak, and her down-dropped lids hid her shy, suffused eyes, but he was not looking at her, only out at the falling rain.

"You see there was so little to lead me to you then," he went on sadly. "I was just out of gaol, without a character, an' with a poor chance of good work for many a day, an' you had thought but little of me when I could offer a pleasant home an' a good name."

"I was such a fool then, wanting all the coaxing and seeking, and none of the care. I'd have played with you if you'd been a prince. I could not help it, and maybe I didn't care for you then, maybe I only learned to care when I knew I had spoiled your life."

"Then you do care now?"

"It's three years and three months since I knew I loved you with all my heart."

"You see I owed him some special favour for his special pain," she told Miss Chrissie afterwards, "and I felt that if I did not ask him then, he'd likely never come as near wanting me again."

"Is Seth at home?" The curate had stopped his cob and the little phaeton, that were his sister's proudest possession, before the carpenter's door.

"He's working at the Park, sir, but I expect him home any time," the little wife answered, smiling.

"Well, I can't wait now, but tell him when he comes back that he was elected a churchwarden at yesterday's vestry meeting."

"It is the best proof of confidence the parish could give him," the curate said to himself, as he drove on between the hawthorn hedges, "and I'm glad to think they voted, to a man, for Chrissie's protégé."

Mistletoe.

I KISSED you in the long ago

Beneath the holly,
Where hung some hidden mistletoe;
We were but boy and girl, and so
You thought it sweet as I, I know,
That youth's dear folly.

But now with years long left behind,
And melancholy,
I come from other lands to find
Not you, who filled my heart and mind,
My unforgotten saint enshrined
In niche of holly—

But one who says that bygone day
Was childish folly,
That we must muse on growing grey,
And leave the boys and girls to play,
With mistletoe and wreathings gay
Of Christmas holly.

Now look me frankly in the eyes,
My cousin Dolly,
Oh yes, your words are wondrous wise,
But what care I while all I prize
Is mine, while your sweet look denies
You think it folly?

Gustav's Ghost.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

PEOPLE were congratulating each other upon the arrival of "another old-fashioned Christmas;" they seemed quite to enjoy being chilly for so good a cause, and on so appropriate an occasion.

As for me, I got into a smoking-carriage, lit a cigar, and wished that I had not quite such a long journey before me in this "fine, seasonable weather."

Grey and white, white and grey, the landscape flew past the windows; snow-clouds gathered, a wind sharp as a sword found its way to my corner every time the door was opened, and I thought with a sigh of the mist and mud of last year. Then also I had gone down to my uncle's for Christmas, and hunted blissfully, to my own satisfaction and the astonishment of my family and friends.

"I thought it was all over with you, my boy," said Sir Reginald. "I never meant to own you as my nephew again after your going to that German hole. But I suppose a Boscawen can't help riding?"

And he never more reproached me with that "German hole"; in other words the university of Tübingen, which, to his unspeakable surprise and horror, I had preferred to that of Oxford. Indeed I had every reason to suppose that he had forgiven all Germany and the Germans too, for he had condescended to invite my college chum Gustav von Friedland to meet me at the Hall this Christmas-time.

I could not help laughing as I thought of Gustav at my uncle Reginald's. The wildest of smoking, beer-drinking, duel-fighting students had he been when last I saw him, captain of the most eccentric club, and talker of the most vernacular Swabian.

His friendship for me had been of a highly romantic type, and his letters for a year after I came home had been enthusiastically frequent. Lately, however, they had ceased, after one gloomy note in which he told me he was a doomed, lost, ruined man. He had made no answer to my "kind enquiries," and I wondered in what mood I should find him.

Darker and darker grew the scene outside, and twilight deepened into night, before a well-known station, a welcoming servant, and a waiting carriage showed that my journey was coming to an end.

Soon I was in sight of the Hall, flashing promises of hospitality from every window, as the steady lamplight or dancing firelight streamed out upon the darkness.

I knew beforehand what I should find when I made my way in; the merry party in the great oak-panelled hall—one of the county sights—the school boys and girls, the elder people standing round the great log-fire, the smiling faces of my cousins, the genial laugh and welcome of my uncle, the soft voice and smile of his wife. But I could not imagine what Gustav would be about in the midst of them.

I went in, unannounced as usual, and there was more noise than usual to guide me—shouts, laughter, cries of "Bravo!"

They were all playing a game of Blindman's Buff, I found, and the applause had been evoked by the very Gustav himself, who had sprung over some seemingly insurmountable barrier in his flight from the blind man.

"Hallo, here's Frank!" shouted a schoolboy cousin, as I stood in the doorway, and in a moment they were all round me, shaking hands, welcoming, questioning, all in a breath.

Gustav stared, with eyes that had become very wild and haggard since I had seen them; seemed for a moment uncertain as to my identity; and then rushed forward and embraced me, to the unspeakable delight of certain schoolboys there assembled.

But they did not allow him much time for his rapturous greetings, dragging him back to the game as quickly as might be.

Sir Reginald stood watching him with a rather puzzled expression. "Never saw such an active fellow in my life as that friend of yours, Frank; running, jumping, tumbling about, never quiet. And he rides too," added he thoughtfully, as one who had not expected such a thing from that outer barbarian, a foreigner.

"He was always very active," I said. "Fond of riding and driving too," and I mentally recalled Gustav as he used to appear in the uniform of his fellowship, driving his four-in-hand at a gallop out of Tübingen, hotly pursued by outraged authority.

"He's a decent sort of fellow, that Von What's-his-name," said one of the schoolboys presently; "but, you know, Frank, he's an awful old lunatic. I never saw such a fellow. He goes about staring and muttering to himself sometimes, like a fellow in a play, and seems not to see you when you speak to him. Then he wakes up, shrieking with laughter, and rushing about in the maddest way. He's bought an Irish horse that's as mad as himself, and he jumped him right over Deadman's Dyke the other day. If they don't break each other's necks soon, that horse and that foreigner, I'm a Dutchman myself. Look at him now. Did you ever!"

Certainly I never had seen anyone run and jump as lightly and quickly, he seemed to pass through the hands of the pursuers like a smoke-wreath.

"Does he play and sing much, here?" I asked.

"Operas full," returned my companion, with a little air of disgust. "That's the worst of him. Shows he's only a German after all."

"For shame!" cried my prettiest cousin, Katie, often described as "the one with the blue eyes." "Herr von Friedland is charming at the piano. Only fancy, Frank, he can improvise most beautifully. He does it sometimes in the evening to stop our going upstairs. He would sit up all night if he could."

"The servants say he comes out of his room and runs up and down stairs at night," put in another boy; "Felton thinks there's a bogey after him."

Evidently Gustav was the hero of the hour; but I did not quite like his looks and all that they had said of him. It all reminded me of that last gloomy letter I had had from him.

The game was over at last, the dressing-bell rang, and obediently, as usual, we dispersed at the sound.

"You have your old room, Frank, at the end of the long corridor, and Herr von Friedland is next to you," said Lady Boscawen.

"Come, come, I will show you the way," cried Gustav, taking my arm as we went upstairs. "It is a hard house to know, but I knew it directly."

"Considering that I have spent all my Christmases here these five-and-twenty years, I think I ought to know my way about it too."

"Ah, but you come and go like a man," Gustav rattled on in his beloved Swabian. "You do not know the place at all hours—you never glide about it like the ghost, when all the rest are busy with their dreams—eh? You don't know all the cracks and creakings, the wind-whisperings and moanings that are abroad in it then."

"Well, I prefer my bed at such times, I must say," I answered, looking at him curiously.

He followed me into my room, when he suddenly turned grave, and stood looking about him sadly enough.

"Perhaps I shall rest quieter in my grave—I mean my bed, now you are close to me," he said. "I did not like this room being empty."

"Why, Gustav, you are the last man in the world to say such things. I should have expected you to laugh at loneliness."

"Alone! Ah yes, to be alone, that is a very good thing, but not to be alone, and yet not to be allowed to choose one's company, that is a bad thing—a bad thing, Frank!"

Then with a queer, twitching sort of smile he left the room.

"Your friend is so peculiar, Frank," Katie confided to me, as we stood waiting for dinner. "So very peculiar that I expect he will make you feel quite responsible."

"Responsible?"

"Don't you know how you have people on your conscience when you have introduced them, and they do not behave themselves?"

"I hope Gustav behaves himself?"

"Ah, of course. But, Frank, he is so odd!"

"How?"

"I can't describe it. But he is odder than odd sometimes. By the way, he is a great admirer of mine, do you know?"

"I don't see the oddity of that, I must confess."

At this moment the subject of our speech came into the room. A slight man he was, with fair hair, and blue eyes, a sort of typical German face, which used to express nothing but endless good-humour and daring fun. Now it was indescribably changed. True he had reduced his moustache, and cut his hair short since the student days, and now he had on the customary evening-dress. And he looked even less "like other people" than he had looked at Tübingen with flowing hair and wonderful uniform.

He did nothing, however, to rouse my sense of responsibility all the pleasant, merry evening, till the ladies were disposing themselves to go to bed. Then he sprang up from the table where he had been conjuring, to the delight of the boys, and hurried across the room to Katie.

"You are going and we have not had one song," he pleaded.

"We must put that off till to-morrow, I fear. It is getting so late, and they were all so happy with your tricks, it seemed a pity to interrupt."

"Let me beg for a few more minutes' happiness," he said, seating himself at the piano and beginning to play a plaintive little pleading air, that seemed to echo his request.

"Don't you hear it is begging for a song?" he said, looking up at Katie, who stood by admiring his skill, but shaking her head at the request.

"You will not grant it?"

The entreaty became passionate; it swelled in strange grandeur through the room, it cried so wildly, that even Sir Reginald, who considered music quite beneath the dignity of man, looked gravely at the player, and suggested to a neighbour in a low voice that it was wonderful to see the musical genius of the Germans.

"You still refuse?" Gustav went on, absorbed in his playing. "Then it turns to despair."

And the music sobbed and wailed so pitifully that Katie's heart was touched.

"Oh, I cannot resist that," she cried.

And so we had a song, and Gustav accompanied it, and then went on with a sort of reverie upon the melody, very dreamy and beautiful.

But there was Lady Boscawen getting very sleepy, and Sir Reginald and the others impatient, and it was impossible to let Gustav go on keeping them, as unconcerned as if he were a musical-box.

"My dear fellow," I said in his ear, "it's ever so late, and people are going to bed."

"Natürlich," he answered indifferently.

"Yes, and natürlich you must come too," I persisted, and managed at last to drag him away.

When we got upstairs, he seemed still disposed to sit up a little longer, but pleading my own sleepiness, I got rid of him at last, and wished him "good-night." He answered with an odd sort of smile, which set me once more wondering over the change in him. Too sleepy to proceed resolutely to bed, I sat in a great chair by the fire, seeing past scenes in the red coals, and recalling Gustav as he used to be, till I had thought myself into a doze.

Soon I was dreaming of Tübingen, of Gustav, and of Fritz Werner, with whom he used to quarrel so often. Quite plainly I saw those two in the Lindenallee, gesticulating, disputing. Gustav's eyes flashed fire, and then he suddenly turned and pointed down the avenue where Katie came wandering along, singing the song she had sung to-night. I was afraid she would see them quarrelling, and be frightened. I tried to step forward and speak; then that nameless horror of powerlessness that one finds in dreams came over me. I struggled—I woke. The fire was dying down, I was very cold, and someone was knocking at my door. Before I was awake enough to give permission, it opened, and Gustav hurried in, pale, strange, with staring eyes.

He had his coat off, and was moving his arms slowly up and down in a curious way; altogether I did not like the look of him.

"Gustav, what time of night, or morning, do you suppose it is? What's the matter? Why don't you go to bed?"

"I feel more helpless lying down," he answered in an odd kind of voice.

"Anything the matter? Aren't you well?"

"Well enough. It's very cold."

I put some more coal on, the fire blazed up again; he sat down by it, shivering and rubbing his hands.

"Cold, cold!" he repeated to himself dreamily.

"It's a cold process, sitting up when you should be in bed," I remarked with a significant glance at my own inviting-looking couch.

He turned round, and took hold of my hand.

"Never mind, my friend, you will let me sit here a little, will you not?"

"Certainly, if you wish for such a sacrifice on the altar of friendship," said I, trying to laugh. "But I wish you would explain yourself, Gustav. Is this indigestion—or what is it all?"

"Explain! Frank, you do not know what it is to be haunted, tormented as I am. I know you cannot—cannot imagine it. But do not laugh, old friend. If you only knew how horrible that sounds to me—horrible—horrible!"

He repeated the word many times, his voice dying down into a whisper.

"I believe I have been asleep a long time in this chair," I said by way of saying something, for the dying out of his whispered "Horrible!" left an unpleasant impression. "I was asleep when you came to the door, and, in my dreams, I saw you quarrelling with Fritz Werner."

He started at the name, grew white, and trembled. He did not speak, but fixed his eyes upon me as if I were saying something strange and terrible.

"Do you ever hear of him now?" I persisted, for silence would have been intolerable under the circumstances.

Gustav only shook his head and covered his face with his hands.

"I wish you would tell me what has gone wrong," I said uneasily. "You really have become a most extraordinary fellow, Gustav."

He looked up with a perfectly white face.

"The worst is to come," he answered hoarsely.

"To come—when?"

"You will see—in two days—on Christmas Eve."

"You have got into some nervous, depressed state; and no wonder if you never go to sleep."

"How is anyone to sleep, tormented in this way, watched, haunted—no solitude, no peace?"

I thought the words were rather appropriate to myself as well as to the speaker, but I did not hint as much to him, he was too far gone for that.

"Why don't you lie down on the sofa here and go to sleep?" I suggested with a longing glance at my own pillow.

To my surprise, he accepted the proposal with sudden satisfaction, and threw himself down, covering his face with his hands. I covered him up with a large eider-down quilt, and I think he fell asleep. At any rate, he let me go to bed in silence, and when I woke in the morning he was gone.

When we met at breakfast-time next day, he was in the wildest spirits, talking more than anyone else, gesticulating, laughing, applauding.

It had frozen harder than ever that night, and a great skating-party was organised to Stillride Mere, a happy skating-ground of the neighbourhood. How Gustav rattled on in an indescribable mixture of languages as he and Katie and I marched off over the iron-hard ground! It seemed impossible to believe in the haggard, horrified creature of last night, as he sang and laughed, and jumped gates, to the admiration of all the boys, and afterwards did more curious things in skates than any mortal could be expected to do under any ordinary circumstances.

A merry day had we all out there on the ice, making a winter picnic of it, and kindling an enormous bonfire, round which we took our luncheon. Not till twilight was falling, and carriages had arrived for the ladies, did we recognise that it was time to break up the party, and then Gustav raced the boys home, and beat them with an ease which they rather resented.

More music and singing filled up the evening, and when we were too sleepy to listen any more, my aunt retired, murmuring to me:

"What wonderful spirits Herr von Friedland has! He is quite the life of the party."

But I felt as if he might be the death of one of the party, if he would not allow that humble individual his natural night's rest after six or seven hours' skating, and, not much liking the look he gave me as we went upstairs, I bade him a cordial but hurried good-night, and rushed into my room. Remembering the painful experiences of last night, I got into bed with all possible speed, thinking that if I were actually safe asleep, he never could have the cruelty to wake me.

Alas! his extremity was too great for such consideration. It seemed to me that I had just fallen asleep, when a nightmare-like sensation roused me again, and, opening my eyes, I dimly perceived a figure sitting on my bed.

There was no escaping him.

"Is that you, Gustav?" I murmured feebly.

"It is I. Forgive my waking you, Frank; the solitude that is no solitude became too horrible. If I did not seek some human companionship I should go mad."

Not being at all sure that he was not mad already, I made no reply to this but a sigh of resignation.

"Ah, Frank, you don't know what I go through," he went on in a strange, hollow voice, fixing his eyes upon me. "You could not imagine the suffering of it."

"But what is it? What is the matter with you?"

His voice sank into a whisper.

"I have a dead man for my companion—a dead man who hates me."

"You have taken some fancy into your head."

"Fancy! Ah, I feel him near me, drawing closer and closer as the night grows deep, his cold arms are round me, his cold breath on my face—the breath of the dead. You don't know what it is, and he is getting stronger and stronger. To-morrow will be Christmas Eve, and to-morrow he will be too strong; he will take me away with him."

"This is madness, Gustav," I protested stoutly, though something of grim reality in his voice made my blood run cold. "Whatever put such things in your head, Gustav?"

"Last Christmas Eve I killed him," he answered in a lower voice, turning his head away from me. "This time it will be his turn."

"Killed him? Whom are you talking about?"

"Fritz Werner. I killed him in a duel—mortally wounded him, that is. We quarrelled about Gretchen. I did not know that it was a more serious affair than when we fought before. But when they took him away, he said, 'You have done for me this time. I shall die and haunt you'—and he kept his word."

"Fritz Werner dead?"

"Dead, and close beside us now," he answered drearily.

This was horrible! Gustav's many quarrels with Fritz had always had their comic side, his many duels had never produced anything more serious than a cut hand or lip. That he should have killed poor old Fritz seemed too impossible, too incongruous for belief.

"I can't believe it," I said.

"It does seem like a dream," Gustav went on. "When his eyes looked at me that time out of his white face, and he said those words in a dying voice, I thought he seemed changed into somebody else. But I shall know when he takes me away to-morrow."

"Don't go on like that, Gustav. You fought fair, though that fighting was always a foolish thing. It was an accident if you did kill him. He might have done the same by you."

"Yes, he means to, he can't relent now. Dead men are like that. I suppose their last thoughts stiffen and keep in one place, rigid, like their limbs."

"If you go on like that, Gustav, I shall think you're out of your mind."

"It's enough to make me. But I'm sane enough. I know what I know. No matter. Go to sleep again, Frank, you who can sleep. I only want to sit here by you, and feel your living spirit near."

And he would not lie down or cover himself up, or do anything approaching to the comfortable, except make up the fire at my earnest request. Cold and darkness would make matters worse, I told him.

What a night I had, to be sure!—dozing off every now and then, and waking with some horrid fancy, to find Gustav always sitting there looking at me, expressing all his abominable notions with his eyes. Every now and then a great coal dropped out of the grate, and made me suppose, sleepily, that Fritz was coming down the chimney; or a sudden gust of wind made me start from my pillow. Then Gustav would smile a sickly smile, and tell me benevolently to go to sleep again. What a night it was, to be sure!

I thought, a good many times during that night, that morning certainly would never come again—it was simply an impossibility. I mentioned this two or three times to Gustav, who only gasped in reply.

At last, when I was hopelessly reduced to lying staring at the unhappy friend who sat with such a maddening persistence staring at me, it occurred to him to get up and open the shutters, and there was a little grey light coming in the east.

"I welcome the morning," said Gustav solemnly. And so did I, for he sat and watched the growing light now, and let me fall asleep in good earnest at last.

Naturally enough I appeared very late at the breakfast-table, where I was greeted with many jests upon my tardiness. I did not mind that, but it was almost past human patience to see Gustav there already, laughing and talking with the most exuberant merriment and a great deal of noise. How could he, I mentally questioned—how could he look me in the face and do it?

The frost was harder than ever, the skaters declared triumphantly, and once more skating was to be the order of the day.

"Of course you're coming, Frank?" remarked Katie.

"I don't know—I'm tired—lazy."

"Frank's sleepy; he got up too early this morning," observed my aunt with fine satire, and Gustav looked at me and actually laughed.

Patience! Patience! We all started forth as before, and went this time to a large lake at the north side of the park, a pretty lake surrounded by bushes, with a view of the hilly road beyond the park gates.

It was one of those sparkling winter mornings that never look to me quite real. All the mist of last night had left the trees gleaming white and splendid in the winter sun, the sky with its pale-blue looked strangely far away, the frozen grass-spears glistened where we trod. It was beautiful, with a dreamlike beauty, and all day long I felt only half awake.

I could see how forced Gustav's spirits were at times. I caught the frightened glance that every now and then he cast around him. Even the boys' merriment did not sound as genial as it had done yesterday, and Katie looked graver than her wont.

The influence extended itself; by-and-by the boys voted it "slow" to go on skating, and proposed a steeplechase across the fields, the skating-ladies walked home with the spectators, only Gustav and I remained on the lake.

He had refused all proposals to come away, and I did not like to leave him; he kept on skating about, sometimes performing feats of curious dexterity, sometimes only rushing round and round swiftly as the wind.

The sun was setting, the air was growing very cold, and now there stole up from the village church the sound of chiming bells.

Gustav stopped and listened.

"Why do they ring?" he asked.

"They always do here on Christmas Eve," I said.

"Christmas Eve!" He repeated the words with trembling lips, his eyes filled with tears. "What a happy time this is in the Fatherland, is it not, Frank? Now they are lighting up their trees and singing their hymns, and gathering round their firesides. It is Christmas Eve!"

"Won't you come home now?" I asked, as I sat down on the bank to take off my skates. "We have had enough of the ice, haven't we?"

"No, not yet; the house—the house is my grave. He will be there waiting for me. Let me stay here a little longer, out with the free wind and Christmas bells. If something strange is coming towards me—and I feel it is—let me wait for it here."

I took off my skates in silence, and began to walk up and down the road waiting for him. The bells had ceased again, the evening was very still, there was no sound out there but the ring of his skates upon the ice and my footsteps on the frozen ground. It grew late, the last red ring of the sun dipped out of sight, the after-glow faded, all the land grew grey. In the dimness Gustav looked a strange, wild figure as he skimmed across the lake; swifter than a bird's his flight appeared to me.

Suddenly the bell chime broke forth again, and with it a cry of horror from my friend, that made me spring to his side.

"What is it—what is it?" I exclaimed as he clutched me with one hand, and with the other pointed towards the road. "Speak, Gustav! Tell me what you see?"

"Do you see nothing, Frank? Nothing in the road out there? The figure in the cloak? It is coming nearer, it is coming towards me. It is Fritz—Fritz Werner!"

I never shall forget the horror of his voice, never shall forget the thrill that passed through me, when looking where he pointed, I saw indeed a figure wrapped in a cloak coming swiftly towards us through the dim twilight. I clasped Gustav as frantically as he clasped me; we stood frozen into silence through some apparently endless moments, as the figure came nearer, more clearly visible, steadily approaching us. It paused as it came through the gates, seemed to catch sight of us, left the path, came to the bank above the lake, and there, peering at us through the bushes, I saw, quite plainly now, the pale face of Fritz Werner. I could not move or speak, Gustav also was still, and as we stood thus silent, the bells sent forth once more their merry chime.

"Who is there?" said a voice at last—the voice of Fritz, I knew; "I cannot clearly see you. Is it Frank?"

The word seemed suddenly to break the spell that bound me. I wrenched myself from Gustav and sprang forward—sprang forward to clasp a solid hand of flesh and bone stretched out to me. This was no ghost; I held him fast.

"Fritz, is it you?"

The fields, the bushes, and the creeping mist were reeling round with me; for a moment I did not know what happened to me. Then all was steady again and I knew that Fritz stood before me talking, and I found myself saying:

"We took you for a ghost!"

"We—who are we?"

"Gustav is with me, horribly frightened and frightening me horribly. We thought you were dead."

He had not waited to listen, but was already embracing Gustav on the ice—Gustav who would not believe his senses at first. He said nothing, but trembled strangely, and at last burst out into tears.

"He has been in a horrible fright about you," I explained, as Gustav sat down on the bank, hiding his face in his hands. "He was persuaded that you haunted him because he had killed you. He has had no peace, and took care that his friends should have none either."

"He always had a lively imagination," responded Fritz. "And he did very nearly kill me. Having just then made Tübingen too hot to hold me, I found it convenient to publish my death, and my good friends Max and Otto von Meilingen got me out of the place in an airy coffin. I did write to let Gustav know, but he had vanished nobody knew where. Being in England I thought I would look you up and hear what had become of the other madman. I did not expect to find him here though. Look here, Gustav, I say, you need not trouble about me, I'm no more dead than you are."

"Come in both of you and warm yourselves," I suggested, "Here, Gustav, I'll help you off with your skates, and we'll come up to the house. It was all fancy about your being haunted, you see. Come, Fritz, my uncle will be delighted to see you, and the boys will enjoy another German."

Gustav obeyed mechanically, he said not one word all the way home, and was so white and speechless all the evening that my aunt feared he was quite out of spirits.

"You will sleep to-night," I remarked as we went upstairs, without any music or delay on his part that evening.

"I am so dreadfully ashamed of myself for not letting you sleep," he answered. "You cannot think how much ashamed I am. But the feeling of being haunted almost drove me mad. It was so terribly real. I felt him there, though I could not see him."

"Fritz is right about your imagination, I suppose. But it's all over now, and the best thing you can do is to forget all about it."

I believe he thought so too, for often as we have met since he has never renewed the subject; but ever afterwards subsided into a much more quiet and "matter-of-fact young man."

As for me, it was long before I went to my room at night without a smile of satisfaction at the thought that now, at any rate, whatever troubled me, I had nothing to fear from my poor Gustav's Ghost.

The Editor's Note Book.

PATRIOTISM is a paying game sometimes, and so Mr. Parnell must have thought when they gave him that cheque for thirty-seven thousand pounds in Dublin the other day. By way of showing his gratitude, and of proving that he had fairly earned the gift, his abuse of England and the Government, and especially of Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan, was more virulent than ever. But it is clear that he would not be so abusive if he did not feel that the policy of the Government is too strong for the band of disaffected conspirators who call themselves the Land League, and the measure of his vituperation is undoubtedly the measure of Mr. Trevelyan's success.

THE excess of zeal which induced the Metropolitan Board of Works rather to overdo the preservation of Hampstead Heath, and to prohibit games which have been played on the Heath by inhabitants of Hampstead from time immemorial, has received a check from the judges of the Queen's Bench Division, who have decided that the Board had not the power to put a stop to cricket-playing, which they claimed to have in the case of Mr. Pritchard. There has been a good deal too much enclosing, and warning off, and notice-boarding on Hampstead Heath altogether, and it may be hoped that the present decision will remind the Board that to confine the public practically to roads and paths is an odd way of preserving the Heath for their enjoyment.

NOTWITHSTANDING the official-looking contradictions which appeared in some of the papers, Mr. Tennyson is to have his peerage, it seems, after all. What good a seat in the House of Lords will do the author of "In Memoriam," "The Princess," and "Idylls of the King," is not altogether apparent on the surface, but no one is likely to grudge him the distinction if he thinks it worth accepting.

WHATEVER varied opinions may be entertained as to the artistic merits of the New Law Courts, it seems certain that the arrangements for their ventilation are about as bad as it is possible to make them. To hit the happy medium between stuffiness and draughts is a difficult, but should not be an insoluble, problem. For years the ventilation of the House of Commons was a byword, but Dr. Percy succeeded in putting matters to rights, and could, probably, do the same good service in the new building.

THE principal difficulty in the way seems to be that nobody—or, at all events, nobody who can be got at—is responsible for the arrangements in the courts, and thus the complaints of jurymen and the lamentations of the judges waste themselves on the desert air of which the building is, during certain stages of the ventilating process, so inconveniently full.

ANYONE who wishes to form a collection of pictures at an extremely modest charge would do well to run over to Paris, to attend the sale of the works of art which were accumulated by the late M. Borniche, and are now being dispersed under the auctioneer's hammer at the Salle Droccot. Twenty-eight thousand lots are included in the catalogue of this extraordinary sale, and their average price, so far, has been about eleven pounds. I wonder whether we have anybody like M. Borniche buying silently and secretly in England. If not, it is difficult to find an answer to one of the most puzzling questions I know—"Who buys all the pictures?"

I DO not think that Miss Cobbe's conduct of the anti-vivisection campaign will elevate either the lady herself, or the cause which she advocates, in the estimation of people with any sense of fairness or propriety, and when she permits herself to write of so distinguished a man of science and so worthy a public servant as Professor Owen as "that old impostor Owen" she unconsciously affords us a gauge by which it is easy to measure her own intellectual capacity. Why people cannot conduct controversies of this sort with some regard to politeness I cannot understand, but it is unfortunately the fact that wherever the strong-minded female intervenes there is losing of temper and calling of names.

I DO not see why, because a lady has been, or is, on the stage, the writers of paragraphs in society papers should go out of their way to insult her. The other day Truth contained a paragraph very plainly asserting that the match between Lord Garmoyne and Miss Fortescue had been broken off, and that a money consideration had been paid to the lady. This insult had no foundation in fact, for the story is untrue from beginning to end, and could only have been concocted with the intention of giving pain to a perfectly innocent lady who has no power to defend herself against such malicious falsehoods. Nor was the sneer in the World in particularly good taste, that the marriage would take place as soon as the gentleman "leaves school." Lord Garmoyne is in his twenty-third year.

WHETHER the extraordinarily variable weather of the last few days has any connection with the beautiful sunrises and sunsets which have been astonishing the world, or whether it is merely due to the sportive nature of the British climate, would form a pleasing puzzle for the meteorologists, who would be sure to be prepared with any amount and variety of conjecture and theory on the subject. One great point in favour of these gentlemen is that it is impossible to prove that they are wrong, even when they attribute with absolute confidence the magnificent appearance of the evening and morning heavens to the dust which was produced by the volcanic cataclysm in Java during the autumn, and which is declared to have been wandering about in space ever since.

IT is always pleasant to acquire knowledge, and I feel quite grateful to Dr. Mortimer Granville for his lucid and exact explanation of the causes of dreaming. Dreams, says the doctor, "are simply toyings of the imagination, or higher brain function, with the records of ideation." After this, there can be no doubt that we ought all to take the doctor's advice and wear nightcaps.

THAT must have been an intelligent jury which was empanelled, one day last week, at the Central Criminal Court, to try a case in which the Army and Navy Stores were the prosecutors. After the opening address of counsel, one of the twelve said they were in a difficulty, as the foreman looked upon Stores as "a lot of cheats and blacklegs altogether," and that, for his own part, he was of opinion that "these military cheat honest tradesmen out of their living."

OF course, these two profound thinkers were relieved from further connection with the case, and two other jurymen took their places; but the troubles of the Army and Navy Stores were not yet over. The second jury heard the case through, but were unable to agree upon a verdict, eleven of them being of one way of thinking, while one remained unconvinced, not, as he said, because he had any personal objection to Stores, but because he was unable to make up his mind in a hurry. Trial by jury is a great and glorious institution, but, like most other human arrangements, it is not absolutely perfect.

THE death of Signor Mario will carry the memory of many people back to the time when the Italian Opera was the fashion, and when this delightful singer and the incomparable Grisi were the reigning favourites of the musical public. Such a combination of voice, acting, and personal comeliness as Mario enjoyed is rare indeed, and it seemed quite within the fitness of things that his life should be, as it was, one long romance. It is forty-five years since Mario made his first appearance on the stage, and fourteen since his retirement into a private life, for which, notwithstanding his brilliantly successful career, he had not been able to make very adequate provision.

IT is once more stated that the National Opera House on the Victoria Embankment, which was begun as far back as 1875, is to be completed by its original projector, Mr. Mapleson. I cannot think that success is likely to attend the speculation. Italian opera, except on Patti nights, has been for some time in a very bad way at Covent Garden, and another immense theatre for its performance seems altogether unnecessary. Mr. Mapleson is a daring and ingenious speculator, but I think it will be impossible even for him to galvanise this worn out and expiring body into healthy life again.

Some of the newspapers, and notably the Standard, continue to publish accounts of Mr. Irving's appearances in America, which convey, as they are no doubt intended to do, an impression that his success has been of a very qualified nature, if it could even be called success at all. The Morning Journal of New York has set itself to contradict this view in a most categorical manner, and declares that "never in the history of the American stage has any engagement been played with the artistic or financial success that has accompanied that of the great English actor." From a private letter I gather that the attitude of the New York public was at first a little doubtful, but that the last two weeks of the season there were triumphant, and that an enthusiastic welcome is sure to be given to Mr. Irving on his return to the "Empire City" on his way home.

Cookery.

QUINCES.

In addition to our own good harvest of quinces there is this year a large importation from foreign countries, and the fruit is so cheap that it is worth while for housekeepers to utilise it.

The quince is one of those things about which there is no moderate taste. People either violently like or dislike it; in the former case so highly is the flavour appreciated that the quince is eaten raw, whilst in the latter even a morsel is objected to.

Quince jelly is generally acceptable, it is delicate in flavour, and inviting in appearance. The trouble of making this jelly is an obstacle to its being much used in families; but quince marmalade is as easily made as any other preserve. The recipe we give for this, from Miss Acton's "Modern Cookery," is excellent and economical.

For puddings and pies quinces do not answer alone, and as a rule only a small quantity is used for flavouring. Various sweet dishes can be made of quinces, that which is given for "Buttered Quinces" is popular in France, and "Quince Cream" is delicious. In former years when "Bandoline" was used the seeds of the quince were in great request, and made a preparation superior to all others. Dumas says: "A syrup, very useful in cases of obstinate diarrhoea is made of quinces, and the mucilaginous water obtained by the immersion of their seeds." Quince mucilage is still sometimes used as an emollient and sheathing application to abraded or wounded surfaces, as cracked lips, etc., etc.

Quince wine is not often made in England, but it is said to be wholesome and of fine flavour. A recipe for this wine, taken from the "Dictionary of Daily Wants," is subjoined. An excellent liqueur can be made by infusing the fruit in either brandy or gin, and it is still more delicious combined with cherry-brandy.

QUINCE JELLY.

The quinces should first be quartered, then peeled, cored, and sliced. To each pound allow a quart of water, in which boil the quinces until reduced to a pulp; drain them through a fine sieve, and to each pint of juice allow ten ounces of lump sugar. Put the juice and sugar into the preserving-kettle, and stir over the fire until the sugar is melted, then pass the jelly through a napkin.

All fruit jellies are improved, both in colour and brilliancy, by being boiled in small quantities; therefore, if more than three quarts of jelly is made, it should be boiled in two parts. After straining, boil the jelly, removing any scum, until either it registers 28° on the syrup-gauge or will set when a little is tried on a plate. Put the jelly into glasses and cover over when cold.

If preferred, the jelly can be made of equal quantities of russet apples and quinces, and the fruit, after the juice has been drained to make the jelly, can be boiled with sugar for second quality marmalade.

QUINCE MARMALADE.

"When to economise the fruit is not an object, pare, core, and quarter some of the inferior quinces, and boil them in as much water as will nearly cover them until they begin to break; strain the juice from them, and for the marmalade put half a pint of it to each pound of fresh quinces. In preparing these be careful to cut out the hard stony parts round the cores. Simmer them gently until they are perfectly tender, then press them, with the juice, through a coarse sieve; put them into a perfectly clean pan, and boil them until they form almost a dry paste; add for each pound of quinces and the half pint of juice, three-quarters of a pound of sugar in fine powder, and boil the marmalade for half an hour, stirring it gently without ceasing; it will be very firm and bright in colour. If made shortly after the fruit is gathered, a little additional sugar will be required, and when a richer and less dry marmalade is better liked, it must be boiled for a shorter time, and an equal weight of fruit and sugar may be used.

"Quinces pared and cored, four pounds; prepared juice, one quart; two to three hours. Boiled fast to dry, twenty to forty minutes. Sugar three pounds, thirty minutes. Richer marmalade: quinces four pounds; juice, one quart; sugar, four pounds."

QUINCE CREAM.

Take half a pound of quince jelly, dissolve it by putting the pot in boiling water; stir into it half an ounce of gelatine dissolved in a gill of boiling water. When cool add it to half a pint of rich cream, and whip until it sets. Put the cream into a cold mould and let it stand for a few hours.

BUTTERED QUINCES.

Bake quinces until soft, then with a spoon carefully take out the pulp, without getting any seeds or skin. Put this pulp into a stew-pan, with enough sugar to make it sweet, a pinch of ground cinnamon, and a good piece of butter. Stir this over the fire until well mixed, but do not let it boil. Serve neatly piled in the middle of a dish, with fried bread, cut in triangular pieces, arranged round it.

QUINCE WINE.

"This wine is made from very ripe quinces. When gathered they must be thoroughly wiped and pared, then slice the quinces lengthwise, and remove cores, bruising them thoroughly in a mashing-tub with a pestle; strain off the liquid part by pressing the pulp in a hair-bag. Warm this liquor over the fire and skim it, but do not allow it to boil. Sprinkle into it some powdered loaf-sugar, then in a gallon of water and a quart of wine, boil twelve or fourteen large quinces thinly sliced, add two pounds of fine sugar, and then strain off the liquid part and mix it with the natural juice of the quinces. Put this into a cask and mix the whole well together, then let it settle; put in two or three whites of eggs, and afterwards draw it off. To make it still better, add a quarter of a pound of stoned raisins and half an ounce of cinnamon to a quart of liquor, to the consumption of a third part, and put it into the cask when the wine is fermenting."

QUINCE LIQUEUR.

Half fill wine-bottles with fine ripe quinces, peeled, cored, and cut into small pieces, then fill up the bottles with brandy or gin. Let them stand for three months, shaking occasionally, then drain off the liquor into clear bottles, and when it is perfectly bright, sweeten it with a rich syrup made by boiling lump sugar in the proportion of one pound to a gill and a half of water.

Equal quantities of New Town Pippins and quinces make a liqueur less rough in flavour than one of quinces only.

QUINCE MUCILAGE.

Soak half an ounce of quince seeds in a pint of water for an hour or two, boil for ten minutes, and strain through fine muslin. If to be used as a draught, the mucilage can be flavoured with a little quince jelly dissolved in it when hot.

Judges in the Far West.

I WAS once assured by a former Chief Justice of one of the States on the western slope of the Rocky Mountains, that the first grand jury he ever charged were sitting on the prairie under a tree, and that there was not a man of them who had on any other foot-gear than moccasins. And I knew a judge, in the early days of California, when everybody felt bound to make money, who sat on the bench in the morning, mined during the day, and played the fiddle in a whisky-store at night. The county court judge of Madison County, in addition to performing his judicial duties, used to "run" the gang saw in the Port Madison Mills.

In these judges, although we often find their knowledge of law not very clear or defined, yet, and what is more important, their notion of equity is strong. A most notorious "rowdy" from New England, who had escaped the law several times, was at last captured in the act of smashing the interior of a Chinese house in the little village of Eureka, in North California. The evidence against him was rather weak, and it was feared that he would again escape. But when the prisoner was brought into court, his honour burst upon him with a tirade of abuse:

"E-e-h! Ye long, leathern, lantern-jawed Yankee cuss! We've ketcht you, e-e-h, at last! I'll commit you at once."

"But, judge," whispered the clerk, "you'll have to hear the evidence."

"Evidence be blowed!" was the rejoinder. "Wasn't I thar, and seed it all myself?"

Judge P. was once holding a term of the district court in the village of Cornwallis, in the then territory of Oregon. His court was held in a common log-house, with a large open fireplace, and a few rough heavy benches that had never known a plane. An indictment had been found against one Charley Sandborn, for selling whisky without a licence. He stood at one side of the fireplace with his hands deep in his pockets, while the judge sat on a school-bench at the other side. When required to plead, Charley threw himself on the mercy of the court, and was sentenced to pay the lowest fine and costs. At the close of the sentence, by way of personal palliation, the judge remarked, "that while it was the duty of the court to enforce the laws as it found them in the statute-book, the person of the court was not inimical to men who sold whisky."

There was in Idaho territory a judge who was well-known as "Alec Smith." A woman brought a suit in his court for divorce, and had the discernment to select a friend of her own, who stood well with the judge, as her attorney. When the case was called on, the judge, addressing the plaintiff's attorney, said:

"Mr. H., I don't think people ought to be compelled to live together when they don't want to, and I will decree a divorce in this case." Mr. H. bowed blandly. Thereupon the judge, turning to another attorney, whom he took to be the counsel for the defendant, said:

"Mr. M., I suppose you have no objection to the decree?" Mr. M. nodded assent. But it happened that the attorney for the defendant was another Mr. M., not then in court. Presently he came in, and finding that his client had been divorced without a hearing, began to remonstrate. Alec listened a moment, then interrupted him, saying:

"Mr. M., it is too late. The court has pronounced the decree for divorce, and the parties are no longer man and wife. But if you want to argue the case right bad, the court can marry them over again and give you a crack at it."

I was at Clear Lake, when an Irishman was tried in the County Court for beating his wife. A point of law was raised by the attorney for the defence, as to the admissibility of certain evidence offered by the district attorney, "Judge" J. H. Thompson (once a "judge" always a "judge"), who conducted the prosecution, and the court called upon him to produce the authorities in support of his position. The attorney being rather slow in finding the law on the point, the court, just as he had done so, ruled that the evidence could not be admitted.

"The deuce you do!" halloed the district attorney. "Say, judge, I'll read you the law, and bet you a thousand dollars I'm right."

"I'll send you to gaol for twenty-four hours for contempt of court!" cried the judge.

"Send to gaol and be hanged!" cried the district attorney. "I know my rights, and intend to maintain them."

The judge then called out:

"Sheriff Crigler, take Judge Thompson to gaol and adjourn the court for four-and-twenty hours!"

Crigler advanced to obey the order, but halted abruptly on seeing the district attorney put himself into a "posish," and at the same time shouting loud enough to be heard all over the town that neither Crigler or any other man should carry him to gaol. To make things sure, the sheriff called for a commitment, but while this was being prepared, mutual apologies passed between the judge and the attorney, and the order was revoked. The court was then adjourned for a quarter of an hour, to allow, according to the custom made and provided in such cases, of "drinks" being exchanged; after which the trial proceeded, and resulted in the acquittal of the defendant.

I witnessed once—not in rough American territory—but in the British town of Victoria, Vancouver's Island, a "stand-up" fight between the "Honourable the Attorney-General," and a client of the opposite side in a suit; and not long afterwards two of the most prominent of the members of the Colonial Parliament engaged in a like encounter. I mention this, lest it might be unjustly supposed that these eccentricities of conduct were found exclusively in border parts of the United States.

I have seen a judge who is said, in pursuance of his duty as a magistrate, to have fined a man twenty-five dollars for shooting at another, but who also—swayed by his feelings as a man—expressed his regret that he could not mulct the other in the same sum for not shooting back again.

In the early days of California one of these rough-and-ready dispensers of the law held a court on a Sunday, and sentenced a "greaser" (a native Californian or Mexican) to thirty-nine lashes for theft; but on the prisoner's lawyer threatening to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that it was "unconstitutiona!" to hold a court on a Sunday, the judge declared, with a round oath, that rather than the blessed greaser should get off by such a pettifoggish trick, the sentence should be carried into effect "right away," and then and there the thirty-nine lashes were vigorously applied, the judge remarking at the conclusion, that the lawyer had better reserve his habeas corpus until the greaser's back got barked again!

But most commendable on the whole was the patience shown by these judges under the orations of long-winded, and not very learned attorneys. The most extraordinary instance of this patience, perhaps, was that of a judge in Illinois, who, after two wordy lawyers had argued and reargued about the meaning of a certain Act of Congress, closed the discussion at the end of the second day by calmly remarking: "Gentlemen, the Act is repealed!"

I could go on recounting numerous other anecdotes of a similar kind, but have related sufficient to give my readers some notion how justice used to be administered at one time, and that not so very long ago, in the vast regions known as the Far West.

Teaching at Home.

ARITHMETIC. PART III.

As soon as a child can write the numbers up to a hundred, and add single columns of figures, you may begin to teach him something of multiplication.

It is a mistake to defer multiplication until a child has mastered addition and subtraction; and a still greater mistake to begin by teaching him the tables from a book, by rote. There is even no need, at first, to make use of the word multiplication; introduce the subject to the child as, what it really is, a short method of addition.

AMONG his other little sums give him one and one to add together, two and two, three and three, and so on with all the numbers up to nine. You need not give him the whole row at once, let him add three or four of the numbers in a lesson. The next day you give him the same sums over again. He will like this, "because it is so easy," and will work them partly from memory, partly by reckoning. Do not let him work his sums in a copy-book, as he ought not to be able to look back at his old work. On the other hand do not let him use a slate, as the ease with which wrong figures can be rubbed out makes him careless about putting them down.

WHEN you see he has got the sum of any two numbers fixed in his head, put down the next numbers twice over, and let him add them up also, day after day, till he knows them too. The three lines can be learnt in the same manner; you give the child one and one and one to add, two and two and two, and so on; and gradually he works his way through the whole multiplication-table.

It will very likely take six months to teach a child the multiplication-table on this system, but his time will have been very well spent. He will have got an intelligent idea of multiplication, will be able to say the tables in any order—by no means a universal accomplishment—and, if a little tact has been used, he will have thought it rather an enjoyable exercise than otherwise.

HITHERTO I have supposed that the pupil has only added the figures in a single column, and here I add a word of caution. Beware of making the column too long, as by so doing you put a dangerous strain on a young child's attention. Some children find it much easier to reckon up figures than others, and the teacher must judge from what she knows of her pupil, and by watching the expression of his face when working. Knit brows and flushed cheeks are danger-signals not to be neglected, and if a child suffers from headache after the lesson, you may be sure you have overtaxed him. It is the too long sustained effort which hurts the child; break up the long row of figures into three or four short ones, and he will manage them with ease.

BUT before adding sums with two or three columns, the pupil must learn about "carrying," and now we shall begin to reap some advantage from our previous preparation of the soil. You let the child add up the first column of figures, the units. Say the line comes to twenty-seven, the child will, very likely, write down twenty-seven at the bottom. If he does, don't check him, he is quite justified by his present knowledge in so writing it, and, if the column is correctly added, merely say: "That's right, now add this second column, but first can you tell me what all these figures stand for?" You may even let the child read them over to you, and get him to tell you that they stand for three tens, six tens, and so on. Then you tell him to add up the line. The chances are he will do so without taking any notice of the twenty, in which case you must call his attention to it: "Look here, you have got these two tens at the bottom, why don't you add them on to the other tens?"

THE child thinks your suggestion a sensible one, and acts upon it. We will suppose our second column has been a short one, and only amounts to nine.

You make sure that he understands that this nine represents not nine units, but nine tens or ninety, and then you tell him to write it down.

But the place where he would naturally write it, is occupied by the two, and he turns round to you with the remark, "I can't put it down, there's no room."

"No more there is," you reply; "there's that tiresome two in the way. Well, if I were you, I should scratch it out with my penknife, and write the nine in its place. You don't want the two now, for you've put it into the nine."

The scratching out of the two forms a pleasing little interlude, during which the pupil refreshes himself before attacking another sum.

We will suppose this time the first column comes to thirty-six, and if your pupil seems inclined to write down the total result, remind him what a trouble you had with those two tens in the last sum, and ask him what is the best thing he can do with the three tens he has to deal with.

You will now soon find that the child begins to understand what is wanted of him; you don't have to furnish him with an arbitrary rule, such as, "Write down the right-hand figure and carry the left"—a most difficult direction, by the way, for a child to remember; and when he finds out in a longer sum that the tens in his second column have mounted to hundreds, he will perceive that these hundreds must be added to those in his third column.

IN subtraction, as in addition, you should begin with easy examples, little sums of two columns. The earlier ones, such as nineteen from twenty-one, the pupil will probably be able to answer straight off; but when you give him, say, thirty-nine to take from fifty-six, he will probably be puzzled. His knowledge that the three and the five stand for three tens and five tens will again be useful to him. Tell him that, as he can't take the nine from the six, he must take it from one of those five tens, and must be sure to recollect that there will then be only four tens left in the second column of the subtrahend (you needn't use that long word, and can point your remark with your forefinger instead). You show him that the one, which remains over from his subtraction, must be added to the six remaining over in the top line; then all he has to do is to take the two tens from the four tens, and he has finished his sum.

WHEN you come to multiplication, try and impress upon your pupil what a delightfully easy process it is, and how much trouble it saves.

Tell the child to count the chairs in the room, and then ask him how many legs each chair has got. We will suppose there are twelve chairs, and he tells you each chair has four legs. Then you tell him to find out how many legs there are altogether.

It seems a long business, but you let him toil through it; he may either count each wooden leg, or he may write down four for the legs of each chair, and then add the numbers up.

At last he tells you there are forty-eight legs.

You reply: "That's quite right; but why did you take all that trouble about it? Don't you remember that twelve fours are forty-eight? You could have found out how many legs there were in a moment, if you had remembered to think of that."

WHEN the child has to multiply two or three figures, explain the "carrying," on the same principle that you did in addition.

Next, you must show him how to multiply by two figures; one of the numbers between twelve and twenty is best for a beginning. Say you have chosen sixteen.

You may ask the child if he knows the sixteen table, and then show him that, as he does not know so far, he had better multiply by the six first and the ten afterwards, and that if he adds the two results together, it will be just the same as multiplying by sixteen.

He then sets to work to carry out your suggestion, and be sure you let him fairly multiply by the ten. When he has finished, you can let him compare this line with the top line, and show him that the sole result of his labour in multiplying by ten has been the addition of a nought to the original number.

He won't forget this delightful short-cut, and when he comes to multiply by twenty or thirty, you must tell him to use it for the ten part of the business, and then multiply the result by the two or the three as the case may be.

TILL a child has made considerable progress never allow him to omit the noughts in his working. If he is multiplying by four figures, the second line of his sum should have one nought at the end of it, the third, two noughts, and the fourth, three. The noughts will serve the double purpose of keeping the other figures in their places, and helping the child to remember what it all means.

I HAVE dealt at some length on the most elementary teaching from the conviction that it is the most important part of the matter, and I believe arithmetic would never be distasteful to children if taught to them intelligently, and in a manner adapted to their understandings, by a patient mother or aunt.

ENCOURAGE your pupils to make discoveries for themselves; let your lessons be lively and varied, and keep a firm hold on reality. The more you can get your pupil to try experiments for himself, the better. Let him count the inches on your yard-measure, instead of looking into the table-book; show him the coins in your purse, and let him investigate the kitchen weights and scales. In short, show him how to gain experience, and then how to reason on the experience he has gained.

George III. at Windsor.

OLD King George's memory is held dear at Windsor. Thousands of honest old stories of him circulate in the neighbourhood, all showing what a dull, respectable, worthy, tiresome old fellow he was. He rose at half-past seven, attended service in the chapel, and breakfasted at nine with the queen and the princesses. The meal lasted only half an hour. The princesses were arranged according to the severest etiquette. After breakfast the king rode out attended by his equerries and his daughters. If the weather was bad, he sat within doors and played chess. He dined at two, the queen and princesses at four. At five he visited the queen, and took a glass of wine-and-water. He then transacted private business with his secretary. The evening was spent at cards, all visitors retiring when the clock struck ten, and always supperless. The royal family separated at eleven for the night.

We all know, from Peter Pindar, how the king chattered, asked foolish questions, and answered them himself. His simple adventures are still narrated at many Windsor farms. One day he had to pass a narrow gate, on which a stolid ploughboy sat swinging.

"Who are you, boy?" said the king.

"I be a pig-boy. I be fro a the low country, and out of work at present."

"Don't they want lads here?" asked the king.

"I don't know," replied the boy. "All hereabouts belongs to Georgey."

"And who is Georgey?"

"Georgey! Why the king. He lives at the castle, but he does no good to me."

The king at once ordered the boy to be employed on his farm, and promised to look after him. He turned out a steady lad.

The king once went into a cottage and began turning the meat for an old woman, and was so pleased with himself for doing it, that he left on the rude table five guineas to buy a jack, wrapped in a paper with that notification. There was no pride about him, and he was very kind-hearted. Once the Queen Charlotte met a little boy—"the king's beefeater's little boy." The king said:

"Kneel down, kiss the queen's hand."

But the boy was obdurate and determined.

"No," said he, "I won't kneel, for if I do I shall spoil my new breeches."

The king was not so obstinate and pig-headed but that he could bend to common-sense sometimes. One day Colonel Price differed with him about cutting down a certain tree which the king thought injured the prospect.

"Aye," said the king pettishly, "that's your way; you continually contradict me."

"If your majesty," said the colonel, "will not condescend to listen to the honest sentiments of your servants, you can never hear the truth."

After a short pause the king laid his hand kindly on the colonel's shoulder, and said:

"You are right, Price; the tree shall stand."

Even when Prince George was a boy Handel had noticed his fondness for music, and the taste continued till his death. When old, crazed, and blind, he would wander up and down the corridors of Windsor, dressed in a purple dressing-gown, his long white beard falling on his breast, and used, at lucid intervals, to sing a hymn, and accompany himself on the harpsichord. One day, towards the end of his life, in a sane moment, the king heard a bell toll. He asked who was dead, and was told it was a Mrs. S. The king had a great memory—memory is almost a royal prerogative—and immediately said:

"Ah, she was a linen-draper at the corner of — Street. She was a good woman, and brought up her children in the fear of God. She has gone to heaven. I hope I shall soon follow her."

Latterly he became impressed with a sense that he was dead, and used to say: "I must have a suit of black in memory of King George III., for whom I know there is a general mourning."

He would often hold conversation with imaginary noblemen, but the topics to which he referred were always past events. Sometimes he would sit for hours in a torpor, his head resting on both hands. Often he would make his servants sit down and would address them as if he were in Parliament.

At length, in 1820, Death came mercifully and gave the word of release. The lying-in-state took place in the audience-chamber, where the yeomen of the guard stood, their halberds hung with black crape. The coffin was placed beneath a throne hung with black cloth. Two heralds in tabards sat at the foot of the coffin, and the mourners at the head.

When all the public had been admitted, the Eton boys were allowed to pass through the room. The funeral took place by night, and was magnificent and solemn. The procession was marshalled in St. George's Hall, the Duke of York being chief mourner. About nine o'clock the symphony to the Dead March in Saul reverberated mournfully, the trumpet sounded, and the minute guns thundered. As the coffin passed every spectator uncovered. The torch-light lit the earnest faces, and gleamed on the towers, pinnacles, and battlements of the castle. A detachment of the Grenadier Guards lined the aisle, their arms and standards reversed, and every second man carrying a lighted wax taper. The van was headed by the poor knights and the pages. Then came judges, bishops, privy-councillors, and peers. Dukes bore the pall, marquesses supported the canopy over the coffin. The Duke of York followed the coffin, and with him came the Dukes of Clarence, Sussex, and Gloucester, and Prince Leopold. There was a thrill of awe when the coffin passed into the vault, and the handful of dust fell and re-echoed on the coffin-lid. The herald then read the titles of the new king. "Le Roi est mort; vive le Roi!"

CHRISTMAS FLOWERS.

If we enter the great flower-markets of London, Manchester, Edinburgh, and other populous places, we shall be almost overwhelmed with the variety, number, and beauty of the plants and flowers. Stately Palms and elegant Ferns; gorgeous Poinsettias, with their great scarlet radiating crowns; masses of dwarf Tulips, bright and clear; charming wax-like Roman Hyacinths, diffusing their fragrance; pure and spotless Amazonian Lilies (Eucharis Amazonica), the queen of many a wreath, garland, and bouquet; snowy Camellias with their shell-like petals, massive and symmetrical; deliciously perfumed Stephanotis, Gardenias, and Lilies of the Valley; variedly coloured Primulas, Cyclamens, and Chrysanthemums; and, amongst hardy flowers, bunches of sweet Violets and masses of Eucharis-like white Christmas Roses.

GIFTS OF FLOWERS.

Those are some of the flowers of the season that are annually scattered over the land as Christmas gifts from friend to friend, and by the rich to the poor, for it is one of the happy customs of the time for the affluent to send flowers to brighten the corridors and wards of those noblest of institutions—hospitals and infirmaries—and to cheer their inmates.

This beneficent thoughtfulness is growing and spreading. Let the pretty custom be fostered, which costs so little to many, and is fraught with so much good to the recipients of these floral gifts.

But it is not the unfortunate and afflicted alone who are gladdened with these charming embodiments of goodwill and kind wishes. Vast numbers, who, in their early days, had the run of gardens and green-houses, are now perforce located in gardenless towns. They may be able to purchase flowers or they may not; be this as it may, a box of Violets by parcels post will be appraised at far more than its intrinsic value as an emblem of friendship conveyed in a form most graceful and appropriate.

We have practised what we preach, and sent in our time hundreds of boxes of flowers, receiving in return appreciative letters that were more than ample reward for our small expenditure of time and postage-stamps, in adding one more link to the chain of floral friendships.

PURCHASED CHRISTMAS PLANTS.

Numbers of readers of these notes grow at least some of the plants above enumerated, and their rooms are now made pleasant by their fresh green foliage or welcome flowers; but a still greater number invest at this season in a few plants, grown by others, for home adornment. A hint on the management of these purchased plants may be useful.

First of all it is well to remember that these plants have been carefully and even tenderly nurtured. They have been treated like delicate children, and have been sedulously kept from draughts; they have also been accorded a genial spring-like temperature and atmosphere. This cannot be reproduced in rooms, but much may be done in prolonging the beauty of the plants.

Let them not be placed too close to the glass of the window, especially at night, or they may receive a chill from which they cannot recover. A window will be suitable for them in the daytime, and the light will be beneficial, but at night they will be better in the interior of the room, and, tastefully disposed, will add immensely to the appearance of the apartment.

Never for a moment allow the soil in the pots of these "market plants" to be in any degree dry. They have been accustomed to constant and regular moisture, and to withhold it is certain to impair their beauty and shorten their lives.

Examine them twice daily, and, if possible, do as skilled cultivators do—anticipate their wants; that is to say, do not wait until they suffer by thirst before water is given, but give it just in time to prevent their getting thirsty. That is one of the greatest secrets of success in plant-culture.

Always give these fresh healthy-looking plants tepid water. To this they have been accustomed, and to give them water quite cold would have much the same effect on them as a foot-bath of iced water would have on a person who had made himself comfortable in a warm, cosy room. In both cases a chill would be imparted to the system which might have serious results. Lukewarm water, therefore, should always be given to the plants in question.

The dry air of a living-room, and especially a very warm one, is always more or less injurious to these purchased plants. This dryness cannot be prevented, but the evil resulting may be mitigated by the use of a spray diffuser. These may be had from a chemist or ironmonger, and tepid water in the form of the finest spray, blown on the foliage, covering it as with dew, towards the close of a warm evening, will be peculiarly refreshing and beneficial. By such attention as described plants in rooms may be kept in the best condition over the longest periods, and quite throughout the festive season.

CHRISTMAS FRUITS.

As in the case of plants so in fruits for the season, the majority must purchase them; yet not a few may grow at least some that will be very welcome, and even the sweeter for being home productions.

Oranges can only be grown at home in suitable heated structures, but when they are so ripened they far excel the foreign fruit; indeed, oranges purchased in the markets are not half so good as those well-grown in English hothouses. Miniature orange-trees are now imported from the Continent; some of these trees, not exceeding eighteen inches high, and growing in seven-inch pots, bear from ten to twenty small oranges. These are not good, but the heavily-laden trees are beautiful Christmas ornaments.

Grapes may be regarded as the most choice and acceptable of fruits for the season. Any one having a small vinery may grow them, and by selecting the right kinds, preserve bunches for Christmas. Many are kept until March in this way: the shoot bearing a bunch is cut off the vine any time in December, and the end of the stem inserted in a wine-bottle of water; and if placed in a room having an equable temperature of forty-five degrees, the grapes keep as fresh as if hanging on the vine. Thus the pruning can be done at the proper time and the crop stored for use. If any readers need instruction for growing grapes for Christmas use they can have it on making their want known to the editor.

Apples are indispensable for use at this period of the year, and instructions will be given for growing them in small gardens. The large Blenheim Orange variety and small Nonpareils rank among the best, the former by its noble appearance, the latter by its richness of flavour. A hint may here be given on developing the quality of apples. To have them in the best condition store them in a very warm cupboard or other suitable place, keeping them close, and there let them remain until wanted for table. Fruit so prepared is infinitely superior to that kept in a cold place. Let those who have not tried this plan adopt it at once, and they will find the advantage of doing so by having greatly improved fruit.

Pears are the most delicious of hardy winter fruits, and the trees grow and bear well in suburban gardens. The handsome Beurre Diel and rich and buttery Winter Nellis, or Glout Morceau, are worthy of a place on every table. Whether the fruit is home-grown or purchased, let it be kept in a very warm place for a few days before being used, and if possible, a more marked improvement will be experienced than in the case of Apples. This simple method of preparing fruit for table is not by any means generally known, hence is mentioned here at a time when all who choose to do so may profit by the information and add to the enjoyment of their dessert.

PRUNING EVERGREENS.

Evergreens are indispensable now, and their sprays in great demand for wreath-making, as also are the individual leaves for designs and mottoes, the foliage of variegated Hollies being admirably adapted for this purpose.

There is quite a longing for Evergreen sprays by the younger members of a multitude of households, and although they can see the shrubs from the windows, they are told it is the wrong time of the year to prune them, the right time being September or March.

No harm whatever is done to Evergreens by pruning them now, but, on the contrary, many specimens will be improved by the judicious use of the knife, and the prunings that at other times are burned will be warmly welcomed by the fair decorators.

In pruning Evergreens, due regard must be had to the condition of each specimen, and only such parts should be cut off as are irregularly placed, and mar the symmetry and graceful contour of the shrub.

A hint may be given on using the knife which, though simple, is not unimportant. In the case of all branches which are below the level of the eye, the knife should be placed to their under sides and drawn through in an upward direction; but the exact reverse of this should be practised in severing branches that are above the "eye-level," the knife in the case of these being applied to the upper side and drawn downwards.

What can be the reason for this? will be a mental question that will occur to many, who may possibly think it a gardener's "fad." No, it is not a fad. Prune one shrub in the manner described and another near it without any such care, then examine the two specimens. One of them will be just as green and graceful as ever, and not a mark left by the knife will be visible; but obtrusive white stumpy ends will be dotted all over the other like patches of paint, and an appearance of stubbiness will pervade the shrub. In one case all the knife-marks will be visible; in the other, invisible; and that is the reason for the advice that is given.

Thousands of Evergreens need pruning. Prune them now, and burn not the branches; if not wanted by the owner, they will be borne away with shouts of glee by waiting children, a handful of Evergreens being esteemed a prize any time between now and the new year. Hundreds of such bunches we have had the pleasure of distributing, and have been gladdened by the gladness of the little ones, who rattled out their thanks in a rolling volley of the good old wish that is hoped will never die—"A Merry Christmas."

Revenge by Will.

ONE of the most curious features in this method of revenge is that it has frequently deceived the intentions of the will-makers. A very remarkable instance of this once occurred, which has an air of compensation at the end quite dramatic.

A gentleman of large fortune was married to a lady of considerable attractions. For a time they lived happily; but the husband's disagreeable and ill-conditioned temper soon began to exhibit itself. This gradually turned to a positive dislike, quite undeserved by the wife, and at last deepened into a malignant hatred. Her forbearance and amiable disposition carried on matters with tolerable smoothness for some years, when the husband was seized with an illness which proved fatal, and he went out of the world in the old ill-conditioned way that he had lived. Her friends were congratulating themselves on this release, as she had but a slender settlement, and it was taken for granted that all his large fortune must come to her.

When his will, however, was opened, it was found that everything was left away from her; artful and ingenious devices had been used to deprive her of the smallest article of property; and with diabolical malignity a last blow was given: "And I make this disposition for a reason that she herself best knows." But this cruel and scandalous insinuation only recoiled on the head of the testator; for her friends knew her character too well, and set down this ungoverned hatred to something akin to insanity. The lady accepted her lot with great sweetness and resignation. Not long afterwards, one of her relatives, an eminent barrister, happened to be talking to one of the witnesses to the will in the street. Suddenly a gentleman passed by them.

"There's a coincidence," said the eminent barrister. "There's your fellow-witness, A. B."

"Oh, was he?" said the other carelessly. "I didn't know him."

"What!" exclaimed the barrister.

A few questions, and it came out that the two witnesses had signed at different times!

We may conceive the delight with which the barrister—a sympathising friend—received this unlooked-for news. The will collapsed, like a crazy house, without even the necessity for a legal proceeding; and the lady was triumphantly restored to her rights and honours. One might almost wish that her baffled persecutor had been allowed one peep from his grave, to see the failure of his malignant efforts.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTIONS.

BERTIE wants to know where he can obtain a copy of a recitation entitled "Hokey-Pokey," which is descriptive of an awful nightmare.

CUPID wishes for the name of the author and publisher of a poem entitled "The Curfew Bell." The burden of it is, "The curfew must not ring to-night."

MRS. J. will be glad if someone will tell her who is the author of the following quotation, giving chapter and verse if possible:

What art thou, frost, and whence are thy keen stores
Deriv'd, thou secret all-involving power,
Whom e'en the illusive fluid cannot fly?

The other verse is in Carey's ballad, "Sally in Our Alley."

OVTRIZ would be much obliged if any correspondent would give him a copy, or part at least, of L. E. L.'s little poem, beginning with the lines: "There was a ruined convent once."

S. W. H. writes: "Can any of your readers tell me where I can find an old comic recitation which begins:

"Three wags, whom some fastidious carpers
Might rather designate three sharpers,
Entered at York the Cat and Fiddle."

ANSWERS.

AMATEUR THEATRICALS.—1. Hugo Proskaner, 480, Oxford Street. 2. Spirit gum. Apply to Clarkson, Wellington Street, or Fox, Little Russell Street. 3. The book which we last week recommended to "Anxious Mother" would give you full instructions.

B. H. C.—Many thanks; you will see that we have already given the information, which was sent to us from afar.

BLOSSOM.—Subscription to U.S.A., post-free 6s. 6d. per year.

CONSTANT READER.—1. "Cumnor Hall" is the ancient ballad which is said first to have given Sir Walter Scott the idea of "Kenilworth." He heard it when he was quite a child, and always remembered it, and admired it greatly. You will find it in many editions of Scott's novels, given in the preface to "Kenilworth." 2. If you write to any Derry bookseller you will get the poems written by Mrs. Alexander.

DOT.—No songs are published at 1s. net. They are usually published at 2s. net, and then you get them for 1s. 6d. Milton Welling's "Dreaming" (published by Enoch and Sons, 19, Harley Street) is a charming contralto song, of the sentimental order. You could not fail to like it. That would cost you 1s. 6d. You could get a shilling book of contralto songs at Boosey's, but of course they would not be new ones.

E. H. (Nice).—We recommend you to get a little book on the subject. The "Artistic Fancy Work Series," each number of which is complete in itself, and issued at the uniform price of 6d., would suit you.

FOG SIGNALS.—It is not a point which we can decide, but, from the testimony of some ladies of advanced age, we are led to believe that the bow on the bonnet was worn on the right side by married ladies, and on the left by those whose neck was not yet under the yoke.

GOOD CHEER.—1. There is no law to prevent people from making their mince-meat with uncooked beef if they are so minded, and we do not see why you should be so indignant at your mother-in-law's contention that her way is right. At the same time we look upon the use of beef in mince-meat as a survival of semi-barbarous cookery. The reputation which mince-pies have attained of being indigestible is certainly not undeserved, but it is probably due less to the materials of which they are made than to the faulty preparation of them. If all the ingredients are passed through a sausage-machine, they will be reduced almost to a pulp, and in this state will not disagree even with delicate people. Suet should be used in smaller proportions than that you mention; half a pound of it is ample for each pound of raisins, currants, sultanas, and apples, and it should be finely shred, then rolled, so as to avoid the possibility of any lumps. This plan of preparing suet makes it go farther, as it is thus mixed in small particles with the other materials, giving sufficient richness to the mince-meat without the greasiness which is caused by the suet being in lumps. 2. Icing sugar, which can be bought of any good grocer, answers as well as that which is prepared at home.

H. LE B.—

Think naught a trifle, though it small appear;
Small sands the mountain, moments make the year,
And trifles life.—"Love of Fame," EDWARD YOUNG.

JOSÉ.—1. Please see answer last week to "Housewife." Your failure in making Madeira-cakes probably arises from your not having beaten the eggs and sugar sufficiently. Cakes of this class can only be successfully made by those who have patience to whisk the materials for some length of time, and, we may add, to acquire the proper method of doing this. 2. In HOUSEHOLD WORDS, Nos. 133 and 134, papers were given showing how to make cheap Christmas-boxes. 3. Many thanks for your kind words.

MRS. J.—"Tis not in mortals to command success. But we'll do more, Sempronius; we'll deserve it."—"Cato," Act I., Scene 2, Joseph Addison.

OLD READER.—The rent becomes due before twelve o'clock on the day week when the tenancy of the apartments commenced.

OLD WOMAN THAT LIVED IN HER SHOE.—The question, "How long is it necessary to keep children away from school after an infectious disease?" was answered some time since by the Academy of Medicine, Paris. With scarlet-fever, diphtheria, measles, and small-pox, isolation is to be maintained for forty days. Chicken-pox and mumps lose their contagious power after twenty-five days.

QUITE SO.—If any pawn-ticket is lost, mislaid, or stolen, the pawnier should at once apply to the pawnbroker for a form or declaration, to be made before a magistrate, or the pawnbroker will be bound to deliver the pledge to any person who produces the ticket to him and claims to redeem the same.

SYMPATHY.—The verses were written by the late Dean of Westminster, and were printed in The Spectator. We do not know if they have been published elsewhere:

"Till death us part,"

So speaks the heart

When each to each repeats the words of doom;

Thro' blessing and thro' curse,

For better and for worse,

We will be one till that dread hour shall come.

Life, with its myriad grasp,

Our yearning souls shall clasp.

By ceaseless love, and still expectant wonder;

In bonds that shall endure

Indissolubly sure,

Till God in death shall part our paths asunder.

Till death us join.

O voice yet more divine!

That to the broken heart breathes hope sublime;

Thro' lonely hours

And shattered powers

We still are one, despite of change and time.

Death, with his healing hand,

Shall once more knit the band

Which needs but that one link which none may sever;

Till, thro' the Only Good,

Heard, felt, and understood,

Our life in God shall make us one for ever.

THE AUNT.—The best and only explanation we know of, touching the grey mouse in "Faust," is that of Shelley's translation:

MEPHISTOPHELES. That was all right, my friend;

Be it enough that the mouse was not grey;

Do not disturb your time of happiness

With close consideration of such trifles.

ZENOPIA.—You will find your seven questions answered in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 137. Correspondents must remember that our space is limited, and lengthy answers have often to be kept over, whilst those which are shorter, and present no particular difficulty, are inserted at once.

Puzzles for Prizes.

Prize Winners in No. 136.

1st Prize, 10s., "Pericardium."

2nd Prize, 5s., "Polypodium" (Mrs. Joseph S. Leicester, Levenshulme View, Reddish, near Stockport).

"Pericardium" is requested to send his name and address.

The answer to the Poetical Acrostic is:

"Must mourn the deepest o'er the fatal trust
And none have baffled, many fallen before m
Nor would redeem a moment of that hou
Upon my strength—I do defy—disclai
Eros and Anteros at Gadai

OUT OF THE RUNNING.—The following Prize-Winners come under the conditions of Rule 3, for thirteen weeks from the date of the Number in which they gained a Prize: No. 125.—Equal Prizes, "Frensham," "Ryland," "Maiblume." No. 126.—1st Prize, "Hookwood"; 2nd Prize, "L. C. L." No. 127.—1st Prize, "Manhattan"; 2nd Prize, "Maiblume." No. 128.—1st Prize, "Irish Exile"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 129.—Equal Prizes, "Abracadabra," "Acacia," "Ethel May." No. 130.—1st Prize, "The Arabs"; 2nd Prize, "Alice." No. 132.—1st Prize, "Atlas"; 2nd Prize, "Ethel May." No. 133.—1st Prize, "Syd Gardnor"; 2nd Prize, "Medway." No. 134.—1st Prize, "One and All"; 2nd Prize, "Froggie." No. 135.—1st Prize, "Trivia"; 2nd Prize, "Idonea." No. 136.—1st Prize, "Pericardium"; 2nd Prize, "Polypodium."

Answers have also been received from—Agamemnon, Battsbite, Cipher, Dover, Emma Jane, Froggie, One and All, Proteus, Sunflower, Tarradiddle, Warwickshire Lass.

Answers to Puzzles in No. 133, received too late from Bayleaf.

Answers to Puzzles in No. 135, received too late from Dafke, Hatchet, Inkpot, Marie, Robdavo.

Odds and Ends.

A SHORT time ago the Queen of Italy, in the course of a railway journey, stopped at a certain station, and was met by the mayor and municipal big-wigs in all the glory of their robes of honour. An elegant luncheon had been provided, but the royal appetite was uncertain, and the Queen requested the obsequious deputation to get her a glass of wine, which was all that she required. This was promptly brought; but whilst drinking it, a drop fell from the glass on to her travelling dress. She at once sought in her pocket for a handkerchief to remove the stain; but the worthy mayor, whose daily avocations behind the counter had possibly accustomed him to the purposes for which ladies seek their pockets, misunderstood the motion of the Queen's hand, and murmured humbly, but earnestly: "Ah no, your majesty! I assure you it is all paid for!"

ONE morning Jerrold and Compton proceeded together to view the pictures in the Gallery of Illustration. On entering the ante-room they found themselves opposite to a number of very long looking-glasses. Pausing before one of these, Compton remarked to Jerrold: "You've come here to admire works of art. Very well; feast you on that work of nature!"—pointing to his own figure reflected in the glass. "Look at it; there's a picture for you!" "Yes," said Jerrold, regarding it intently; "very fine, very fine indeed!" Then turning to his friend: "Wants hanging, though?"

A VERY characteristic French story appears in a Paris paper. It runs thus: A man enters the shop of a barber to be shaved. He sits down, when a big dog comes in immediately afterwards, and sitting down in front of him, regards him with a fixed stare. "Ah, what does this mean?" cries the gentleman, who feels somewhat uncomfortable. "I'll tell you," replies the barber, meanwhile moving the razor about quickly. "From time to time, I chance to cut off an ear of a customer. Then the dog eats it!"

AN old pioneer, who believed that "what was to be would be," lived in a region infested by Indians. He always took his gun with him, and once, finding that some of his family had taken it, he would not go out without it. His friends rallied him, saying that there was no danger of the Indians, as he would not die until his time came, anyhow. "Yes," said old Leatherstockings, "but suppose I was to meet an Indian, and his time was come, it wouldn't do not to have my gun."

LIGHTNING speed in manufacture may certainly be claimed by our Transatlantic cousins. At the recent Louisville Exhibition, the American Register tells us, the Governor of Arkansas wore a suit of clothes made from cotton, which had been cleaned, ginned, carded, spun, dyed, woven, cut, and stitched by the tailor, all in one afternoon. Forty-four hours before, it was still unpicked in the cotton-fields five hundred miles away.

LANDLORD to tenant: "Good-morning, sir; fine day, sir; just called round to see if it would be convenient to settle your quarter's rent?" "Do you know, landlord, that none of the doors in this house will shut?" "New house, sir; new house, you know; takes time to settle." "Ah, then there's a pair of us. I'm a new tenant; it takes time for me to settle, too. Good-morning. Call again."

SAXE, the joker and poet, was once taking a trip on a steamer, when he fell in with a lively young lady, to whom he made himself very agreeable. Of course, he made an impression upon the damsel, who said at parting: "Good-bye, Mr. Saxe; I fear you'll soon be forgetting me." "Ah," said the inveterate punster, "if I was not a married man already, you may be sure I'd be for getting you."

"WE frequently see it stated," says Mr. Oddfish, "that such and such men started from extreme poverty, coming into town in the first place without a farthing of money, and rising by their own exertions. When I first came I had to borrow money to get here, and I've been borrowing money ever since. It is a great thing at sixty to have established such a wonderful credit."

THE Paris Temps recently translated an American telegram stating that a cyclone had occurred at Springfield, Missouri, as follows: "An election riot broke out in Springfield, Missouri; the rioters destroyed two houses, killed five persons, and injured thirty." The mistake is all the more ludicrous, as "cyclone" is a French as well as an English term.

THERE was a tedious play not long ago produced in London, in which one of the characters, a theatrical manager, had to say to another, "If any of the public are not satisfied, their money will be returned." Upon this the gallery rose as one man, and with outstretched hands shouted, "Me, me, me!"

It is reported that this reply was really given recently by the guide round St. Alban's Cathedral, to the remark that the variety of architecture was most interesting: "Yes, sir; you see the works was given to different contractors, who each did it in his own way."

THEY were two little children, and they were painting pictures in their school books. One youngster finished a cow in blue, and then remembered never to have seen a blue cow. "Never mind," encouragingly said the other; "we'll say the cow is cold."

A PREACHER in Tennessee is known as the "satisfying preacher." Whenever a church began to get a little tired of their pastor, this man was sent for, and after hearing a sermon or two from him they were "satisfied"—to keep the pastor they had.

"NEVER be critical upon the ladies," was the maxim of an old Irish peer, remarkable for his homage to the sex; "the only way in the world that a true gentleman ever will attempt to look at the faults of a pretty woman is to shut his eyes."

"WHOSE pigs are those, my lad?" "Whoy, they belong to that there big sow." "No, I mean who is their master?" "Whoy," again answered the lad, "that little un; he's a rare un to fight."

AN Irishman says that if the Naiads were constantly bathing, he presumes, from their name, the Dryads were the ones who brought the towels.

"Is lager-beer a tonic?" asked an invalid; and the German doctor answers: "It ish a tonic—it ish, in fact, Teu-tonic."

SOME extraordinary stories are told of the value of cocoanut as an efficient food. The following instance is given by the Fiji Times: "A vessel that once left San Francisco with four hundred passengers for Sydney had, in consequence of running short of stores, to put in at Samsa, where a large quantity of cocoanuts were obtained. During the remainder of the passage very heavy weather was encountered, in which the vessel became water-logged and only reached Sydney after a perilous journey of eighty days, during which time all the provisions ran short, and men, women, and children were fed only upon cocoanuts, being at last reduced to one per diem for each adult. Notwithstanding the diet, not a life was lost, not a single case of sickness occurred, and all the passengers landed in a healthy and well-nourished condition."

The Fate of a Christmas Card.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"So Paul really leaves us to-day. You have not forgotten, Deborah?"

"I do not call him Paul myself," answered Miss Deborah Compton; "but I am quite aware that the time has come for Mr. Sevyer to take his departure, and I am glad of it."

"You will not let him think that, sister?" said the first speaker uneasily. "You will wish him good-bye in a friendly manner?"

"Dr. Compton, am I ever rude to anyone?"

"No, certainly not, my dear Deborah."

As a matter of fact, her brother could recall many, very many instances in the years during which she had sojourned under his roof when the lady had been almost rude, and more than unpleasant; and the doctor knew, by painful experience, that it was a bad sign when she gave him his full title.

"I never forget what is due to others, or myself," Miss Compton went on with dignity; "and I shall say 'farewell' with pleasure to a very presuming young man, who was brought here to St. Peverall in defiance of my wishes, and against my advice."

"I was bound to get someone to help me," urged the other in mild deprecation. "You know what roads a country practitioner has to travel in such a district as this."

The doctor glanced forth from the window out on a dreary landscape, where the combs and hills, the stretching moorland of North Devon, were lying sombre and desolate under the winter's sky.

"Exmoor is a wild place, and it is always the people at a distance who are ill, especially at night. I was bound to have help," he repeated, "few as my patients are; and then—and then—I wanted leisure for my experiments."

"Your experiments!" and it was a marvel how any one could express so much in two words.

"No, Deborah, not that. Please don't."

He was an undersized individual, this Devonshire medical man, with pinched features, and a countenance almost vacuous. Save one expression of hope, all the other emotions were merged in a general blank; that one remained. It almost seemed as if the deep, wrinkled lines of his face were entrenchments, yielded one by one in a hard fight with the world, until hope—a perfect reliance, and undoubted confidence in something—had taken refuge in his still keen grey eyes, and refused to be driven forth.

"Not that, Deborah, please."

"Well, then, I won't," softening a little. "But you know yourself, brother, your practice is so small, we could not live without my poor annuity. Your few patients don't pay you, and it was unwise to have an assistant, a young and handsome one, too."

"One moment, Deborah," he interrupted. "Paul Sevyer is not more expensive for being good-looking. He may eat a trifle extra on account of youth, but I could not have had an older man at the price. Why, I pay him next to nothing, and that little," with a sorrowful smile, "I usually borrow for my—my—you know," avoiding the word which had given offence.

"He would never have stayed on such terms," she rejoined, "never, but for our niece; and here he has been three years. It was madness. Muriel Davenant is just as foolish, just as romantic as her mother was before her, and we know what silly Janet did—married a penniless pauper of a curate. Why, Sir Angus Garth would make Muriel his wife to-morrow, and he owns all that we can see. She gives him not one scrap of encouragement, and—"

There came an interruption to her speech. A tap at the door, followed by—well, hardly the entrance of Miss Compton's "detrimental," for he only came as far as the threshold. Perhaps Paul Sevyer was not sure of his welcome—possibly he was uncertain of room in the little apartment, for the stalwart frame of a blue-eyed, light-haired young giant filled the doorway, and seemed to be encroaching on Aunt Deborah's peace, as those sturdy Norse rovers, whose form and features he bore, were wont to swoop down on the fair western coasts.

"Can I speak to you a moment, Dr. Compton?" Paul's voice was low and musical, but it seemed absurd for such a big man to be so shy and embarrassed. "I will not detain you, sir. But I am leaving in a few minutes."

"Certainly, certainly, my boy," cried his employer, but hardly with alacrity—although perhaps glad to escape himself. "I will join you in the summer-house in a moment."

As Paul, bowing to the lady, disappeared, Dr. Compton went to an old-fashioned bureau. He carefully unlocked it, and as carefully closed it, when he had selected sundry articles from its shelves. To an ordinary mind, there was an air of mystery over all this. Paul had betokened no surprise at the suggested place of meeting, although an open summer-house, in a bleak garden on the borders of Exmoor, with a light film of snow on the ground, and a fortnight before Christmas, might seem an uncongenial spot. And Miss Deborah looked on in a most matter-of-fact way, as her brother collected a powder-flask, two small, curiously-fashioned cannons, some tools, and half-a-dozen metal objects, for which there was no name. All those things he placed almost reverently in a bag, and then looked that. Did he fear danger from this young descendant of the Vikings? Hardly. There was not much to dread in Paul Sevyer's frank face, and honest smiling eyes; but, nevertheless, the doctor gathered his armoury about him, and so went forth.

It was not a cheerful place, Dr. Compton's garden, although it had one advantage in being sheltered from the wind by very high walls, screening it from all observation; otherwise it was a bare, desolate place, and assuredly not devoted to any purposes of horticulture. The few shrubs it boasted were leafless and scorched. The ground was torn up here and there as if by explosives. The sides and roof of the so-called summer-house were riddled by bullets, and blackened by fire, and there was also a large suicide-suggesting pond, and in the distance some targets.

"I suppose I know what you want, Paul?" said the master of this salubrious spot.

"I don't think you do, sir," answered Paul, whose embarrassment seemed to increase. "I wish you did, for I fear to tell you."

"You need not," and the older man was no more at ease. "But I have it not to give you. Fear not for your money. It is safe," and his voice gathered confidence as he spoke. "Every loan which I have had—not for my own sake—but borrowed in the interest of all humanity, shall be repaid in the days which are coming—repaid, I say, a thousandfold, not only in gold, but by the thanks, the gratitude, the blessings of the wide world."

"I did not purpose to ask for money, sir," rejoined Paul.

"Eh! what?" In the doctor's struggle with life, it was matter for surprise to be asked for anything else. "Eh! not money?"

"No, sir; I was not thinking of those trifling sums. The obligation is rather with me, that I have been able to aid you. I have to ask for something more precious still."

Paul Sevyer paused a moment. His hesitating words would hardly come, and the other made no effort to help him. In fact, the doctor seemed lost in thought, and had unpacked the bag, that his hand might fondle one of the cannons.

"I love Muriel—Miss Davenant—your niece, sir—and—and—I hope—that is—I believe—"

"Oh dear me!" The doctor relinquished his artillery to stroke his forehead in a bewildered manner. "Dear me! had you not better speak to her aunt? She arranges all these things, and—"

"No, sir." The ice once broken, Paul could go on. "No, sir; I am sure it would be in vain."

"I don't know," said the doctor, uttering a palpable untruth. "If you told Deborah—my sister—that Muriel returned your affection?"

"I have not dared to ask Miss Muriel yet myself, sir. I only crave your permission to do so."

"But," said the doctor, casting about for some excuse to shift the responsibility, "I am afraid there are obstacles. Did you ever—ever consider," desperately, "the disparity in your size? Why, my little maid will hardly reach your shoulder."

"She does not reach it, sir," rejoined Paul; "but she reaches my heart, and that is enough for me."

"And—and—besides that"—the old man had returned to his pet gun, and appeared to derive inspiration from its black muzzle—"there are other things. You are, like myself, a poor doctor—the difference is, that you are a poor young doctor, and I a poor old doctor. Now, answer me truly—do you think you are a fitting match for ten—fifty—nay, a hundred thousand pounds?"

The "poor young doctor" looked at him in sheer surprise. The old man's voice was full of hope, his eyes glittering with enthusiasm—or was it insanity which suggested itself to Paul? Then he went on:

"Muriel, if I live but a few days longer, will have this and more, or else the world has no gratitude. You have trusted me with your money—I trust you with my secret. Nay, let me speak," ere the young man could protest. "It is a relief. I have dreamt of it for years—thought of it day and night. I must tell some one, or go mad. I have many inventions, each one a fortune, but I have let them all go for this. Look," proudly uplifting the cannon, "two, three, half-a-dozen of these, and the proudest army which ever obeyed a despot's will—the noblest fleet framed to carry fire and slaughter over the seas—only five minutes, and it shall be gone, melted, like a snowflake in the sun.”

“But stay, Dr. Compton—stay,” and the young man laid his hand upon the doctor’s arm, for in wild excitement he was flourishing about, and it was hard to say what devastation even so small a model might work. “You proclaim yourself a philanthropist, and—”

“Yes, I do,” he broke in. “Is not this the outcome of it all? What armies shall meet each other, when but a few seconds shall see utter annihilation? I tell you that this, the very incarnation of all the lust of war, is the inauguration of the reign of peace. There. Go! Like the world, I see you do not believe. There never was but one who had faith in Gabriel Compton, and she was taken from me. Dream your dream of love. I had mine once. Ah me! It is long, long ago.”

The doctor’s voice was solemn, as the voice of one mourning the dead past. The sigh was very sad, and the mists of the buried years, their hopes, and fears, and joys, were dimming his eyes.

“Seek Muriel if you will. For the memory of my own youth, I cannot say nay.”

“I thank you a thousand times, sir,” cried Paul. “You have made me very happy this day.”

“I am not so sure of that,” rejoined the old man doubtfully. “Muriel has been sent away, kept away, until you should be gone. My sister will never forgive me. Woo her, win her if you can. But I tell you, Paul,” and the doctor’s voice was an impressive whisper, “you have Miss Deborah Compton to fight against; and my gun, with the terrible shell it carries, is not capable of that.”

The interview was ended. It would have been cruel to hinder the old man, palpably anxious to commence his practice. His late assistant took his departure like royalty, followed by salutes of ordnance. But if the cannon were loud, Aunt Deborah was quiet. Her farewell was of the iciest, as she bowed Paul Sevyer from St. Peverall.

CHAPTER II.

HE had haunted the platform of Dane’s Cross Junction for days, although it was seven long miles from the lonely vicarage where was his home, and hardly pleasant weather. As Christmas drew nearer, the cold grew more severe, and Dane’s Cross, bleak and unsheltered, lay open to a keen east wind, which seemed to mock the wintry sunshine.

Guards having grown accustomed to a blue-eyed young giant gazing wistfully into each carriage, had ceased to enquire if “he was going on.” The station-master realised that he neither possessed nor wanted a ticket; and the porters, misanthropical individuals, with communistic views touching anyone in a better coat than their own corduroy, had laid aside, in deference to superior proportions, a wild desire to run him down with the station wheelbarrow.

And his waiting had its reward. Patience brings many dreams true, and this was no exception. Paul Sevyer’s vision came to him at last—came to him in the shape of a smiling, happy little face, over which the envious cold had no power, save to tinge it with a more bewitching colour; in the shape of a pair of bright sunny eyes, meeting his own a moment in glad surprise, then shyly downcast; in the shape of a lithe graceful form, in a coquettish little hat, with one knot of scarlet ribbon, a grey, close-fitting ulster, and, alas!—why is there a drawback to all mundane pleasure?—further protected from the sting of winter by a railway wrapper, unmistakably a man’s, and that man—Sir Angus Garth.

Paul took the little hand extended to him, but had no chance to long retain it, for the girl’s travelling companion, rising from his seat, threw open the carriage-door.

As he stepped forth, the greeting between these two men was of the iciest.

“If you will excuse me, Miss Davenant,” said the baronet, “I must enquire about my own train at Beckarmith, where, I deeply regret, our roads diverge. We stay here, I believe, a few minutes. I will trust you, for so long, to Mr.—to Mr. Sevyer.”

The words were simple enough. There was nothing at which to take offence. Yet in some way—or was it Paul’s jealous fancy?—Sir Angus Garth seemed to imply some sense of proprietorship, and there was certainly a tinge of superciliousness in the pretence of barely remembering the other’s name. Yet he was not a bad fellow, Sir Angus. Paul was bound to admit so much. A good landlord, well beloved by his tenantry, whose heart and purse were open to distress, and who had been very friendly to himself until—well, all that was changed now—there was nothing of amiability in his brief recognition.

“Mr. Sevyer, where did you spring from? I never hoped—that is expected,” substituting the more formal word, “to see you here.”

“Why not, Miss Davenant? Esterton Vicarage is no great distance from Dane’s Cross, and I would have walked much farther for this chance; the more so, as it may be the last time.”

“The last time!”

There was a little tremor—or did he only fancy it?—in the echo of his words. Then, with an effort, the girl steadied her voice.

“The last time? I do not understand; you have left my uncle, and—and”—she had very nearly said “me”—“have left my uncle and St. Peverall.”

“I have, Miss Davenant. There was nothing for me to do there, and the world is before me. I am leaving England in a few days.”

“Another surprise!” The girl knew he was gazing earnestly on the shyly averted face. She could not speak in affected unconcern, and meet his glance. “Another surprise, and I have not been from home so very long. These changes take place, and no one tells me. Aunt Deborah never mentioned it.”

“I imagine not,” with a shadow of bitterness. “Miss Compton would hardly deem the name of Paul Sevyer worthy to enter into her correspondence. I scarcely dared to hope it would interest you, Miss Davenant; but I thought, perchance, the doctor might have alluded to it when—”

“The doctor,” she interrupted with a rippling laugh. “He is very fond of me; I need scarcely tell you that.”

“You need not tell me, Miss Davenant.”

She blushed a little, but went on, ignoring the meaning in his words:

“He would not write to me if I were away six months instead of as many weeks. He is too immersed in his inventions and plans. Ah, dear old uncle! he is always devising something. Do you think, Mr. Sevyer, that there is really anything in it all?”

“I may not presume to express an opinion,” the young man rejoined, and his tone was a little formal. He had not walked seven miles that morning, mostly through deep lanes—only sheltered from the frosty air, in order, where not slippery with ice, to be thick with clinging mire—to find Muriel attended by Sir Angus Garth, and disposed to talk of the doctor and his doings. But with feminine intuition of what might come, and with a nervous desire to avoid it, unexplained to herself, she went on:

“He has tried so many things. They all cost him money, and turn out failures. When I left he was just thinking of some wonderful cannon which was to bring universal peace by killing everybody; before that there was a perfect substitute for leather; and before that, again, a wonderful perpetual-motion, self-acting tricycle. Will none of his schemes meet success?”

“I do not know. Disappointment in all things, little and big, seems the lot of most of us in this life. I have been here several times, knowing you must pass through Dane’s Cross, in the hope of seeing Miss Davenant.”

“And have at least met with no disappointment,” she interrupted hastily. “Miss Davenant is here.”

“And not alone,” Paul said, with a meaning glance to where Sir Angus was approaching in the distance. “I came, Muriel—pardon me, let me utter the name once—to say something, surely you may guess what—and now words fail me. I would have asked you—would have said—”

“Now, sir, if you please, are you going on?” An utterly unympathetic guard had interposed and the baronet was drawing nearer.

“I have an appointment as naval surgeon,” he went on desperately. “A few days after Christmas the sea will roll between us, Muriel, and if I dared to hope—if I might only look forward to—”

“A merry Christmas and a happy new year, I think you may, Paul—Mr. Sevyer.”

Muriel’s presence of mind came to her aid, barely in time, as Sir Angus was close upon them, and surely there was a meaning in the last low-spoken words.

Did Sir Angus note the bright flush upon her face? It was plain enough to Paul, and his pulses were bounding wildly at his own name, never breathed by those trembling lips before.

It was over, the meeting for which the young man had walked so many miles, and had waited so many hours. The baronet, lord of the manor at St. Peverall, owner of many miles around, was adjusting the wraps, with perhaps a little unnecessary empressment. There was a slamming of doors up and down the train, and already it was moving.

It was over, but the memory of that last interview, conducted amid such incongruous surroundings, was stamped on his mind.

Over! Already the train was afar off, growing dim in a dull mist, which was sweeping in from the sea to hide the sunshine. Born of the gloom, a dull fear was at Paul’s heart as he turned away to traverse those lanes and bye-paths, more cheerless and forbidding than before. With the changed face of Nature, a wailing breeze had sprung up, and seemed sighing for the vanity of human aspirations. And in his excited fancy, the trees were waving their leafless branches in derision of his hopes.

A young naval surgeon, against Sir Angus Garth, his title, and his rent-roll? Folly! Presumption! A merry Christmas? It was but mockery. And yet—and yet—

CHAPTER III.

"GLAD to see you back again, miss," and the station-master lifted two fingers to his cap, in stiff military salute. "I feared you would not be able to get here so soon."

Muriel Davenant looked at him in surprise. The parting shriek, as it moved away, of the train which had brought her to St. Peverall, rendered the official's last words nearly inaudible, yet she wondered at his grave face.

"I suppose I am here sooner than I was expected, as there is no one to meet me. Will you send up my things when you can;" and indicating her not too numerous belongings, the girl passed through the wicket; but she turned again with a parting smile. "A merry Christmas and a happy new year to you and Mrs. Tregaskis, and all the little ones."

"Thank you, miss. Thank you kindly. The same to you, I am sure."

John Tregaskis's voice was solemn as his countenance, which was usually so beaming. He watched her step forth from the dull and quiet station into the dull and quiet road, and the official glance of admiration was strangely puzzled.

"I think I see how 'tis. She can't have heard. Reckon I ought to have broke the news some way. But how could I dash the light out of that winsome face? Christmas, too, of all times. Alack! what a world it is."

It was easy to mark her passing through the few other passengers, one and all making way in grave, silent respect. Moving with lithe, free grace, so different from the lumbering gait of those "children of toil," the girl seemed almost the denizen of another world. Her road had not long to run with theirs. For soon, turning aside from the highway, she held her course down a rarely frequented path, at times merely a track across the moor, a wild uncivilised kind of track too, revelling in devious and unlooked-for turns. And after one of those unexpected flights—when it had twisted round a granite crag, to double sharply back on the other side; had dived head-first into a steep little dell, for no apparent reason, save to zig-zag out again, frightened by a babbling ice-fringed brook—it suddenly grew trim and orderly, almost precise, and here, passing a pair of untended gates, Muriel was at home.

It was not a grand habitation. The dwelling of Dr. Compton was little more than a large cottage, whose quaint windows—no two alike—festooned in summer-time with creeping plants, looked out upon an old-fashioned garden (the doctor's artillery practice was carried on behind), where, in their season, hydrangeas, myrtles, and rhododendrons grew in rare luxuriance. But now it all seemed sad and desolate. The trailing branches drooped over the casements, dead leaves lay thickly on the paths, and over all was a brooding air, as of sorrow, which, for an instant, struck Muriel's heart with a strange, undefined dread.

"I am growing timid and silly," she murmured, with a light laugh in which was no merriment. "Of course it is dull after London and dear Katie's" (the old school-fellow whom she had been visiting), "quiet, indeed, after her noisy little ones." Then, sinking her voice to as deep Shakespearean accents as its sweet tones could compass: "What, ho! within there! Will no one welcome the wanderer? Nay, then, there must be something amiss. Your nose, Ponto, is abnormally cold—as chilly as the weather—and your tail dolorous in its wag."

She stooped to caress the faithful house-dog coming slowly to meet her—a shaggy old collie, who, never far from the doctor, apparently always taking keen interest in his master's experiments, had escaped destruction by a miracle a dozen times. Ponto lifted a great paw in greeting—an acquirement taught by Muriel, and the girl noticed not the sorrow in his eyes—the sad instinct telling him that something was wrong.

"Come, old man, this place is full of melancholy. Let us have a waltz."

It was another of his tricks to let her whirl him around, always in a diffident way, as if such levity was unfitting a dog of mature age; but now there was such mute protest in his reproachful glance, that she let him go, and looked up to see the doctor's sister standing in the porch.

"Why, Aunt Deborah, here I am, home again. It is all so quiet, I thought everybody was asleep or dead."

Miss Compton shuddered visibly at the word.

"Muriel, do not speak so lightly. Have you not heard? Did you not get my letter?"

"I have had no letter," she cried with a quick catching of her breath. "What is there to tell me, that you look like that? Surely, no bad news, and at this—at Christmas-time?"

Then she remembered the grave faces on the road, the station-master's strange manner, and a sure foreboding of coming sorrow was at her heart.

"Oh, aunt! what is it? In pity tell me! Is it—is it my uncle?"

Aunt Deborah laid a gentle hand upon her shoulder.

"My poor child!"

It was all she said. Only three words. But something in their tone, their solemn sadness—so different from Miss Compton's usual incisive utterances—was a revelation.

"It is my poor uncle, then. Is he dead?"

"He is not dead, child," was the sorrowful answer, "but dying fast, and you are barely in time. I always hated my brother's inventions and patents," with a sudden bitterness, "and now they have killed him."

A few words—a hurried explanation—and her incoherent speech was made clear. The previous day, that cherished model, the gun which was to do so much, as if animated by the demon of war, which it was to quell, had turned upon its inventor, and the doctor staggered in from his last experiment, bleeding and dying.

With a calmness at which she wondered afterwards when all was over, the girl, with hushed footstep, stole to her uncle's bedside.

Dr. Compton lay as he had lain there ever since, caring not to move or speak, but a glance of kindness in his eyes, a faint smile, told that he knew she was there, and that he was content.

So he remained all through the night and the next day and again the next. He merely showed a gleam of consciousness when the neighbouring practitioner from Beckarmith made his visit, then the thin lips wreathed unmistakably in depreciation of his rival's skill.

Darkness was falling. In the frosty air the stars came forth to shine upon the earth, even as that one shone in glory and in promise so many centuries ago, and the village bells were chiming for Christmas Eve. Then the dying man spoke:

"I am going, Muriel—going fast. Once again I have proved my professional brother wrong. Poor Kirkby, he only gave me a few hours. But it is over—over now. No, dear, not Deborah, do not call her. She only rails against my gun."

He was silent a while; the grey shadow of death was on his face; and with a strange awe the girl knew that the destroyer was near.

"Dear child, it is hard to go just now. That cannon would have done so much—have brought wealth and fame. I told Paul so when he asked your hand of—" The doctor ceased abruptly, then went on: "Do you love him, Muriel? Never mind—tell me when I wake."

Aye, verily, sleep had come—the slumber which must visit each one of us—and all the problems and questions which had vexed the doctor's mind were to be answered in the awakening.

When the brightness of spring was born it shone upon two graves, for Aunt Deborah was laid by her brother's side.

The latest snowflakes of the lingering winter melted away—vanished as utterly as many friends of happier days. To Muriel these things meant ruin and poverty. She knew not how complete, until the stroke fell.

Surely the knowledge grew—a cruel revelation, that even love, the love which she had cherished, now that she was poor and friendless was hers no more. Rejected at first, the thought became a certainty, and with it was a bitter mortification, an angry resentment. For in the months—nay, years which followed, Paul Sevyer sought her never, made no sign, appeared not at St. Peverall.

CHAPTER IV.

THEY were coming on deck at last, the woeful passengers for India, in that swift clipper, the Eastern Queen. For many weary hours, the cruel hand of Father Neptune had lain heavily upon them. They had tossed and tumbled in their berths, in unison with the tossing, tumbling waves around, whilst plaintive voices from the saloon-cabins had requested that the speakers might be thrown overboard without delay. But the wind had moderated. The wild waters had settled down to a heavy roll, making locomotion difficult, instead of impossible, and in honour of the hallowed time so near, those distressed victims were beginning to bestir themselves with heart of grace, for it was Christmas Eve.

As each, till now, unseen one came in view, a bronzed and stalwart personage, described in the company's bills as "an experienced surgeon," gave a keen glance—a glance of disappointment, and yet relief.

It was three long years ago—he remembered it with a bitter smile—since he had watched and waited for a face at Dane's Cross station. It had come then at last—even as it would come now. For Paul Sevyer knew that Sir Angus held a diplomatic appointment in India. In the passengers' list was the name of Lady Garth, and for an instant he had caught a glimpse of a well-remembered, never-forgotten figure, which he had seen but once since that day. He had schooled himself for this, had called upon his pride to beat down a lingering tenderness, which he scarcely owned even unto himself. Muriel was dead to him. He knew it. He must forget it all, and let them meet almost as strangers.

It came at last. She was on deck, and alone. As he was pacing backwards and forwards, she was in his path. Why turn aside? It must be, sooner or later, and so—Paul was face to face with Muriel.

He saw her glance of surprised recognition, and lifted his cap in proud reserve. He knew that his face was too bronzed to tell tales, but hers was burning crimson.

He would have passed so, but something of sorrow, of mute reproach, in those eyes, once so happy, smote him, and he spoke, but only in measured official accents.

"I am glad to welcome Lady Garth to the fresh air. As medical officer, I may say that the demon of the waves is always cowed when bravely met."

In her first impulse she had almost extended a little hand, but he made no answering sign, and, perhaps, in the wailing of the wind, the dashing of the waters, she did not fairly hear him. But there was no mistaking his set countenance, and her voice was cold as his own.

"Thank you, Mr. Sevyer. I am much better" (he had placed a seat for her in a sheltered spot). "I fancy some of the other ladies will need your assistance more than myself."

In the quick eagerness of Paul's resentment, he had misconstrued her, and turned proudly away.

"I understand you, Lady Garth, and will not intrude."

"One moment," and she stopped him with a slight motion of the hand he had rejected. "You called me—you called me—"

"I called you Lady Garth," he interrupted, "and must apologise for an impertinence. I have never been honoured in meeting your ladyship as aught but Miss Davenant; but I did know that Lady Garth was one of our passengers, and I deemed that the title would be no more unwelcome than the brilliant destiny on which I have to offer my humble congratulations."

"You are quite right. The wife of Sir Angus Garth should be happy, for he is a good, and true, and honourable man." The words were uttered pointedly enough. It was her turn now to administer a small stab. "Right, also, in that Lady Garth is on board, as a mother going to join her son."

"Then you are still Muriel—I ask pardon—Miss Davenant," stammered Paul. For just one moment a wild longing hope was stirring his heart; but it died away before the set calm of her face.

"I heard—that is—they told me—you were—Sir Angus was—"

"Doubtless you heard various things, Mr. Sevyer. Excuse my saying their recapitulation can scarcely interest me."

"I am rebuked," he rejoined humbly; "and yet I was not treated well. And now I find Miss Davenant with Lady Garth—his mother—sailing for India. I can only suppose that those rumours which came to me were true, and that—"

She interrupted him again, and with a repressed scorn in her voice, all foreign to her gentle nature:

"Miss Davenant can hardly imagine that her doings are of any interest to Mr. Sevyer. But she is voyaging to India to earn her bread under Lady Garth's protection. Sir Angus has been a good friend to one who, when poverty and sorrow were her portion, had few friends left. The situation she has to fill is of his procuring."

"To earn your bread? I never dreamt of this when my dear old friend the doctor died. Then all his schemes and inventions were worthless?"

"More than worthless. They kept him poor all his life. Few people believed in them." Then, with a shade of bitterness; "Mr. Sevyer at least should know that—who attached so much faith to them—once."

"Miss Davenant, have I deserved this?"

He put the question desperately. The girl had turned from him, and in the action was an obvious dismissal.

"Why speak to me so? If I dared at St. Peverall to dream—"

"It was in bygone days, for lack of worldly prudence," she interrupted in deeper scorn.

"It was so long ago—yes, long ago," he sighed. "And then I heard—I thought—"

She rose to leave him, and words which would not come at his will remained unspoken.

"Pardon me, Mr. Sevyer. Doubtless your thoughts were quite correct then. Certainly it is not my province to combat them now. Further, let me say, that had I known you were surgeon of this vessel, I would not—"

"Have been a passenger." In a voice as frigid as her own he completed the sentence. "Be under no apprehension. I shall not presume upon my position. In the meantime, in my official capacity, may I advise you to go below? There is very heavy weather coming."

The girl bowed and turned away. She saw, where he pointed, a low mass of dense black cloud, against which the flying foam showed ghastly white. Quivering here and there, the fire of heaven, a keen blue spark, was leaping to the sea, and in a few seconds the fury of the gale was upon them.

It was an awful night. A Christmas Eve long to be remembered, to be thought of in after years, when the clouds and gloom had passed away from her life; to be thought of with deep, heartfelt gratitude for the brighter dawn which was to follow so soon upon its darkness.

An awful Christmas Eve! In the dear old England, left so far behind, lights were gleaming from peaceful cottage windows, fires burning brightly in happy homes. Friends met friends in love and kindness. And, perchance, as in the pause of mirth and song the storm was heard, some gentle hearts thought with pity of "those at sea."

An awful Christmas Eve! A driving hurricane of hail and rain stinging the face like whips. A wild wind wailing, shrieking, groaning, as with the voices of the lost. A chaos of maddened waters, with huge waves uplifting themselves as in derision of man's hardihood in daring to oppose their might; and below, the creaking of timbers, the cries of frightened women, the shivering of glass and china, and occasionally the heavier crash of some unsecured article.

Wearily the night wore away. There came a lighter grey in the east. A flush of pink growing stronger, yet stronger—a streak of crimson quivering through the storm-wrack—and so was born Christmas Day!

Through the night, until the wrath of wind and sea abated with the morning, Paul Sevyer had been on deck. The storm held no terror for him. In the tumult of his mind sleep was impossible. He still stayed where Muriel, with those last cruel words, had left him, and there, as the day advanced, she came to him again. He saw and wondered.

The face so cold and proud was proud no more, and her voice was strangely humbled.

"Mr. Sevyer, I did you an injustice yesterday. I ask your pardon."

"Miss Davenant! Muriel! My pardon!"

"I found this. Only now—until this Christmas morning I have never seen it."

No eye save hers was to see it after. Snatching it from her hand, the wind whirled it away, and Father Neptune took unto himself—a Christmas Card and a letter! The young man had recognised it. Each word was well remembered. The story of his love, which had met—only silence.

"I sent that, Muriel, three weary years since, after we parted at Dane's Cross. You have never read it?"

"Can you think it would have remained unanswered?" she cried. "Even if—if—"

"If what, Muriel?"

The girl's face was blushing furiously under his glance. Answering not the question, she went on:

"Remember at what time it came. When my dear uncle was lying dead, when our peaceful home at St. Peverall was full of sorrow. Aunt Deborah pushed it aside—what time was that for Christmas Cards, joy, and merriment?—laid it away in her desk with a dozen other missives. There it has been, unseen until now, when that desk has fallen—is smashed to atoms."

Loyal to the memory of the dead, the girl did not tell him that it had been the only one opened, and placed in the most secret drawer of Miss Compton's desk.

She stood before him, panting and flushed, as she had stood years ago, and with a great rush of tenderness Paul's heart went back to the past.

"And so you thought that your changed circumstances had changed me! It was long after, when my voyage was done, that I even heard of Dr. Compton's death."

"It was the egotism of grief," she murmured. "I thought that everyone must know what affected me so keenly. And—and you never came near me."

"What was I to imagine?" he rejoined. "I heard nothing from St. Peverall—no word, no line—save a few pounds in discharge of the doctor's obligation. My poor darling, and you wanted the money! But I came—I came, Muriel, and in the dusk of a summer's eve. I saw a man by your side, saw him bend down to kiss you, and I stole away unseen, for that man was—Sir Angus Garth!"

"And my good friend," she interrupted, "a brother to me ever since—since that very night, when he knew he could be no more."

"My darling!" and the young man's voice was deep and earnest with the old love, "my darling, I asked you a question at Christmas-tide three years ago. I ask you now again, at this most blessed Christmas. Muriel, will you be my wife?"

She answered not, for blustering old Neptune managed it all, managed it with a huge wave, a mighty roll, and the girl, staggering a moment, was in Paul's arms.

No one saw this save the "man at the wheel," and if he was impertinent enough to think she stayed there unnecessarily long, it would have been better for him to mind his steering. As a matter of fact, it is open to doubt whether a rough coat, soaking with rain and sea-water, could make a comfortable resting-place. But Muriel Davenant's fair face nestled closely to Paul's heart, and she was content.

Far, far away on the shore of old England, the glad chimes were pealing forth the message of "love, and peace, and good-will" to man; at sea, the solemn requiem was sung by wind and dashing wave. But it was a "Merry Christmas" for all that, and the fulness of time brought to Paul Sevyer and his bride many "Happy New Years."

May it do so to us all!

Old China.

I SEE your eyes are on that shelf;
You're fond of bric-à-brac yourself?
You like old china? So do I,
As my dear wife will testify.

That shepherdess is Dresden ware—
Good early specimens are rare;
It needs some little skill to tell
The genuine; shams are made so well.

That blue-and-white is from Mooltan;
That dragon is of old Japan;
That figure of a praying bonze
Is Chinese—lacquer over bronze.

That Sevres vase is rather good,
Once in the Tuileries it stood;
That's Henri Deux; I needn't say
You can't pick those up every day.

That quaint old dish is ancient Dutch
(I'd rather that you wouldn't touch);
I'm told that India lacquer-jar
Was in the palace of the Czar,

You like them? Yes, they're rather nice;
I fancy they will fetch their price,
I think my plates and jars will pay
When Christie knocks them down some day.

O gentle reader, drop a tear
O'er man's hypocrisy in art;
For two pounds ten (and that was dear)
He'd bought them at an auction mart.

Snowdon House.

(A SHORT SERIAL STORY.)

PART III.

OF course Mr. Wayre was immediately shown in, and Miss Fulham acknowledged his greeting with a little confusion, which was natural under the circumstances, and which became her very well. She made some trifling remark, hoping that he was well, and so forth, then the doctor proceeded to speak upon some indifferent subjects; but Mr. Wayre cut him short, and saved all trouble, and removed all difficulty in approaching the theme which was in the minds of all three.

"Dr. Fulham, you have not forgotten our conversation of an hour or two back. That is impossible. But have you mentioned it to your daughter?"

"I—I was just speaking to her about it, and was trying to explain—" began the doctor, who in despite of as much self-possession as falls to the lot of most men, was taken somewhat aback by this unexpected opening.

"That will do," continued Mr. Wayre, accepting the unfinished answer. "I am pleased to find, Miss Fulham, that your father has prepared you for the business on which I am now here."

"He said—he—" stammered Agatha, who was as much and unexpectedly embarrassed as the doctor had been. The latter had contemplated leaving his visitor to make his proposal, while he himself slipped into the surgery on some feigned excuse, but this seemed impossible now.

"I have no doubt, Miss Fulham," returned Wayre, "that he told you how I, a man much your elder, had felt that my home was lonely without a wife, my household incomplete without a head. This was my charge to him, and I am here to assure you that if you will listen favourably to me—I know what a sacrifice I am asking of one so young, so beautiful as yourself—if you will enter Snowdon House as its mistress, my life shall be devoted to show my gratitude and my love for you."

Agatha's secret fear had been that when the critical moment came, she should be found too calm, too self-possessed. She had been so long preparing, and a previous experience had, she thought, so utterly destroyed all the romantic element of her mind, that she dreaded detection. Under these perplexing circumstances, however, there was no fear of an excess of calmness; her colour went and came, and when she strove to say a few words, they were as incoherent as any girl of sixteen could utter.

"Do not let me press this choice upon you too suddenly," continued Mr. Wayre; "I should not have dared, who am so little calculated to win the love of such a girl—I should not have dared to make you this offer, but that I learnt from your father that you were free to choose, while I believe I have his good wishes."

Fulham in his turn stammered out some incoherent fragments, while, as Mr. Wayre alluded to her being free to choose, a rush of memories came over the girl; all that had happened during the last year was in an instant visible, and her firmness gave way. Her emotion was of course misunderstood, and attributed to a very different cause.

Wayre again told her, in softer, gentler accents than Fulham had ever before heard him use, that he did not press for a decision then, he would only ask her to consider what he had said. The doctor was in agony lest this temporising policy might prevail, and the golden opportunity be left in suspense, subject to a thousand malignant chances and disappointments. But the interval, brief as it was, had sufficed for Agatha. With the invariable quickness of a woman, she decided that if she were ever to accept Mr. Wayre's hand, now was the time; that under no circumstances could the offer be more favourably presented; and she spoke.

"I have no reason to ask for delay, Mr. Wayre," she said, in a voice so low at first as to be scarcely audible; but she gathered strength as she proceeded: "I have seen so much of you, and we have experienced so much of your kindness, that—that there is no one I esteem so highly as I do you. If you think that a person so inexperienced as myself, but who is willing to learn, is fit to—can aid you to—can—" She really could not complete this sentence, but the effect was perhaps better than a mere formal ending, when she abruptly added: "I will do my best to deserve your kindness, and make you happy."

In all the records of marriage proposals ever existent, at any rate where royalties and ambassadors were not concerned, there surely was never such a proposal made as this in the presence of a third party! The only tinge of romance in the whole proceeding—apart from all such elements as may have been hidden in the minds of the respective parties—was shown in Mr. Wayre taking the hand of the girl in his own, kissing her forehead, and returning her pledge by promising, in a solemn re-echo of her words, to do all in his power to make her life happy.

After this the conversation changed sufficiently to allow Dr. Fulham to breathe rather more freely. He had felt hitherto, and with good reason, that he had never been placed in so embarrassing a position in his life. Mr. Wayre's visit was not a prolonged one, and when he left, he wrung the doctor's hand heartily, and kissed Agatha at parting, as an assured and accepted suitor should do.

The channels by which information, or, it may be better to say, knowledge, leaks out, are numerous and subtle, and sometimes are so impossible to be traced, that one would almost fancy that the air must have a mysterious or mesmeric power of conveying intelligence. If this were not so, how can we account for Ezra going to his supper at the lodge, after driving his master home, "in an awful taking," as his wife remarked, when she got a chance of imparting the news to a sympathising female ear, "swearing and going on," until he said:

"The old fool is going to be married to that gal—that doctor's gal! Old Fulham's daughter, who hasn't got a penny; as poor as church-mice, they are. I know Grits the baker has stopped their credit, and old Spraggs the butcher means to put 'em in the court."

"Lor, Ezra! what makes you say such a thing?" exclaimed his wife. "Master would never take up with such an ungainly maux as she is. It must be all your fancy."

"Fancy or not," returned her husband; "that's what he have been into Bridgeley town for to-night. You mark my words, Sukey. I should have thought that he had seen enough. But, of course, it's no business of mine."

It must be owned that Mr. Ezra's guess was not very wide of the mark.

We may run ahead of our story while we say that what was but conjecture on the lodgekeeper's part soon became known as an approved fact in Bridgeley, where the news gave rise to a great deal of sarcastic criticism on the young lady who had accepted a man actually older than her own father. Yet she was envied much more than she was criticised, for Mr. Wayne was known to be wealthy, and his wealth was magnified many times by report. Therefore, old though he was, recluse and misanthrope though he was said to be, it is hardly doing any injustice to the residents of Bridgeley if we say that he could have chosen from a score of eligible young ladies in the town.

Lawyer Darley of the High Street was as discreet and reticent as a lawyer should be, but he went so far as to say to a friend or two, who lost no time in disseminating the information, that in the whole of his career he had never seen anything more liberal than the settlements he had drawn up for the marriage of Mr. Wayne, and this not only as concerned the bride, but her father also—and that was not all. The solicitor did not explain further, but it was understood that he referred to the will of Mr. Wayne. Certain it is, that from this time Dr. Fulham became of more importance in the town; his credit, which, as we have learnt from Mr. Ezra Crane, had not been high before, was now limitless; and his practice improved. And, as we have hinted, there was scarcely a girl in the town who did not satirise Miss Agatha, and there was not one who did not envy her.

However, as we have said, this is running a little ahead of our story; perhaps it is an advantage to do so, as it clears the way a good deal, and saves explanation.

That Mr. Wayne was thoroughly in earnest there could be no doubt, and he showed that this earnestness comprehended a great deal, for, among other things, the old-fashioned vehicle which had served him during his residence at Snowdon House was now discarded for an open carriage of a very much smarter character. To draw such a chariot as this something better than the bony horse which had hitherto done duty was required, and Agatha, who had been asked to choose the carriage, was also asked to see Mr. Dutton, the chief livery-stable keeper in Bridgeley, and bespeak a pair of ponies.

As this negotiation was of course in Mr. Wayne's name, a message was sent to that gentleman, one afternoon, to the effect that two desirable steeds were now on hand, and such interest did Mr. Wayne take in the matter, so eager was he to give pleasure to the girl—so absurdly infatuated, the critics said—that, as the doctor and Agatha had paid their daily visit to Snowdon House, and gone home, he drove into Bridgeley in order to take on this message, and to arrange for an inspection of the ponies on the following morning.

As he was leaving he said:

"I forgot to mention, doctor, when you were over to-day, that those factory-fellows are hanging about my place again. The people have taken on a lot of new hands, labourers chiefly, and of course the very scum of the earth. It was cloudy last night, as you know, but I happened to glance from my room during a gleam of moonshine, and I certainly saw a man on the wall. I am not sure that he dropped into the grounds, but I have no doubt he did."

"Where was Nero?" began Dr. Fulham; "surely he—"

"Oh, I dare say Nero would have given a good account of the fellow, if he had ventured far into the grounds," returned Mr. Wayne; "but I was sorry to see the nuisance beginning again."

No more was said about this, and Mr. Wayne departed, having arranged for an early visit on the next day from the doctor and Miss Agatha.

It so happened that on this evening Dr. Fulham was engaged until very late in his surgery. As a rule, all lights but the dull jet which burned in the red lamp over his surgery door, were extinguished pretty early; this latter light burned, of course, all night, as professional custom is.

Bridgeley, too, in spite of its size, is an early town, yet on this night, without anything serious having presented itself, the doctor was engaged until nearly midnight. His boy—his only attendant—had long since gone home, and the night being especially calm and tranquil, the doctor was tempted, when he went to close and bolt his outer surgery door, to linger there for a few minutes, enjoying the fragrance of a cigar and indulging in the meditation to which smoking is so favourable, and the doctor had now a variety of subjects to occupy his mind. Some of these have been already indicated, but there were other matters growing out of them, which were scarcely less interesting.

At last his cigar and his train of thought were each nearly exhausted, and he turned to go into the house, closing the door as he did so. As he was in the act of doing this, a step which he had previously noted as echoing along the solitary and silent street, broke into a run. The doctor paused to listen, and the next moment a man presented himself at the nearly closed door and exclaimed:

"Just in time!—that's lucky. You are Dr. Fulham, I believe, sir?"

The speaker was a rough-looking fellow, evidently of the labouring class, with a face grimed and black, as though he were used to an atmosphere of smoke, while his dress was shabby and worn, as such a man's was likely to be. But in the first glance Dr. Fulham saw upon the man's cheek stains and marks which no atmosphere of smoke could ever bestow, and saw that the coat, though old and worn, had rents and tears in it, such as age and wear alone had not given.

"Yes, I am Dr. Fulham," he replied. "Do you want me?"

"Let me come in," said the stranger, and with some exertion of force he pushed open the door.

The doctor had no desire to see another patient at that time of night, especially one so unpromising in appearance as the present applicant; yet he had not the slightest sensation of fear at the intrusion; so, as the man was actually in, he led the way to the surgery.

"Now, what is it?" he demanded. "You are one of the hands at the factory, are you not? You have met with some kind of accident, I suppose? but they are not working there so late as this."

"I'll bet any money you are a knowing card," returned the other with a grin. His language was low, and perhaps sufficiently coarse, yet there was something in his speech which at once told the doctor that this was not an ordinary illiterate "rough." "You have spotted all the facts," continued the man. "I am working at Shaletown. I have met with an accident, but not in the works, which, as you say, are closed. I have met with an accident through—through losing my way—and I—I fell into some glass frames, where I cut my hands and tore myself a good deal. Look here!"

The doctor was tolerably cool and self-possessed in such matters, as most doctors are, but he could not repress a little exclamation of horror as the man opened his hands and spread them towards him, and then untwisted a rough tie from his neck. He showed his neck and throat terribly torn and lacerated, while his hands were mangled, raw, and bleeding.

"There's more of it inside," resumed the stranger, unfastening his coat, and displaying rents in his waistcoat, corresponding to those in his coat, while ugly bloodstains, quite recent, were seen in several places.

With professional skill and delicacy of touch Fulham dressed the lacerations on hands, neck, and ribs, glancing ever and anon into the man's face. These searching looks disturbed the patient, and his cheeks reddened, as could easily be seen through the grime and the uglier smears already spoken of.

At last the operations were completed.

"Thankee," said the patient; "I do feel a little more comfortable than I did when I first came in. These will get well, I suppose?"

"Now, how about the wounds on your thighs and knees?" interrupted Fulham. "Do you not want me to dress them?"

"My thighs and knees! What is the matter with them?" returned the man.

"Why, your trousers are stained with blood worse than any part of your clothes," said the doctor; "although, luckily for you, the glass has not torn them at all."

"That—that isn't my—I mean——" the man corrected himself as he looked down at the patches, which were certainly larger and more ominous there than anywhere else. "I mean that I am not torn—cut there—at all."

He corrected himself again in this last phrase, looking sharply at the doctor in his turn as he did so.

"You are lucky, then," replied the latter; "but it was a curious accident. I should have thought that a man, stumbling into glass garden-frames, would have suffered more in his legs than anywhere else. There are some other curious features about your accident, such as are not often met with from lacerations by glass."

"I dare say not," replied the other; "it was, as you say, a curious accident; but, of course, that is my business—no offence, you know. I was going to ask you if you thought I could manage to dress these hurts myself. I don't want to come here again if I can help it."

"Perhaps you could," said the surgeon; "bathe them with warm water when this dressing comes away, and buy half a yard of adhesive plaster. Are you afraid of any further consequences?"

"No," returned the man after a slight pause; "I am not afraid of consequences in this or any other matter."

"Very well; come again if you think fit," returned the doctor. "I have not treated you in what I think the best way—are you at all anxious to know what that treatment would have been?"

"No," said the man bluntly.

"I thought not," retorted the surgeon; "then I need not detain you any longer."

The man paid the doctor his fee, and went away.

It was now very late; but the surgeon went to the outer door directly after his patient had closed it, first turning the gas in the surgery quite out, so that no ray of light should betray him, watched the man up the street, and listened to his retreating footsteps.

But the patient had perhaps his own reasons for wishing to keep the way he went a secret, and was not deficient in foresight, for, ere he had gone half-a-dozen doors, he left the pavement, and walked in the middle of the road, on the softer earth of which his feet made no sound, and where the very spare gaslight, in which the thrifty authorities of Bridgeley indulged, did not show his retreating figure.

Baffled as he was in his attempt to watch his patient, the doctor smiled in recognition of the man's superior shrewdness; and, as he finally bolted the outer door, muttered:

"I have not heard the last of this case. There will be some news afloat in the morning. He is a resolute fellow; but he must not play this game too often."

On the next morning Dr. Fulham and his daughter went over to Snowdon House early, according to appointment—an appointment they were not likely to forget or neglect. Mr. Wayre was ready, as was Ezra with the carriage, the vehicle not improving by its contrast with the brand-new smart one which was destined for the new ponies.

At the first glance, however, Fulham could see that something had occurred to annoy his host, and being by this time tolerably familiar with his temperament, he took the first opportunity to ask him at once, point-blank, what had happened.

"Something very mortifying—perhaps serious—has happened," returned Wayre. "I was just about to speak of it. You remember that I have complained of the factory men again—have told you that I had seen them on the wall?"

Fulham of course said that he remembered this; he had the communication more vividly in his mind than Wayre expected.

"We heard no particular noise last night," continued the speaker; "but a desperate struggle must have taken place in the grounds, for we found, this morning, just inside the wall, the earth trodden and disturbed, with many blood-marks on the wall itself, as if some wounded person had climbed it. There were also fragments of clothes scattered here and there."

"Nero evidently was on the watch," said Fulham, "and must nearly have caught the fish."

"Undoubtedly," returned Wayre; "but the dog is severely hurt too; he is stabbed, poor fellow, in at least a dozen places. We do not think any of the wounds will be fatal; but he is terribly cut about, especially over the head and shoulders."

"I will go and look at him," said the doctor.

"I don't think you need do so at present," continued Wayre. "Ezra is a pretty good hand at such surgery, and we have attended to the poor fellow; but it is Ezra's opinion that the dog will never again be worth anything as a sentinel. He will be cowed at the sight of a knife, at all events."

"That is awkward, under the circumstances," returned the doctor.

"Yes; we must have another dog," said Wayre, "and this time we will say nothing about it. We took the ruffians into our confidence the last time, thinking to frighten them; we will do better now. I wish the law did not forbid the use of spring-guns. I would have these grounds a network of wires. I must depend upon you again, doctor, so write to your agent as soon as possible."

Miss Fulham, who had been absent with Sukey Crake inspecting certain improvements and alterations which were in progress, here returned.

As Wayre did not wish to frighten her with any hint of a midnight fray, or to let her see the wounded Nero, he said no more upon the subject, and the party set out on their visit to Mr. Dutton's farm, where were to be seen the ponies intended for the new carriage.

The owner extolled the merits of the animals, and declared that their superiors in pace, or their equals in beauty or matching, were not to be found in the county, and there were really fair grounds for this praise. They were a beautiful pair, jet-black, docile, and graceful, so that Agatha could not restrain her outspoken admiration, for she was fond of horses, as nearly all women are, and on this occasion, at any rate, she needed not to simulate enthusiasm.

This elated the dealer, who naturally encouraged her admiration. He knew the relation in which she stood to Mr. Wayre—who, indeed, in Bridgeley was ignorant of it?—and, like an astute dealer as he was, saw that the way to please the owner of Snowdon House was to gratify the young lady. As for Wayre, he would scarcely have looked twice at the ponies had he been left to himself, but, half amused by Agatha's warmth of expression, he became half in earnest in his own criticism of the animals.

There was nothing to wonder at in Agatha's pleasure; her father had never, of late years, kept any kind of vehicle, not even a gig, while Drs. A—, B—, and C—, his nearest rivals in Bridgeley, each boasted a neat brougham. He owned but a mean-looking horse, which carried him on his rounds to the outlying farmhouses, where he had, until recently, found the bulk of his practice, but this, with other things, was to be changed in the near future. So the pride of owning the smartest carriage and the handsomest pair of ponies in Bridgeley was enough to delight Agatha, and, as she was pleased, her companions were pleased also. The doctor was, perhaps, pleased in the greatest degree, and more than he showed, for often, even while his plans seemed so successful, he had felt some misgiving at certain depressions and peculiarities of temper in his daughter.

So he was rejoiced to see her heartily pleased, while Mr. Dutton, the vendor, was in as thorough good-humour as any of them. He sold his ponies with no trouble, and at his own price, receiving Mr. Wayre's cheque on the spot. If there were any drawback to his enjoyment—and human felicity is never complete—it was to think he had not asked another twenty guineas, although, to do the worthy dealer justice, he had little to reproach himself with on that score.

The inspection finished, the bargain struck, and the cheque given, the party turned homewards, Dr. Fulham, who had some visits to pay, being dropped, by his own request, at a suburb of Bridgeley, while Agatha went on to Snowdon House with Mr. Wayre, there to partake of a luncheon which had been prepared by Sukey Crake in honour of the trip. Mrs. Crake and a young subordinate who had been recently added to the staff of Snowdon House, and who was of a somewhat smarter type than the other handmaiden, were in attendance, while Ezra held himself in readiness to take the young lady over to Bridgeley after the repast.

Agatha had never felt herself so thoroughly interested in her future husband, or so kindly disposed to him as on this day. The reader knows why her pulses beat so indifferently as regards Mr. Wayre, but on this day she was changed. It was not only from the renewed evidence of his wealth, or from the enviable display of it that she would be able to make—a consideration always dear to the feminine mind—but she was affected beyond the power of this feeling to move her.

All through their intimacy, but upon this morning especially, Mr. Wayre had shown such anxiety to gratify her, had been so evidently pleased when she was pleased, and had so striven to anticipate her every wish, that she could maintain her indifference no longer; not that she had ever shown this feeling, but at her best it had been in her heart. She brightened more than she herself knew, perhaps, under the change, and was so cheerful, that Wayre noticed it with as much wonder as gratification.

There was yet another reason for this change, of which he was the cause, but had never spoken, nor had Agatha known of it until that day.

"You must have thought me, from my silence, very ungrateful," she began, when Sukey and her assistant were out of the room; "but believe me, my dear Mr. Wayre, I did not know of your kindness until this morning."

"What kindness is that, Agatha?" returned her companion; "I have not been allowed to show you half the kindness I would fain have indulged in. You are always so reluctant to accept—"

"Oh no, not to me!" exclaimed the girl; "not to me! although I know it is on my account that you do it. I must almost blame you for your excessive generosity, while I thank you, although ever so imperfectly, for it. I speak of your munificence to my father."

"A trifle—a trifle, Agatha," returned Wayre, whose own eyes lightened with pleasure at the girl's energy and warmth. "I could afford it—I hate to use such an expression in anything in which you are concerned, or yours; for I should not pause to consider that, as I hope you will come to know. But there is really nothing in it."

"Nothing! Oh, Mr. Wayre!" said the girl, "who in the wide, wide world but yourself would have done such a thing? My father has for many years been a struggling man, unfortunate, and of late quite hopeless. For want of friends he has never been able to take such a position as would enable him to move with the successful in his profession, and now, when I know he had given up all hope of retrieving his fortunes, now your generous help removes every difficulty."

"I would have done a great deal more than this to give you half the pleasure you evidently feel," replied Wayre; "but I have taken Dr. Fulham's bond, so I am safe for the little advance I have made."

"Ah, Mr. Wayre," said Agatha with a smile, which was not very far removed from a tear, "we cannot think two thousand pounds a trifle; to us it is a sum which—besides, I am business woman enough to know what value my father's bond will possess, should the speculation fail. Should he buy this offered practice and be disappointed; should his health fail, you need not tell me then how much your bond is worth. I am more grateful to you than I ever thought I should be to any person in the world."

"Although I tell you you think too much of the business," returned Wayre, "yet I would not at this moment have your sentiment in the least diminished, and although I should have preferred the transaction remaining unknown, yet I am unfair enough to make use of the pleasure it has given you, and to ask a question which I have thought of day by day, ever since the fortunate night when I spoke to you in presence of your father."

Agatha's colour changed slightly, but not so much as it would have done on any day before.

"Everything is completed, or nearly so, at Snowdon House," he continued. "All has been done to your satisfaction, the workmen have gone, and all is now dull, quiet, and tedious to me. The house waits its mistress, and, Agatha, I should like to bring her home soon. Let me do so within the next few days."

The great crisis was passed when she had given her consent to be the wife of Mr. Wayne; after that, all other arrangements followed almost as a matter of routine; yet there was a momentary pang, and a barbed shaft of memory pierced her mind for an instant. It was gone; she was again herself, and faltered not in the conversation which followed, and which ended in her promising as early a marriage as even Mr. Wayne solicited.

In fine, the wedding was to take place within a fortnight, and as she rode home in the old chaise, so soon to be discarded, she could not help looking a thousand times, even in that short journey, at a bracelet which had been clasped on her wrist by Mr. Wayne—a bracelet the like of which she had never expected to own in her life.

The Doctor's Two Patients. A Yuletide Yarn.

CHAPTER I.

Some gave them white bread,
And some gave them brown.

CHRISTMAS DAY would be on Thursday, and this was Sunday, and St. Thomas's Day as well; a day devoted by the peasantry in many parts of the country, and more especially in the Midland counties, to a round of begging visits. With empty baskets, sacks, and pockets, lugubrious faces, and whining voices, the women and children, who would scorn to beg on any other day of the year, tramp from squire to parson, farmer and shopkeeper, ever onward in a gradual and downward scale, asking, or rather demanding, a largess—that is to say, a present in money or in kind, in honour of the saint, until they have no more face to beg of those who are nearly as poor as themselves.

The weather was seasonable and cold, the ground as yet hard and crisp with frost, but the thick white clouds above spoke plainly of the coming snow. Nature would beautify all within her reach with her pure white mantle this Yuletide.

The village folk had been their rounds in good time. They had gathered a goodly store, both in money and kind, and having deposited their various bundles in their own houses, emptied their pockets and "cleaned" themselves, they all, with one consent, disregarded the heavenly warning which, on any other day, would have been a good excuse for staying away, and went to church.

They gathered in goodly numbers, both within and without their fine old church. They were habitually good church-goers in the simple little village of Monksthorpe, but had they not been, not one of them would willingly have missed on that especial day.

Some loved their pastor; some cared nothing for him one way or the other; a few of the worst disliked him, without any very present reason in their own minds; and one hated him. Nevertheless, all came to church on St. Thomas's Day.

There were loaves given away after each service on the saint's day, Mr. Chamberlayne had given even more liberally to the St. Thomases than his means warranted, and it takes but a small matter in a country parish to bring the folk to church. An odd gift or so, judiciously distributed, will have a wonderful effect. But it was neither the dole of bread nor their clergyman's liberality that drew the Monksthorpe folk in one eager throng to church on St. Thomas's Day.

The loadstone was this: On that particular Sunday the papers setting forth the sequestration of the living of Monksthorpe would be nailed on the church doors, and the parishioners, for various reasons, prompted by their various ways of regarding the Rev. Edgar Chamberlayne, and by a general curiosity, came to see for themselves how their pastor, the old man who had lived and worked amongst them for so many years, would bear the blow.

Would he hold up his head bravely, as if to say to them: "This is no disgrace to me; it is no fault of mine. I was surety for my brother. Upon those who ruined him be the disgrace. 'He that hateth suretyship is sure';" or would he hang down his white head and shuffle past them with averted eye and faltering steps?

And his daughter, the girl of nineteen who had been born amongst them, whose mother's bones lay under the simple white headstone by the chancel-door—the sweet babe who had grown into sweeter girlhood in their midst—gentle dark-eyed Cicely? Surely this blow would fall heavily upon her also. She had been so fondly proud of her father, and had carried her head so high.

This last remark would come from those of her own sex and age—those who wore, and could afford to wear, far smarter attire than Miss Chamberlayne, but could not emulate the native grace of her beauty and simplicity.

They were all there. It was too cold to sit much, but in spite of the cold, one or two occupied the "stone to sit upon," under which "W. Fenn, a martyr to his God and king," was interred in 1653. And the porch, large as it was, was full. Several stood in the doorway, recalling the events of the past week in voices by no means modulated into harmony with the sacred building.

At length the little swing-gate above the two old mill-stone steps clicked twice. They were coming, and the sudden hush of expectation about to be fulfilled fell upon the little company.

Some went into church, and those who remained in the porch ranged themselves on either hand as their vicar and his daughter passed through a sort of gazing wall, and to their eyes there was no difference either in his manner or appearance, except, perhaps, what one half of them never noticed—a slight flush on each cheek, just below the eyes.

His tall slender form was as erect as ever, his smile and greeting as kindly as they had always found them for thirty years.

No, there was no perceptible difference. He evidently did not feel the shame, or appropriate the disgrace that these papers he was passing implied. He even lifted his dreamy blue eyes to them just once.

No, it did not affect him! But—Miss Chamberlayne? She seemed unable to meet an eye of all those around her. Her colour came and went quickly as she anxiously watched her father's face, walking by his side, and her clasped hands trembled with an agitation which she could neither control nor conceal.

"Aye, she feels it!" was the silently universal remark as the two passed into the church.

The vicar went into the vestry, his daughter to her accustomed place near the village choir, where her voice generally rose clear and sweet above the rest; but to-day it was dumb, and Mr. Leigh, the young surgeon, who lived in the village of Monksthorpe, met a pair of soft brown eyes, as she rose from her knees, that were swollen and heavy with crying.

"Poor child!" thought he, "she has a terrible weight of trouble for so young a creature—her father's long illness, their poverty, and now this painful business. Oh, that I were a rich man, Cicely, and could tell you of my love, and ask you to let me share your troubles! I hope—I think you would come to me, little darling."

His eyes lingered on her sad young face with an earnest sympathy which he could not repress. She saw the look, but her heart was sore with wounded pride, and she misunderstood it, and flushed again with the painful consciousness that her father owed Mr. Leigh a considerable sum. How could that be paid, now that their small income was reduced to a mere curate's stipend?

And yet it was not their fault—except, perhaps, that her father had too easily consented to be surety for his brother. He was always too ready to be kind to others at his own expense; but the pain was very keen, nevertheless, that burned poor Cicely's cheeks, and blinded her swimming eyes to the sorrowful sympathy that glowed so warmly in the young doctor's face.

Another pair of eyes, by no means so friendly, were watching the parson and his daughter from the Hall pew, a musty, fusty chamber, enclosed by four wooden walls, furnished with moth-eaten cloth and mouldy cushions, worm-eaten and cobwebbed.

In this pew sat a wizened little old woman, exceedingly small and thin, with a sharp hooked nose, and a pair of keen dark eyes, as restless and fiery as their mistress; a common ash-stick, as it had been cut from the hedge, lay on the seat beside her, in company with a wooden crutch.

Her dress said plainly that the wearer was either very poor or very penurious. It had once been black, but was now green with age, stained, worn, and uncleanly. The gloves, far too large for her attenuated hands, were stiff with age and grime.

There was no mistaking the evil expression of her dark, quick eyes, as they rested, quivering with eagerness and excitement, first on the clergyman, and then on his daughter, who turned uneasily away.

"We owe her nothing," said Miss Chamberlayne to herself; "why is she always so ill-natured and spiteful?"

She was more than glad when the service was over, to be able to escape from a surveillance that wounded and irritated her.

The solitary occupant of the Hall pew, after the main body of the congregation had left the church, followed them to the church porch, though her usual mode of egress was by the chancel door. She dragged one paralysed foot after her with great difficulty, as she leaned heavily on her crutch and stick, and her feeble frame, had it been governed by a less indomitable will, would have given way long before she had reached the goal she had set before her.

But "where there's a will there's a way," and Miss Hext had an invincible desire to read those papers in which the sequestration of her pastor's small benefice was made known to the world.

She scowled back the reproach contained in the eyes of the few who passed her with interest; little she cared for what they thought of her, though she knew it was something akin to this:

"A bad old creature, to come out of her way to read them papers, just to hurt parson's feelin's; that's just what she does it for. She has no feelin' for nobody, a mean old creature; never a penny nor a scrap did she give to one of us this St. Thomas's—she turned us all away empty-handed. Shame on her, to come trailin' her dead leg after her all adown the church, just to vex parson!"

She propped herself in front of the documents, nailed on either door, as best she could to avoid falling, for she was both feeble and aged, and then put on her spectacles with feverish haste. Her hands trembled so that the glasses fell on the stone floor.

She muttered something between her clenched teeth and turned angrily upon the young doctor, who stooped as he passed, and gave them into her shaking fingers.

"Oh, it's you," she said as she recognised him. "Confound the parson! What a bane the man is to me from first to last! They are done for—my last pair."

"Isn't it almost what you might consider a case of retributive justice, Miss Hext?" he asked. "When you go out of your way to feast your eyes on his sorrow. Allow me to assist you to your chair."

He offered his arm, and laid one hand gently on the crutch, but she shook it off rudely.

"Not till I have read that," she said. "What you call his 'sorrow,'" she added, pointing with one cramped finger to the paper carefully tacked on the church-door, "is joy to me. I mean to read it before I go."

"You cannot," he said; "your glasses are useless."

"I will," she retorted angrily. "I will read every word of it, if I have to pull it down to do it."

"Let not the sun go down upon your wrath," Miss Hext, said the doctor gently, as he saw the few faint beams of the setting sun fall upon them in rich colours through the stained-glass window above their heads.

"Stuff and nonsense!" she exclaimed. "I am too old to learn that now, Mr. Leigh, and you are too young to be my teacher. Time was, perhaps, when I might have learnt, with such a teacher, but, as times are, the sun will rise and set on my wrath daily till I see him punished. Read that paper to me, Mr. Leigh. Your eyes are good enough to see without spectacles."

"Not good enough—or, rather, bad enough—for that, Miss Hext. I know and respect Mr. Chamberlayne, and should be very sorry even to seem to gloat over his misfortunes."

As he spoke, the clergyman and his daughter came out of the vestry, and passed close by them as they stood in the porch together. Miss Hext glared at them through the empty framework of her spectacles. The vicar bent his head to his aged parishioner, whilst his daughter bowed distantly, and slightly coloured as she saw who was the old lady's companion.

Miss Hext did not return his courtesy, but she raised her withered face to his as he passed her.

"This is a glorious St. Thomas," she said, and laughed grimly, with a wicked look in her eyes. "You must be feeling bright, too, the day, Archibald Chamberlayne, with all your honour and glory set forth in these papers. I can't see the details, for I've broken my spectacles, but the doctor is going to read out to me the list of your charitable bequests to the poor. I've crawled all the way down the church on purpose to hear it."

Mr. Chamberlayne paused for a moment in front of her, and the patch of red on each cheek grew a little deeper; but his daughter drew him on hurriedly before he could speak.

"My father's blessing, Miss Hext," she said, as she turned from her indignantly, "is of more weight than any ill-will you can bear him. Those of his flock who love him will always have that."

"Minx!" growled the old lady, and turned to the doctor. "I hope you don't admire that proud piece, doctor," she said. "And now read me that paper, as you promised."

"I did not promise, and I shall do no such thing, Miss Hext," said he. "I will assist you to your chair, if you choose; but as to gloating over a kind and good man's misfortunes, I will not do it, and I hope you will think better of it. It is cruel to add to his suffering, which must be intense without any further aggravation. You will only take cold if you stay here any longer."

There was no help for it, and she suffered herself to be led to her dilapidated hand-chair, which an old man, almost as decrepit as herself, shivering with cold in a torn coat, stood ready to wheel.

The doctor closed the door, and hurried after the clergyman and his daughter; but no sooner had he disappeared, than Miss Hext ordered the old attendant to wheel the chair back into the porch, and made him read, as well as his chattering teeth would permit, every word of the paper from end to end.

CHAPTER II. "LET MY LAST END BE LIKE HIS."

"ARE you waking, sir?" clamoured a voice, just under the doctor's bedroom window, wheezy and hoarse from age, haste, and the bitter cold, for it was snowing steadily, and drifting too, under a keen and gusty north wind. "Are you waking, sir; t'ould deevil up at t' Hall's takken worse, and you're like to come out of your warm bed, or she'll be gettin' into a could one."

"Who's ill?" said the doctor, putting his face close to the glass, but not opening the window, for he could see the snow hanging to every ledge round it. Before the same messenger could force his frozen lips to answer, a shrill scream sent up another form of petition close beside him.

"Is that you, doctor? It's Molly White, sir. Th'ould saint down yonder at the vick'rage is just dying, I'm feared, and Miss Cicely sent me to tell you to come right a-ways. He's awful bad, sir."

Mr. Leigh opened the window slightly, brushing down a cake of snow in both their faces as he did so.

"Did you say Mr. Chamberlayne was ill, Molly?" he asked; but the first petitioner had thawed his lips by this time, and answered in her stead:

"No, sir, no. I said t'ould lady at t' Hall—Madam Hext, sir. As queer and close an ould deevil as you'd meet with in a day's rounds. She's caught could, sir, wi' stopping in th' church this afternoon, listening to me reading them papers, sir; and she's been shivering and shaking ever since like an ass-upon-a-leaf, and when I come for you she wor gone right off, and no life left in her at all—at all. She'll never last while morning, sir, and nobbut ould Deb wi' her, and she's a'most deed wi' fright. She promised to stay wi' her mistress while I come back. She was skeered; she said the deevils would be coming for madam's soul, as soon as the breath left her body, for she's an awful hard and wicked woman, she is. Never a bite nor a sup would she let Deb give the St. Thomasers. She swore like a gauger when Deb said there'd be no luck in the house for a year if she didn't give nowt. Ay, she's that mean. She says she's clemmed wi' poverty; but it's my belief she clemms herself because of meanness."

"Well, Dickon, I can't stand here any longer; go to the back, and I'll let you into the kitchen. Tell me now," he said, as the two came into the cosy little place, and simultaneously rushed to the grate, where the warmth still lingered kindly round the smouldering embers, and began to thaw their well-nigh frozen limbs; "tell me, Molly, is Mr. Chamberlayne very ill? What is amiss with him? What is he like? For I must go where I am most needed—I cannot go to both at once."

"Oh, sir, you'll be like to come to the poor old gentleman. He went to bed, sir, soon after you left, and miss, she sat and watched him till he woke and wouldn't let her sit up no longer, so she left him; but a bit sin' she came to tell me he were took queer, and sent me off for you, sir."

"Did you see him? Do you know what it is?"

"Deed, yes, sir. It's just the same as my poor old master were took wi', and never——"

"Ah, I guessed as much—paralysis, from the strain—physically and mentally overtaxed. Now, Dickon, what is the matter with your old lady?"

"Old lady, you may well say, sir, if ould lady is faymale to t'ould gentleman; for I never knowed a wuss un, and that's gospel truth, it is, sir. I telled you just now how she wur, sir—she's alive one minnit, and deed the next. She lies like a log when she's deed, and she's shivering and shakin' like a earthquake when she rouses. She's took awful bad, sir, and no doubt; and her face is grey-like, and sharp i' the nose. My missus is wi' her, sir, and that's all—but me."

"There are servants, I suppose, in that large house?"

"Servants, sir! ne'er a one, sir, but myself and Deb; and as for t' house, sir, it's as empty as an egg-shell when the chick's left it, sir. Madam have made away wi' and sold everything she could lay her hands on. It's a poor look-out for t' heir, if there is one, for theer's little else i' t' house but what's in her room."

"I think I must go to Miss Hext first, Molly," said the doctor. "You know my rule, to attend to the poorest first; but in this case, one is as poor as the other, and it seems to me that Miss Hext needs attention most."

The woman broke out into loud lamentations.

"Never, sir," she cried; "you never would go and leave the good old gentleman to die—and he as good as an angel—to go first to that wicked old creature. They do say she hoards up her money and starves herself, and all besides, to addle gold together, and counts it over on a Sunday. Eh, dear sir," she continued in a shriller tone still, as she saw the doctor filling his basket, and paying little heed to her, "she is a bad and wicked old woman. I saw her yesterday, sir, come all the way down the church, a thing she never does, sir, just to look at them papers, and vex the parson, for naught else, sure."

"Aye, sure," repeated Dickon, "she made me wheel her back, after master here left her, and read her every word, but I had her, for when I'd read her all their was on the papers, I put in a bit out of my own idee. 'The measure as you mete wi', says I, 'will be measured to you again.' The glare went out of her eyes when I said that, and she ordered me, sharp-like, to wheel her home. She was took in the night. Deb and I sleep near her, and hearing a lumbering, Deb went to see if aught was the matter, and found her welly nigh froze to death on the cold floor. She's that shabby mean, she won't allow herself a fire."

"Yes, Molly, I ought to go with Dickon. Miss Hext's life may be saved by prompt remedies, and Mr. Chamberlayne has, I fear, had a stroke of paralysis. I can only try to comfort his poor daughter—remedies are useless in such a case."

"Oh, poor Miss Cicely!" ejaculated Molly White, with her apron to her eyes; "what will she do when I go back without the doctor? 'Molly,' she says, the last thing to me, 'if anybody can save him, Mr. Leigh can, and I know he will come, although we do owe him a heavy bill.' Poor lamb—poor Miss Cicely!"

The doctor had almost left the house, but he turned at the twice repented name.

"Come along, Molly," he said, "it will not take a minute, as I pass, just to look at him—and it may be a comfort to the poor girl," he added to himself. "Run in at once, Molly, and tell Miss Cicely I am here. I must not delay a moment longer than is necessary."

In another minute he was in the sick man's chamber. The light on the table near the bed showed him that death was near at hand, and that paralysis was only his messenger, come to prepare his way and bring his warning.

Cicely was sitting on the bed, holding her father's lifeless hand in hers, trying to chafe a little warmth into it from her own. She raised a pitiful face to Mr. Leigh, as if entreating for a hopeful opinion, but the doctor shook his head gravely.

"When was he taken?" he asked, gently leading her a little apart.

"About two," she answered.

"And has been insensible ever since?"

"Oh no, he has spoken several times. Just before you came he asked had I sent for you, and hoped I had not because—because—"

"I know. Is he sensible now?"

Cicely bent her head, and they both returned to the bed.

"Dear father," said the young girl, kneeling by his side, and tenderly stroking back the thin grey locks that had fallen over her father's forehead, "Mr. Leigh is here; he will try to cure you, if you will tell him how you feel. Can you speak to him, dear?"

Mr. Chamberlayne made a great effort to speak, and after some indistinct muttering, he said slowly:

"I know I am dying, doctor; you must tell my poor child; she will not believe it. It is God's will, but to her it seems hard. How long will it be, do you think, doctor, before the end? Is it fair to ask you, for her sake, to remain here till all is over?"

Mr. Leigh leaned over the dying man.

"I would stay gladly," he said, "but I must go to Miss Hext, at the Hall. She has been taken very ill, much in the same way as yourself from what I hear, but there may be a chance of my being able to restore her, at all events for a time. I must leave you now, at once, but I will return as soon as I possibly can. I would stay now, but I think you understand."

"Yes, yes," said the old man, "it is of no use to stay here. I am very sorry to hear of my poor old parishioner's illness. You must not delay to go to her. As you know, my case is a hopeless one."

"Oh, father, how can you be sorry for her, when she has been so cruel and spiteful to you?" said Cicely, the tears in her eyes at the recollection of what her father had been made to suffer at Miss Hext's hands.

"My child," said her father, speaking with great difficulty, "I should wish to die as a Christian, as I have tried—but failed—to live, repenting all my former sins, and in charity with all men."

"Oh, father, father," cried the girl, throwing herself on the bed, and clasping him in her arms, "you must not die, you will not die, and leave me. Oh, father, try to live for my sake—father, dear father!"

She buried her face in his pillow and wept bitterly.

Mr. Leigh turned away. He was used to death in its various forms, but Cicely's sorrow touched him to the quick. It was so pitiful, and her case was so sad. In a few hours at most, she would be an orphan, alone and utterly unprovided for. He loved her, but he could not ask her to share his poverty, and he felt bitterly that every word of his must be the death-knell to all her earthly happiness, as far as her father's life was concerned.

It was with difficulty that he tore himself away from her presence, and buttoning his thick coat up to his chin, once again faced the bitter cold and snow without.

CHAPTER III. THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.

MR. LEIGH and his old and breathless companion made their way as best they could through the thickly falling snow to the Hall. It was a fine old house, but in a terrible state of dilapidation and disorder. Dickon made his way without ceremony through the icy-cold, stone-paved hall, where the large fireplace looked black and cheerless on this winter's night without a spark of fire. Mr. Leigh followed him, and they passed up the grand staircase, tramping over the bare stone steps and along the corridor above, Dickon noisily and carelessly, Mr. Leigh noisily in spite of all his care. The man threw open the door of an ante-chamber, and beckoned the doctor to follow him.

"She's sold all t' furnitur', sir," he whispered, seeing the doctor's look of amazement at the poverty-stricken house; "she's sold every stick in t' house. She says she's a pauper, and that when she dies there'll not be enough money to bury her. This is her room, sir," said the old man, opening the door of a large room very scantily furnished with the barest necessities.

"There must be a fire at once," said the doctor; the room was bitterly cold, and felt all the colder from the unmitigated squalor of its appearance; "the cold alone is enough to kill her."

"She won't have a fire, sir; you may see Deb tried to light one, but she raked it out afore she was took, and I've had no chance to light it again. Indeed, sir, I don't think there's over much coal, for she'll only have in a handful at a time, and it's three weeks sin—"

"Doctor," said a feeble voice from a wooden stretcher-bed of the meanest description, "don't listen to that old fool, but come and see if you can bring me back to life again; there's something amiss with my limbs, I can't feel my feet, and the cold seems creeping up to my heart. Can you do nothing for me?"

"We must have a light and a fire, madam," said the doctor authoritatively; "the cold in this room is intense, and this one candle will not give me a sufficient view of your face."

"Surely one light is enough for one body," querulously answered the old lady; "but there is another candle in the drawer there. Dickon knows. I sent Deb away—she would say she was cold, and I'd rather be alone than hear folk grumbling when they've everything they can desire."

Dickon was gone to get the means of lighting a fire, and the doctor, after vainly searching for "the other," determined to lose no more time, but examine his patient by the thin dip-candle he held in his hand.

He lifted it above the crouching form, which was huddled in various wraps, all more or less in keeping with her general surroundings, and betokening the most abject poverty.

The old woman's face was shrunken and grey, and the doctor, after a short inspection, put the light on the rickety table, and sat carefully down in an old armchair by the bedside. He took her hand, and felt the death-damp already upon it. She seemed to read his thoughts, and moved impatiently.

"Well," she said, and her chattering teeth made her voice almost inaudible, "can you do anything, or must I die?"

"You are very ill," said Mr. Leigh.

"I know that," she replied testily; "you needn't tell me I am ill, or that I am ill as I have never been before; I can feel that. Tell me if I must die."

"Are you afraid of death?" asked the doctor; he feared to alarm or shock her in her weak state.

"I don't want to die," she said, "though why I shouldn't I don't know. I have no one belonging to me that cares for me, and I hate all my kith and kin."

"Then you cannot expect much love in return from them," said Mr. Leigh. "Love begets love."

"And hatred, hatred," muttered the old lady. "I should like to see my revenge worked out."

"Your revenge, Miss Hext?" exclaimed the doctor, inexpressibly shocked. "Can you give your last moments to such thoughts as those?"

"My last moments?" she repeated. "Then I am dying? You think I shall not recover? But I have been a strong woman in my day—slight, but wiry and strong. My family have all had good constitutions," she said as eagerly as her strength would allow.

"I think that you are in great danger, Miss Hext. Your wilful determination to read that paper in the church yesterday has probably cost you your life."

She looked earnestly at him, but her eyes were already fast losing their powers of observation, and conscious of it, she closed them with a sigh.

"I am growing blind," she said; "is that death's doing, doctor?" she added, with a fresh effort to speak plainly and look at him. "Doctor, I have had a hard life, and a lonely one; no one to care for or love me. The only man I loved scorned me, and I have never forgiven him, and never will; I rejoiced to see his shame yesterday." She paused and Mr. Leigh did not speak; but he guessed that she meant Mr. Chamberlayne. "I have always rejoiced when I have heard of his sorrows or his shame."

"Do you ever pray, Miss Hext?" enquired the doctor abruptly, stirred out of his wonted professional calm by these bitter words; "do you ever pray?"

"Sometimes, sometimes," she murmured—hesitated, and then said with a sudden impulse: "Pray for me, man; I feel it will soon be over with me. They say that you are good and charitable to the poor—that you will go first to a poor body. I am a pauper. It was kind—it was good of you to turn out of your warm bed to visit a pauper—to try and cure me; but it is too late, too late!"

"Not too late to pray, Miss Hext. I will not try to hide the truth from you; you are, at most, within a few hours of your last moments on earth; but you cannot pray, with any hope that God will listen to your prayer, if you do not forgive as you would be forgiven. I do not know what you have against Mr. Chamberlayne, but no matter what it may be, you must forgive him, or you can hope for no forgiveness from God."

She moved impatiently from him; but she could not turn herself, and her dimmed eyes still rested on his face.

"I did not know you were a parson," she said bitterly; "I only asked you to pray for me, not to preach to me. I thought that you at least were different, or I should never—I see, I see, you are all alike. I wish—I almost wish I could undo it. Ah!" she moaned as a sudden pang darted through her, "death is stealing on me—pray for me—you, at least, Walter Leigh, should pray for me!"

"What good would it be for me to pray, when I know that you do not forgive?"

"I shall never forgive him, never—never!" she said. "It is all one to me, whether I am forgiven or not; but I shall never forgive him."

"And yet in a few hours—perhaps, in a few moments—you may stand before a Judge, whose first question will be, 'Anne Hext, why did you not forgive Archibald Chamberlayne?'"

She smiled upon an evil curl on her thin drawn lips.

"Archibald Chamberlayne! Yes, I threw my heart at you, Archie, and you scorned the gift, and gave your own to a penniless girl. I vowed I would wish you evil all the days of my life, and I have done so—and it has worked you woe, Archie—worked you woe. Your own life has been an evil one. I laughed when I heard of your young wife's early death. I laughed when I heard of her children's deaths, one after the other. It was sweet to me to know how you suffered all that time—sweet, indeed, to read the story of your shame yesterday."

"Woman," said the doctor, moved beyond his patience at her words, "do you know that you are dying? Do you know that the man you so cruelly hate is dying also? Aye, Miss Hext, dying with the words of peace and charity in his heart, forgiveness and sorrow even for you on his tongue. Think in how short a time you may be a lifeless corpse! What will become of your soul if you die with such wickedly revengeful thoughts and wishes in your heart?"

"He is dying!" she murmured, raising her head towards him. "Ah, then to the last I am revenged!" She fell back on her pillow, and Mr. Leigh saw that she had died as she ceased speaking.

CHAPTER IV.

Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring out the false, ring in the true.

THE Christmas bells were ringing merrily over the soft white snow. There was Yuletide mirth and happy laughter in most houses, great or small, in Monksthorpe. In the little vicarage, however, there was silence and sadness, and in the Hall silence without the sadness. There was the deep stillness of death in the house, but no mourning for the dead. Deb and her old husband had indeed lost the small weekly payment they had been grudgingly given by the dead old woman, but this gave them no concern. Like many of the English peasantry, though Dickon had never heard of the rule of three, he could put three and three together for his own advantage; although he had never learned practice or interest, his practice was sharp enough if it were a matter of self-interest, and Deb and he calculated by a ready-reckoner of their own that they should make a little harvest in the month's care of the house promised them by the lawyer, who came to take away the papers he seemed to know by instinct would be found under their mistress's pillow after her death.

"And wor she really as poor as she'd have us to believe, sir?" said old Dickon slyly. "Will there be owt to bury her wi' decent, d'ye think, sir?"

"Enough for that, I should think, Mr. Saunders," replied the canny lawyer, and more than that they could not get out of him.

Two funerals passed from opposite directions up the broad pathway to the west door of the church, in the great square tower which only opened to admit the dead at their last visit to the sacred edifice.

First came the coffin uncovered and bare, according to her written desire, containing the remains of Annie Hext, spinster, followed only by Mr. Roberts, the lawyer, Deborah Saunders, and her husband Richard. Not another Monksthorpian vouchsafed to show by their presence, either sympathy with the deceased old lady, or sorrow for her sudden removal from amongst them.

She had been a hard taskmaster, an unjust mistress, a friend to nobody, and a most bitter and relentless foe. Had they been asked to tell the truth, and had told it, they would have said:

"She wor a bad 'un, and we're glad she's gone. She wor hard on all, but she wor hardest on the poor."

A stranger officiated, and the old clerk threw three heavy handfuls of earth on the hollow-sounding coffin with a vicious bang.

"She flung many an angry word at me when she wor at t' Hall, and I had to call and ax for a Heaster due or a 'scription to ony charity, and now I'll have my fling at her."

Deb held a large white handkerchief to her face, with the usual hypocritical assumption that she was crying bitterly under its shelter; but her eyes in reality were eagerly scanning the lawyer's face, wondering what those papers found under the dead woman's pillow contained, and wishing she had had the sense to look for them before the lawyer had popped them into his deep blue bag. Dickon was mentally cursing his late patroness, because she had done him and his wife out of even a hat-band, not to mention the remote hope they had always cherished of a scarf and gloves, as some sort of consolation at her death for the life she had led them.

No sooner was the blessing given, and the clerk had said a hurried "Amen," than Mr. Roberts turned away from the grave and followed the clergyman into the vestry. The clerk shovelled a few spadeful of earth into the grave, then flinging his spade in after them, went to toll the bell for the second funeral.

Deb and Dickon scuttled off to the vicarage, that they might be in time to meet the procession, and show their dutiful respect to the old gentleman, whom they venerated in spite of their old mistress's antipathy to him.

They met the funeral as it was already slowly wending its way up the village street. There was no doubt of the sincere sympathy shown by those who followed the simply-covered coffin. Old men, stalwart still, but grey and hoary, carried their beloved pastor to the grave, not for greed of gain, or love of feasting, but of their own free will and choice. Slowly and reverently they bore him on their shoulders.

"He bore a many of our troubles, he did, when he wor amongst us. He wor always the best friend we had in sorrow. A kind master, a friend to us all, and only a foe to himself. He wor a good man, and we're heart-grieved he's gone."

Cicely Chamberlayne walked close behind her father's coffin. Mr. Leigh had seen her for a few moments before the little procession left the vicarage, and, not thinking her fit to undergo the trying ordeal, had begged her to remain behind. But the girl shook her head.

"I cannot," she said with a quivering lip, "I must see all I can—to the last."

She followed them up the road with clasped hands, bent head, and tottering steps, her tall slim figure passing like a dark shadow over the white snow; but when they came to the little swing-gate that she had been used to open every Sunday for her father, the recollection overcame her, and she turned faint and staggered. Mr. Leigh, who had watched her with some anxiety as he walked behind her, came forward and quietly drew her hand within his arm.

"Will you return?" he whispered, for he felt her whole frame shiver as she clung to him for support, alike from weakness, and the fact that he was the only friend she had there.

Her father's poor parishioners were all there, all eager to show their kindness and sympathy in her sorrow. But of her own class there were none, for she and her father had been too poor to go into society. The poor are soon forgotten by their wealthier neighbours if there is no reciprocity.

"Will you let me take you home again? I am sure it will be too much for you."

But she shook her head again.

"I must see the last," she answered. "I cannot let him go alone. I cannot leave him till it is all over."

But she had miscalculated her strength. Her broken rest, bitter sorrow, and utter loneliness—for even Mr. Leigh had not ventured to intrude upon her during these few first days—had told upon her more than she knew. And when the coffin was lowered into the grave, and all that remained of her one earthly relative was taken out of her sight for ever, she clasped her hands together with a low and bitter cry, and fell forward in a swoon.

Mr. Leigh, whose eyes had never left her, caught her as she fell, and with Molly White's ready help, carried her into the vestry.

"I knew it would be too much for her," he said as Molly sprinkled a little water in her face. "I wish I had utterly forbidden her coming."

"Aye, dear heart alive, sir, I don't believe as she would have taken any man's bidding or forbidding about comin' to her dad's funeral; but look'ee, sir, she's coming round; her colour's comin' back. You go and tell 'em to bring the clergyman's carriage round to take miss home in. Let me have her, sir. She'll feel more home-like, comin' round, to be on my knee. She'll be all right in a bit, never fear, sir. I'll take her home, and see that she has a cup o' tea and a bit o' somethin' to eat. It's my belief she pinches herself, lest she shouldn't have money for all."

"Don't let her do that, Molly, there's a good soul. I know you're trustworthy; take this, and get whatever she wants. I will bring the carriage. I know Mr. Morley will gladly lend it for such a purpose."

He met the clergyman returning from the completed service and proffered his request.

"Most gladly," was Mr. Morley's answer. "But you will not be required to attend Miss Chamberlayne, shall you? For Mr. Roberts asked me, after that old lady's funeral, to request you to go to the Hall as soon as you conveniently could. We can wait for the carriage to return, and I will drive you, if you like, as he also wishes for my presence as a witness."

"I don't know why he should want me," said the doctor. He would far rather have gone with Cicely to her desolate home. He knew she would feel her loss doubly, returning to the empty house weak and helpless. This stupid idea of the lawyer's would not only prevent his trying to cheer her loneliness now, but probably make him too late back from his other patients to be able to enquire after her again that evening. "I was not at all well acquainted with Miss Hext. In fact, I am thankful to say I knew very little of that unchristian old body. I attended her in her last illness, to be sure, and I had met with her before, but I knew nothing of her ways or doings until I was called in the middle of the night to attend her just before she died. I was called upon to go to poor Mr. Chamberlayne at the same time—both messengers came at the same moment."

"How do you doctors decide which patient to attend when both messengers come together?" asked Mr. Morley.

"It rarely happens," answered the doctor, "but in this case Miss Hext's messenger had really arrived on the spot first, though I heard them both together. I generally make it a rule to go to the most pressing case. If there is no choice, then, as parish doctor, to the poorest patient. In this case both were poor, but I had attended Mr. Chamberlayne during a long illness, just lately, and I knew that a stroke of paralysis would in his case be fatal. I had warned Miss Chamberlayne that her father's preternatural calmness would probably end in a reaction, and cost him his life. Of Miss Hext I knew less certainly what ailed her, and hoped by prompt measures to restore her. I don't see of what use I can be to Mr. Roberts, for I can give him no information whatever."

"He is going to read her will," remarked Mr. Morley.

"Her will!" exclaimed Mr. Leigh; "what a farce—the will of an old body who begrudged an extra dip-candle that I might look at her face, and hadn't a spark of fire in the grate, that bitter night. I understood she was a pauper. Her old attendant, Saunders, told me that she did not expect to leave money enough to bury her, but, anyhow, her will has nothing to do with me. I can see no reason for my presence."

"I don't know what circumstances she died in," said the clergyman; "I have understood that she was an evil-minded old woman, always averse to helping any good work, and a great hindrance to her poor vicar. Perhaps, however, she repented in her last moments; let us hope it was so."

"I am afraid there is little ground for any such charitable hope," said Mr. Leigh. "I was with her when she died, and to the last she remained hard and cruelly unforgiving. She certainly did express a wild sort of wish that she could undo something she had done, but it did not appear to me that the wish arose from any feeling of penitence on her part, but rather from a sense of irritation and disappointment. I am quite sure that my going will be a mere waste of time, but, if you will give me a lift so far, it will save time, and oblige me very much."

The Christmas bells were still chiming sweetly over the falling snow, as Mr. Leigh returned from the Hall.

"How sweet those Monksthorpe bells are," he said to himself, as he ploughed his way heartily through the slush and drifts. "I never heard them chime so sweetly before. What a difference it makes to a man to have a little hope before him! This morning—even this afternoon—all seemed so dark, and gloomy, and hopeless. Those two funerals seemed to change the Christmas feast into a day of mourning, and now—what a change! Poor, poor Cicely! her sorrow pierced my heart; how I longed to ask her to come and share my poverty, and let my love atone for it; to give me a husband's right to comfort and cheer her, but I dared not say what was in my heart and on my lips, because I was so poor; and now, what a day-dream of happiness life will be to me, if only she—"

He rang the vicarage hall-door bell, and Molly let him in.

"She's better, sir—better a deal—but weak like, and over-sad, sir, for such a poor young thing. Aye, heart alive, sir, life do seem a trouble to some, it do. You'll go in, sir? It'll maybe cheer her to see you. She's in the parlour, sir."

Mr. Leigh opened the door, and stood a moment irresolute on the threshold.

It was still early in the winter afternoon, and Cicely Chamberlayne stood at the window, from whence she could see the churchyard on the hill and her father's grave. She was watching the snow gradually covering the freshly-disturbed brown earth, and her tears fell like the snowflakes, thick and fast.

"The snow will soon have covered it," she said, and pointed to the churchyard beyond, "and then I shall feel that he is indeed gone from me for ever here. I shall be quite alone then."

He stooped and kissed the hand he had taken in silent greeting.

"Not quite alone, if you will let me call myself a friend. Your grief is very sacred to me, Miss Chamberlayne," he said, "and I scarcely like to speak to you now, while it is so fresh and so keen, about what must seem mere selfishness on my part; but I think I can plead a sufficient reason for asking you to sit down for a few minutes and listen to a strange tale."

She looked at him as if astonished, but she was too much taken up with her overwhelming grief even to try to understand him, and she sat down as he desired.

"Forgive me," he said, "for bringing such a question before you at such a time. You have known me a few years now, Miss Chamberlayne—long enough, I hope, to be able to trust me not to intrude on your sorrow merely for my own selfish gratification."

"You have been very kind to us," she said. "I have reason to be very grateful to you for your kindness to—"

"I want to ask you to give me something more, something better than gratitude. I want your love, dear Cicely—the sweet fresh love of your young heart. Forgive me, dear, if this pains you; only tell me you can give me what I ask, and let me have the right to comfort and cheer you under this bitter trial. Tell me you will be my wife, Cicely."

"Oh no, no," she said. "I have so often heard you say that you were too poor to marry. You are only asking me because—because you pity me. I will not make you poorer; I will not add to your troubles because I have such troubles of my own to bear."

"Believe me, Cicely, when I tell you that the dearest wish of my heart this many a day has been to call you mine. It is not pity—it is true love that makes me ask. Dear, dear Cicely, do not refuse me, unless, indeed, you cannot love me."

"I do love you, but I am sure you are doing a foolish thing to wish to marry a poor girl, who will only hamper you and drag you down still more."

"If you only love me, dearest, let all other considerations go to the winds. Forgive me for a little hypocrisy, Cicely; I wanted to be quite sure that you loved me as a poor man—for myself alone. That is the vanity of human nature, I suppose. And now listen, dear one, to the strange thing that has happened to me. When I left you this afternoon, Mr. Morley drove me to the Hall, at the request of the lawyer who acted for old Miss Hext. I was surprised that he should require my presence, but judge of my amazement when he read a will to us, by which she bequeathed the whole of her wealth to me, a perfect stranger. Her wealth, for the old woman who was supposed by everyone to be a penniless pauper was in reality only a miser, counting her gold by boxfuls. She had turned all she possessed into gold, and lived, herself, in the most abject penury."

"Miss Hext!" exclaimed Cicely, clasping her hands in amazement. "She always said she was so poor that she would never give anything away. Often and often my father has begged her to help in different ways in the parish, and she always refused; but then she always hated my dear father. She has always been cruel and spiteful to him and to me. I could never understand her hatred of my father, he was always good and kind to everybody. You heard how cruelly she spoke to him on that terrible Sunday when he was already suffering so much? Oh, it was cruel!"

"It was; and her cruelty brought its own punishment, for by staying in the church-porch to read the sequestration-papers, she caught the chill which caused her death. I was so struck the night your dear father was taken ill, with his gentle charity towards her, and equally struck with her bitter, unrelenting hatred towards him—a greater contrast could not have been."

"Miss Hext could never have wished me to benefit in any way by her means," said Cicely. "Why did she leave you her money?"

"I cannot tell. I knew very little of her, and had never done her any service. On the contrary, I was austere and harsh to her, even on her deathbed. Mr. Roberts says she made him draw up the will some time ago, leaving a space for the name, which she must have filled in herself with mine shortly before her death. She did not know how much she was giving me, Cicely dear, when she left me her money; for now I can ask you what as a poor and struggling doctor I had no right to speak of. We can afford to forgive Miss Hext, sweet Cicely—can we not, even though she did not probably mean to be as great a benefactress as she has actually been?"

"We can indeed. I think I could almost say, 'God bless her!' were it not for the recollection of her cruelty to my dear father."

The bells pealed out afresh as she ceased speaking, and Walter Leigh clasped his betrothed to his heart.

"We are so blest, darling," he said, "that to-night we can wish peace and goodwill to all men."

The Dead Rose.

A Dainty rose in a garden grew,
And opened its petals wide
To the kiss of the wind, that softly blew
In the glow of the eventide;
And the rose was happy, and softly sigh'd
A song to the wind in the eventide.
A youth and a maiden chanc'd to walk
At eve, in the garden fair;
He plucked the rose from its thorny stalk
And twined it in her hair;
And the rose was sad, and softly sigh'd
Farewell to the wind in the eventide.
The youth and the maiden went their way,
So lovingly side by side;
The wind sprang up at the close of the day,
And kissed the rose as it died.
The stars in heaven their night-watch keep,
And the wind has sobbed itself to sleep.

The Editor's Note Book.

POETS and other men of eminent literary genius who feel inclined to turn their attention to politics would do well, before taking any irretrievable step, to consider the career of M. Victor Hugo. Here is a great literary genius if ever there was one, who has gone out of his way to efface himself by the utterance of the wildest political doctrines, who has done all that in him lies to make even his great name a laughing-stock by his fulsome adulation of all that is worst in the French, and especially in the Parisian, national character, and for whose delirious socialistic theories it is at times almost impossible to account, except on the supposition that even so great a man as Hugo may have a soft spot somewhere in his brain-substance.

WHEN such a man as this great writer demands that the lives of the murderers of the Czar and that of the wretched man O'Donnell, who suffered at Newgate last week, should be spared, the spectacle is saddening. He has no arguments to bring forward, no coherent reasons to give. These men chose to set themselves up as the opponents of the constituted authorities, and, according to their apologist, ought to be accorded belligerent rights at all events—even if, as he sometimes seems to suggest, they do not absolutely deserve honours at the hands of their countrymen. It is saddening—and worse. For the frothy rubbish which, emanating from such people as Herr Most, is only likely to deceive the ignorant and the brutal, becomes, when it proceeds from the pen of Victor Hugo, a real danger to the peace and safety of all organised society.

THE Prince of Wales, who is devoting a good deal of his irrepressible energy to the advancement of the interests of the gentlemen who "run" South Kensington, is a shrewd man of business—or is advised by one, which does equally well. Knowing that the Corporation of the City of London is very desirous just now to show itself anxious to be of some service to the public, His Royal Highness has used all his influence to induce the Court of Common Council and the various Livery Companies to assist him with the oddly-named Health Exhibition which is to follow the Fisheries' show.

FROM the Prince's point of view the result has been most satisfactory, the City people having come down with much cash, and having promised all sorts of support with gratifying alacrity. Whether the speculation will yield satisfactory interest to the investors is another matter. I do not myself think that, when Municipal Reform for London becomes, as it shortly must become, a real burning question, the fact of the money of the Corporation having been freely given for a courtly show at South Kensington will weigh much in its favour.

THE managers of the Central News must be sorry that they took any notice of Judy's sarcasms, which would at most have had an ephemeral effect, and preferred to place themselves in the awkward position of having to explain to the judge, the jury, and consequently to the public, the whole system of expanding and "writing up" telegrams. It is not necessary to suppose that there was any fraudulent intention in the matter. It seems to me sufficiently unfair to newspaper readers that they should, even with the best intention on the part of the Central News, be called upon to read and to believe a message of three or four hundred words without any intimation being given them that the original telegram contained only a modest dozen.

SOME years ago Mr. John Beaumont left a sum of £12,000 in trust for the promotion of the intellectual improvement and recreation of the inhabitants of the East End of London, and certain gentlemen were appointed by the Charity Commissioners to carry out the provisions of the benevolent testator.

PROBABLY deeming the recent excitement about the condition of the London poor favourable to their object, these trustees lately organised a Mansion House meeting with a view of raising an additional sum of £50,000 to supplement Mr. Beaumont's legacy, and a great number of distinguished gentlemen attended at the summons of the Lord Mayor, apparently with the express object of showing how little they understood the possibilities and requirements of the situation.

WHAT form this intellectual improvement and education was to take nobody seemed to know. That was a detail which most of the speakers seemed to think might come by-and-by. To quote the Times leading article on the subject, "The friends of the scheme do not seem to have any very strict or pedantic ideas as to its exact limits, which will naturally be more or less shaped in accordance with experience." A kind of Alnaschar vision of an educational and recreative palace such as that imagined by Mr. Walter Besant in "All Sorts and Conditions of Men," is all that seems to have entered the minds of these well-meaning gentlemen.

I AGREE to the fullest extent with those speakers who said that the poorer working-classes of London want more rational amusements, more interesting education, than they can get at present, but the history of such things conclusively shows that grand schemes, ill thought out, and planned from the point of view, not of what the people want, but of what professional philanthropists think they ought to want, are sure to fail, even if funds are forthcoming in profusion.

AND it cannot be too distinctly insisted that such a scheme as this has, and can have, nothing whatever to do with the improvement of the housing of the lowest classes of the poor, which is the matter calling for more immediate attention. Professor Huxley's speech—quite apart from the consideration that his experience is of forty years ago, and, therefore, of but little value—was altogether beside the question. A grand Mechanics' Institute, which seems to be Sir E. Currie's idea, will not help starving matchbox-makers, or workers for slop-sellers, or such wretched unfortunates as the woman mentioned by the professor, as "about to add to her numerous family, the ordinary resting-place for whom was under the bed."

MAGNIFICENT libraries, winter gardens with good music and technical education, are admirable things, but they are not for the likes of these poor creatures, any more than are National Galleries and Health Exhibitions. Mixing up such very different objects as the providing of these good things for the decent working man's leisure with the even more serious problem of how to get rid of the sufferings of the tribes of starving semi-savages whom we have in dangerous numbers among us, can only end in a pitiable failure and in a waste of energy, which, properly directed, might move mountains.

THE members of the Clerkenwell vestry seem to be a set of light-hearted revellers who think that business and pleasure may well go hand-in-hand, and that there is no reason why the dryness of debate should not be relieved by the refreshment of drink. It appears to be their custom at present to bring whisky into the board-room, and the proceedings in consequence assume a liveliness which would be amusing if it were not disgraceful.

ACCUSATIONS of intoxication were freely exchanged the other day among the representatives of the ratepayers of Clerkenwell, and a friend of a gentleman who was said to be half drunk met the charge with this noble speech: "What of that? Lord Brougham drank twelve bottles of wine before he made his maiden speech."

THIS historical anecdote may or may not be strictly accurate, but it is not out of place to remind the teller that even if it were true, the manners of the time in which it occurred were altogether different from those which obtain among public men nowadays, and that what was quite a natural thing at that period would be looked upon as disgraceful now.

"WHAT is fame?" is a question which might very well serve as a companion to that other well-known puzzle, "What is truth?" One might have supposed that the writer of a leading article in a paper like the Observer would have been familiar with such famous artists as George Cruikshank and John Leech. But he spells the name of the former indifferently Cruikshanks and Cruickshank, while the latter figures as Leach. And it is not only the dead who are sometimes served in this scurvy manner. Mr. Hubert Herkomer, A.R.A., is a sufficiently well-known man of the time, but he is invariably spoken of in Punch as Herbert Herkömer.

It is to be hoped that the Belt Case will now for ever disappear from public life. That the trial and its ignoble revelations of artistic envy, hatred, and malice can be altogether forgotten is too much to be expected, but at least it need vex the souls of the world at large no more.

THE judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, which was delivered the other day, however, is open to some remark before it is dismissed to limbo with the other fallacies and absurdities which have encumbered the case from the beginning.

STARTING with the usual affectation of absolute ignorance of everything about the case but its legal aspect, which has become as ridiculous a mannerism with Lord Coleridge as omniscience was with Brougham, and "cocksureness" with Macaulay, his lordship proceeded to lay down the startling proposition that the character of genuine works of art is not a matter of opinion, but a matter of fact, and that a knowledge of works of art is like a knowledge of science, further illustrating this doctrine by saying that we might as well refuse to believe astronomers, when they tell us that the earth goes round the sun, as decline to agree with great artists, when they tell us that the same man did not execute two works of art.

THE double fallacy is here obvious. We believe the astronomers and mathematicians because they are all agreed, and can prove their cases in countless ways by following the teaching of the exact science of mathematics. We decline, on the other hand, to surrender our right of judgment altogether to artists, because they are notoriously not agreed, and because there is no exact science by which a work of art can be proved absolutely true or absolutely false.

THIS very case has, as everybody knows, excited the most extraordinary differences of opinion in art circles, and, again, are not experts constantly at fault and at variance with each other, not only on the absolute merit of a particular work, but on this very question of the same man having made two works of art; are there not many pictures in the famous galleries of the world as to the authorship of which experts are altogether and hopelessly at variance? When the teachers disagree, is it matter for wonder that the students refuse to accept their dicta as gospel, and assert the right of educated common-sense to have its say? Many of the quacks and dilettanti, who are more artistic than the artists themselves, will doubtless agree with Lord Coleridge. I do not think he will have a majority of the real masters on his side.

LORD COLERIDGE'S doctrine involves another difficulty. If the character of works of art is simple matter-of-fact, the question was eminently one for the decision of the jury, whose province it is to decide on questions of fact, who, in this instance, did so decide after having had the experience of more than forty days of evidence and argument to assist them in forming a judgment, and whose decision, from Lord Coleridge's own point of view, ought not to have been disturbed.

ON the whole the principal moral of the case seems to be that the sooner litigants are spared the expense and anxiety of a long trial before a jury, and the sooner cases of this sort are left to be decided by a judge, who, like Mr. Justice Denman, hesitates and finally compromises between the widely divergent opinions of the two other judges with whom he sits, the better it will be for the public—in that it will then be a very extreme case that forces anyone to go to law at all.

Cookery.

NICE PUDDINGS.

WE have been favoured by some recipes from the book of an experienced housekeeper, and as all have been well tried, we give them for the benefit of our readers.

CANARY PUDDING.

Take white sugar equal in weight to three eggs, an equal quantity of butter, flour equal in weight to two eggs, the rind of one small lemon, and three eggs; melt the butter to a liquid state, but do not allow it to oil. Stir the sugar up with this, and finely grated lemon-peel, and gradually dredge in the flour, keeping the mixture well stirred. Having whisked the eggs, add them to the other ingredients, and beat all until thoroughly blended. Put the pudding into a buttered mould or basin, and let it boil for two hours. Serve with a sweet sauce.

PARISH PUDDING.

Take a quarter of a pound of dripping, three-quarters of a pound of flour, a large teaspoonful of baking-powder, a small cupful of sugar, a teaspoonful and a half of carraway seeds, a little candied peel, one egg, and about half a pint of milk. Mix together the flour and baking-powder, in a dry state, then add the dripping, rubbing it in, afterwards the sugar, carraway seeds, and candied-peel, and lastly the eggs and milk. It may be made with milk only, or with the eggs and milk and water. Keep a tablespoonful of the sugar, and spread it over the top before placing it in the oven. The pudding must be greased. If made in a round tin it becomes a plain cake. The mixture can be varied by using sultanas, currants, or ground ginger, or the juice and rind of a small lemon, or mixed spice and a little candied-peel. For one flavoured with lemon or currants, suet can be substituted in default of dripping, but not in a cake flavoured with spice.

PARSONAGE PUDDING.

Take four eggs, also their weight in butter, sugar, and flour. Beat the butter to cream, and mix in the sugar. Beat the eggs, yolks and whites together, and add them to the butter; put in a little lemon-peel, and lastly mix in the flour. Butter some coffee-cups or little moulds, and, having filled them half-full, bake them for half an hour in a slow oven. When ready, turn out, and serve them, having added sweet sauce, with or without wine.

GINGER AND TREACLE PUDDING.

Take three-quarters of a pound of breadcrumbs, one quarter of a pound of suet, one teacupful of golden syrup, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, two teaspoonfuls of ginger, and one teaspoonful of carbonate of soda. Mix the ingredients well, and then boil them thoroughly.

MARMALADE PUDDING.

Beat six ounces of butter to cream; grate a quantity of bread equal to two French rolls; beat six eggs well, and mix the whole together with two tablespoonfuls of marmalade. Bake the pudding in a moderate oven.

QUEEN OF PUDDINGS.

Mix one pint of grated breadcrumbs, one quart of milk, one cup of sugar, a piece of butter about the size of an egg, the yolks of four eggs well beaten up, the grated rind of a lemon, and bake them until well done. When cold spread a layer of preserves over the top, and cover it with a meringue made of the whites of eggs.

SNOW RICE CREAM.

Put into a stewpan four ounces of ground-rice, two ounces of sugar, a few drops of essence of almonds, and two ounces of butter. Add to these a quart of milk, and boil it for fifteen or twenty minutes until it forms a smooth substance, but not too thick; then pour it into a mould previously oiled, and when cold serve it up.

SUET DUMPLINGS.

Mix six ounces of suet, six ounces of flour, two ounces of bread, one teaspoonful of salt, and six tablespoonfuls of milk.

APPLE JELLY.

Wash some apples, and cut them into slices, leaving the peel on; use as much water as will just cover them, and let them boil until reduced to a pulp. Strain them, and to every quart of liquor allow a pound and a half of lump-sugar, and boil the whole for an hour and a half, rather briskly. A few minutes before taking it off the fire, add the grated rind of a lemon, or two or three cloves, according to taste. Place it in jars.

APPLE MOULD.

To every pound of pulp add half a pound of sugar—three-quarters of a pound of sugar if intended to be kept all the winter—and half a teaspoonful of minced lemon-peel or green ginger, according to taste. Peel, core, and boil the apples in just sufficient water to prevent their burning. Beat them to a pulp, and allow the above proportion of lump-sugar to every pound of pulp. Dip the lumps in water, place them in a saucepan, and boil them to a thick syrup. Add this to the apple-pulp together with the lemon-peel, etc. Stir it over a quick fire until the apples cease to stick to the bottom of the pan, and then pour it into moulds that have been dipped in water. When turned out of the moulds, stick over almonds and strips of citron, and pour around cream or custard.

THE DUKE'S CUSTARD.

Strain off thoroughly the juice from as many fine brandied Morella cherries as will cover thickly the bottom of a dish, and then roll them in dry castor-sugar. Having arranged the cherries in a dish, pour over them from a pint to a pint and a half of rich cold custard, and garnish the edge with macaroons, or, if it be preferred, pile upon the custard some rose-coloured whipped cream, highly flavoured with brandy or liqueur.

Wild Animals in Ceylon.

BESIDES the elephant, of which already some account has been given, the buffalo, the bear, the panther, and the alligator, are found in Ceylon in great numbers. Buffaloes are very formidable customers. They charge with great fury, and it is not easy to get a good shot when they are coming at one with their hard heads, from which a ball is apt to glance. The best way to shoot a buffalo, when there are two sportsmen, is for the two to keep a hundred yards apart. One only should fire at first. If the buffalo does not drop he will probably charge the man who fired, and thereby give the other sportsman a good chance of a flank shot.

The natives catch the wild buffaloes and tame them. At certain seasons they are employed in ploughing the paddy-fields; at other times they are allowed to roam about, when they often rejoin the wild herds. A half-tamed buffalo, though he yields a sullen obedience to his master, will often prove very dangerous to a stranger; in fact, almost more so than a wild one. I was travelling one day on the sea-road between Trincomalee and Jaffna. I was riding a small pony, and was charged by a buffalo in crossing a plain. Being unarmed, and as he came at me with a will, I had no alternative but to dash on as fast as I could, my assailant charging from one side; but with a tired pony escape was not easy, and I was getting the worst of it, when, to my great satisfaction and amusement, my friend went head over heels into a mud-hole which lay between us. This cooled his ardour, and he gave up the pursuit.

In one portion of the northern province, wild buffaloes were always to be seen. One of them was exceedingly fierce, and killed several persons. The magistrate went to the spot, and in his capacity of coroner held an inquest. He had just concluded, when the buffalo emerged from the neighbouring forest, and charged down upon his party. Fortunately the magistrate had with him a single-barrelled rifle. He dropped on one knee, waited until the buffalo was close on him, and fired. The ball took effect in the buffalo's forehead, and ran far into his body, and the brute dropped dead.

Bears often attack people, and are seemingly the aggressors; but in all probability it is the fear of being injured themselves that induces them to attack man. A friend of mine once had a terrific tussle with a bear he had wounded with shot. The animal closed with him, and he had to fight the bear with his knife, giving and receiving terrible wounds. At length my friend got away, and crawled for some distance till he obtained assistance. But he will carry to his grave the marks of his enemy's teeth and claws. The following story was related to me by the gentleman who met with the adventure. He had a pony which was very much attached to him, and very gentle with him, but which would allow no one else to mount him. He was given to flying at and biting strangers, a quality which on one occasion turned to his owner's very great advantage. He was on the march through the jungle, his coolies and servants following with his baggage, guns, etc., and he walking with his pony's bridle on his arm. It would appear that a bear was just then regaling himself in the pathway by an ant-hill, which concealed his interesting figure from the traveller's view until close upon him. Suddenly the gentleman felt himself thrown down on the face, with the bear on his back, pawing and scratching him. Knowing that there were four loaded guns in the hands of his attendants, he called out to them to fire, and at the same time struck backwards at the bear with a stick which lay within his reach. No one fired, however, and he did not know what to do, when suddenly he heard a scrimmage; next moment the weight was removed from his shoulders, and on looking back he saw the bear in full flight, and the pony after him with his ears set back. He got up and shook himself, and saw his guns lying on the ground, but his attendants had all disappeared. He was about to retrace his steps, when he heard several voices crying, "Here we are!" and on looking up he saw his people perched high in the trees. They told him that the pony had sprung at the bear with such fury that he had taken to his heels in the manner described, so that there may be some good even in a biting and kicking pony.

The panther, a formidable animal, is occasionally seen even on the outskirts of Colombo, the capital of the island. A very large one was once observed swimming across the Kalany Gunga, and shot.

Once, while a strongly-built Singhalese man was bathing in the same river, a panther sprang into the water and seized him by the right arm. The man, who was, of course, unarmed, grasped his assailant by the throat, and a companion, running up with a knife, dealt the brute such a blow that he quitted his hold of the man's arm, but again seized him by the thigh. The man who had the knife then cut the panther across the throat, and rescued his companion, an act of daring for which he ought to have received a medal. The wounded man was conveyed to the hospital, where he lay for a long time dangerously ill.

Alligators swarm in Ceylon, and fatal accidents occasionally occur. One of these monsters, who used to be constantly on the watch for bathers, had killed two persons before he was at last fortunately shot. The particulars of the manner in which he killed the two men are as follows. A gentleman in the public service was bathing within an enclosure. A Singhalese gentleman of rank was also bathing just without the enclosure, a native attendant filling a vessel with water and handing it to him. Suddenly the man who had been handing the water was gone, and the two bathers saw him with half his body in the river, at some distance, throwing up his arms, and apparently articulating something. All at once he sank. They imagined at first that he had been carried away by the current, but, subsequently, his body was found in a mutilated state. Shortly after this event, seven pilgrims were standing knee-deep in the same river. The alligator passed six of them, seized the last, and dragged him away from his companions.

At Batticaloa a girl was bathing on her bridal morning, when an alligator seized and carried her off. The brute was shot shortly after, and in him were found several parts of the girl, and her bangles, or arm-rings.

Sharks are occasionally caught with the remains of human beings in their insides. On one occasion, one was exposed for sale in the bazaar at Colombo, in which was found a white hand. A soldier had been buried at sea the previous day, and it was believed it had belonged to him. A pretty little discussion once arose between two Singhalese men, the one the buyer, the other the seller, of a shark, the price paid for it having been about one pound ten shillings. When the purchaser was cutting it up for sale, he found inside the stomach the leg of a man. Thereupon the people declined buying any of the pieces, and the shark remained on the man's hands. So he demanded that the seller should refund the one pound ten shillings. "No, no," said he; "had you found in the fish a bag full of money, you would have claimed it as your own, and given me none." The bystanders gave their verdict against the purchaser, and he had to make the best of his bargain.

Fashions.

WINTER toilettes being now decided upon, and those dresses and mantles already provided which are to do duty until the time of singing-birds comes round again, it is the pleasant duty of the chronicler to look around and do the critic's rather than the counsellor's office. It is so much easier to make observations upon and find fault with one's friends' dresses than to suggest substitutes equally suitable, and looking as well for the same money.

MID-WINTER offers no new colour for criticism. In the nature of things there is nothing more in textile novelties to bring out for morning wear; for evening the milliner is turning over her stores, and grouping colours, shades, and tones, as skilfully as possible. Buttercup and canary yellows were never before seen in conjunction, but it is wonderful when a dress is made of the two colours, and the very exact flower requisite thrown upon it, how the eye is reconciled to the mixture.

GREYS still reign, but they are very sober colours for the evening, and very dowager-like. In spring we shall have them for walking-dresses. Just now they are more for carriages than for promenading. The favourite is London-smoke, a sort of black-grey, like a heavy smoke rolling up from the depths of some huge chimney. Very unlike London-smoke is moonlight-colour, but a grey, nevertheless. Bessemer is a dark steel-grey, and mouse-grey bears no resemblance to any of the other shades. Silver-sand is very delicate, and very soft, but utterly ineffective unless blended with darker shades, as in grouping plumes of feathers, light being clustered with dark.

BLUES have a certain affinity to greys, and admit of quite as many varieties of shades. Suez is a very pale blue, the lightest tints in which it is possible to recognise a colour. Next to it comes Ismaila, a shade darker, the well-known sky-blue. Lesseps is deeper still, and so on until the corn-flower is soon reached. What are called "false blues," from having a slight infusion of another colour, as green is in turquoise, are quite as much favourites as the orthodox blues. Of these are Danube, sapphire, gens d'arme, gros bleu, and marine-blue, not omitting peacock-blue, and electric-blue, which are rather declining in public estimation.

ALL shades of red are to be seen in millinery, and the names given are not altogether descriptive, as they change from season to season, and are bestowed by the manufacturers with little regard to the uninstructed section of their purchasers. Ibis, pomegranate, poppy, geranium, fuchsia, copper, terra-cotta, grenat, and many others, all go to the fitting out of a milliner's show-room, or a fashionable shop-window.

WE have had no such boon for many years as the vests which are de rigueur as part of every dress-bodice, both for morning and evening wear. If the dress be a new one, the vest stamps it as modern; if it be one which has seen better days, the vest renews its youth. The varieties of modes in which vests are made afford great scope for invention, and prove the great value, artistically and economically, of the present fashion. Suppose that a dress has become shabby at the button-holes—an experience probable when a slight material has been used—the weakness can be concealed in one of three ways. First, to lay on fronts, vest fashion, flat, and cover the joining to the other material with a row of braid, some passementerie, or a lace frill. At the button-holes the old stitching must be carefully picked out, button-holes cut in the vest materials, and the old and new button-stitched together. Secondly, the vest may be made full, gathered at the throat, again at the waist, drawing it in at the latter place very narrow, and finishing with a bow of ribbon. The old buttons and button-holes will still do duty, but the fulness on the two sides being brought to meet, the fastening is concealed under the folds. The third method is more ambitious, and requires more skill in execution, but it rewards the labour bestowed. The fronts must be entirely cut away, rounding off the two sides to form a short jacket, in the style formerly called "Zouave." But this older mode hung loose, and was not attached to the vest, while the newer must be buttoned down with rows of small buttons upon an inner vest. The advantage of this make is the possibility of having two vests, one for morning, of one of the materials used in the dress itself, and one for evening of pale satin, gauze, piece lace, or some bright textile like gold brocade, or an embroidered front is possible, if a lady be industrious enough to work one. Evening bodices which are intended to be open, either square, heart-shaped, or pointed, have the vest specially designed to meet this intention. The flat vest commences at the bottom of the square; the upper part is full, like a habit-shirt, removable at pleasure. A pretty addition to the vest is to treat it like a stomacher, lacing across with thick silk cord, and tied at the waist in loops, the ends being finished with silver or gilt tags.

THE tags are in character with the prevailing taste in trimmings, buttons, etc., which are pendent. The gimp ornaments which are on the backs of mantles have little balls depending, of silk with beads, or fluffy, of chenille. Cords with tassels loop up polonaises, and these tassels have infinite variety in their finish, no longer merely of twisted silk. Fringes are of the same depending nature, very thick and rich, and very costly. A few months ago a lady was perfectly satisfied to have caterpillar fringe; now she is inconsolable if she cannot go so far as leeches, which are big, black, and curly, and make a great display upon a mantle. Fortunately a dress bears but one row of leeches, or caterpillars, across the front of the polonaise, for the cost is very severe.

IF a dress bodice be hopelessly shabby, button-holes burst, and sleeves literally out at elbows, nothing can be done but to discard it altogether, for the days of sleeves different from the bodice are past and gone, and unless in piece lace for evening wear cannot be tolerated. The stockingette bodice comes in to fill the void left by the superannuated one. Unless the dress be of some very peculiar, very unusual colour, stockingette can be had to match. So pretty are some of these bodices, made with simulated vests trimmed with rows of gilt braid, or mosaic-coloured cords, that few ladies murmur at the necessity which drives them to buy a tasteful bodice ready made of stockingette, one which clings to the figure without a wrinkle.

LONG polonaises seem to be most in favour, and are more suitable for winter textiles than the short paniers which make better when of silk or satin. The newest polonaises fasten diagonally, being drawn up at either right or left side with a buckle. The skirts still continue to be box-pleated, and where only six or eight quills are used for the whole skirt, they are of such breadth as to require broad braid or velvet laid on the centre of each.

MARABOUT trimming in both dark and light colours became so popular that a way opened for introducing bordering on similar lines, but less perishable under exposure to damp. Of this nature is astrachan fur, which is used on morning-dresses. Less expensive are imitations in wool, silk, and mohair. About ten years ago a species of astrachan trimming was worn, the name rather than the reality, but it became very common, and deteriorated in quality rapidly. The present astrachan is lighter, more curly, more closely resembling the real fur, and is made in a great variety of colours for evening dresses. All these broad trimmings require to be used with discretion, not to break the lines of the figure or to give undue breadth to the shoulders. Only sylphs, and they do not abound in the British Islands, can afford to wear little circular capes to their dresses which are trimmed with broad bands of fur, crossing back and chest, and widening the figure at the wrong places. Somewhat of the same objection has been made to the circular fur capes, but they have become so much larger, reaching below the waist, and shaped to the figure, as well as having high-set shoulders, that the reproach that they are unbecoming has been quite taken away.

WHEN circular cloaks, fur-lined, came into fashion, they were lauded as the most comfortable idea that had been known for many years, and likely to prolong the lives of the wearers into the twentieth century. Further experience modified this view very considerably, for the difficulty of keeping the cloak closed over the chest, the embarrassment of trying to manage an umbrella with the arms in prison, and, to crown all, the weight upon the shoulders of so heavy a wrap, all tended to check the original enthusiasm.

FROM the circulars, however, were evolved large dolmans with fur linings, the sleeves being cut as part of the back, and these are warm, comfortable, and elegant, closing over the chest, and completely covering the dress-skirt. Long paletots and dolmans have one advantage over the fur-capes in making it possible to wear a second-best dress underneath, which is quite impossible when the arms, basque, and skirt are exposed to view.

VERY pretty bonnets can be made by ingenious ladies of chenille scarfs, such as are to be seen in every draper's shop. Buy a bonnet-frame and cover it with satin; early experiments are more successful when the satin is stretched tightly upon the shape. Choose a chenille scarf with very close meshes, and cover the shape with it. When experience has given courage, the foundation may be puffed by running threads to form diamonds, and bringing one out through each interstice of the scarf. To form the front, folds of velvet are most suitable, and a wing, bird, or flower may be added at discretion. For strings, piece velvet, cross-cut, is very much worn. Cut a short string and hem the edge. It should be just long enough to meet the opposite string, upon which a large bow is sewed, also of cross-cut velvet. The bow should be merely two loops and a cross-piece, but these loops should be liberal wings, fitting neatly under the chin, and they are exceedingly snug and comfortable.

LADIES with pet tabby cats are up in arms at the last novelty in little hats, the Chapeau Minette. A whole cat is required for each chapeau, the body being stretched on a frame to form the head part, and the little cat's head nestling in front as ornament. Nor is it every cat that will answer for the purpose, for beauty and youth are indispensable, old tabbies being at a discount. White cats are particularly valuable to make the Chapeau Minette, so owners must be vigilant in guarding their favourites. This is no more than another aspect of the bird-hat, pheasants having been for a year or two used to cover hat-shapes, and even the peacock was pressed into service for the same purpose.

LACE fichus are so useful in transforming a morning-dress into one for demi-toilette, that new shapes are invented every day, all more or less improvements on those already in the shops. The term plastron is applied to any lace ornament worn outside the bodice which is independent and added when the dress has been put on. This would not be a strict interpretation of the word, but is its conventional meaning.

WITH black dresses and those of the more brilliant reds—ruby, grenat, cardinal, etc., white quillings are less worn round the throat than black lace, the latter being very lavishly frilled round the neck of the dress. As if to compensate for this banishment of white tuckers, white lace is worn profusely in front, quilled, en coquille, or in a plastron; handsome lace handkerchiefs are worn looped up as breast-knots, sometimes tucked in by the centre, and the corners displayed, or sewed into a pretty easy bow.

ONE last word for prospective brides. At several very fashionable weddings lately the bride's wreath and flowers upon her dress had the deadness of the orange-blossoms relieved by the introduction of a few little oranges, their deep golden colour relieving the mass of green and white which is rarely becoming.

The Cold in Manitoba.

THE highest piece of buncombe ever perpetrated upon a long-suffering community is the oft-repeated tale that "you don't feel the cold in Manitoba." Of course you don't. When you see men shuffling along Main Street as fast as they can shuffle; their fur caps pulled down over their eyes and ears; their faces covered with mufflers; their bodies wrapped up in heavy furs; warm moccasins on their feet, fur gloves on their hands, and, for all that, with a huge hump on their backs, you are not to suppose they go about like that because they feel the cold. Not a bit of it. It's the wonderful enthusiasm produced by the ozone in the air of Manitoba which makes the people just a trifle eccentric. When you see a man leaning up against a fence or the side of a house to thaw out, he isn't cold. It's nothing but that confounded ozone in the air stirring up his enthusiasm again. No one ever feels the cold here; the atmosphere is so dry, so bracing, so exhilarating, so utterly too-too in its vigour, that people merely light stoves and burn coals out of pure compassion for the coal-dealers, who have got to live just like others. When the mercury goes below 40 degrees below zero, as it did last night, it isn't cold. It's only jus beginning to feel warm then, and all this talk about frozen ears and noses, blistered fingers and hands, is only indulged in by spiteful people, jealous of the ozone in our atmosphere. You don't feel the cold in Manitoba. Never lose sight of that one solid fact. When some poor fellow gets frozen to death on the prairie, rest assured that he never felt it, but just laid down out of pure spite and died. When you are told over fifty times a day on the street, by passing friends and acquaintances, that "it's a stinger," you must remember that they are referring to some bygone event, which happened before you were born, and mean no reference whatever to the wonderful ozone of Manitoba. Last night was the warmest experienced in Winnipeg for a century. The fact that the mercury froze in many thermometers, was nothing but the mean, wretched spite which affects even thermometers. They knew it was a warm, pleasant night; but the ozone affected even their enthusiasm, and they had to do something eccentric. We haven't had a cold day this winter yet. Nothing but ozone and enthusiasm.—Winnipeg Times.

How to Sing a Ballad.

To hear some people talk, one would think that singing a ballad was the easiest thing in the world. Now the musical student knows better than this; he knows that in every art there is nothing so hard as simplicity; that the slow legato melody, the unbroken succession of continuous sound, is a greater test of the powers of the piano-player than the most brilliant shakes and runs, and that the perfect singing of a ballad demands all the art that a finished singer possesses.

It is probable, in spite of the advance in musical taste, that the ballad form will always retain its popularity. The ballad in music answers to the novel in literature; and people like something with a story in it. Just a few verses, a tale of a village maid whose lover has deserted her, or of a lad who was drowned at sea—even less, a mere hint of a story, a youth pacing outside a window, and watching a glimmering light high up; a girl going by with flowers, and dropping a rose behind her. All these things form a picture, give an idea to the listener's mind, and even if he does not fully understand the music, he likes the interest of the story. Think what a little time the singer has to make her effect in. Two verses—three at the utmost—a few minutes only of actual time, and within these limits she has to present to you, perhaps, a whole life-story, with the joy, and the love, and the sorrow of it, and to paint you a village scene, or the long low line of the far-off tide.

THERE is a ballad of Franz's that has only one verse to it. There are just eight lines of simple melody; the notes are quite simple, the voice takes no high flights. It is the tale of a village maid, whose lover is dead; she is young and very charming, and they ask her to join in the dance and forget. She tells them that she has been putting roses on her lover's grave, and simply says: "I dance no more." Is it the words, which are Heine's, or is it the music, that speaks to us so strongly and so touchingly, showing us in that brief instant as surely as a dark scene is made plain to us by a lightning flash, that here is a sorrow beyond consolation, that the maid may live a long lifetime, but that vulgar joys and pleasures are not for her? She will always be faithful to his memory; she may live, but her heart is broken.

THE singer who has to convey all this to you must indeed be a perfect artist, there must be no exaggeration, nothing forced; Hamlet's advice to the players is most perfectly applicable to singing—not to tear a passion to tatters, or to overdo an effect. But the proper expression of every word and note must be studied if the singer strives to bring out all the beauty and the meaning that are there.

SINGING a ballad is somewhat like playing light music. You only do it well when you can do other things better. The player who only plays dance-music ruins his style, and does not even play dance-music well. But the pianist who studies great classical works can occasionally condescend to play light music, and gives it a charm and a brilliancy like that of a paste diamond in a glorious setting. Just so the successful ballad-singer has never confined herself to ballads; she may adopt them as her style, and never sing anything else in company, but many are the solfeggi and many the long scenas that she has been through to gain facility first.

To do you real good, there is nothing like learning a work. Take all the soprano (or contralto) solos from some oratorio, or all the page's songs out of the same opera. Supposing you have a good soprano, for example, learn the songs of Marguerite in "Faust," recitatives and all; your singing acquires by this means a seriousness and breadth that it would never gain by only singing ballads. Studies and solfeggi must be liberally studied, and it is a good thing to sing the names of the notes so as to feel exactly where you are. Mere arpeggios are best to be sung with the vowel "a," but regular studies like Concone's are meant to be sung with Do, Re, etc., all through. Concone's studies are remarkably good ones, and should always be sung with expression. It is excellent practice to give expression to music when there are no words to help you. You ought to be able to express every emotion in life, although you are only singing, Do, Re, and Fa.

PURE legato style is the greatest requirement for singing a ballad. The notes of a phrase should be as unbroken as a string of fine pearls, every one touching the other, yet every one distinct. A melody should be as perfectly given out as if there were no words to interrupt it—as if the bow of the violin or 'cello were rendering it instead of the human voice. It is evident, then, that the greatest care should be taken to get the voice equal, to practise going from one semi-tone to another, and to learn to sing every interval with ease. The student should never stop till she is able to sing a smooth passage perfectly, for this is the crowning beauty of all ballad-singing.

THERE is another matter to speak of, which some singers seem to consider very unimportant—we mean the words. The very greatest care ought to be taken over their enunciation, the greatest pains that every one of them reaches the listener's ears. How can you expect to touch him when he does not know what you are singing about? How can you expect to interest him when he does not hear half you say? You may be very much worked up and agitated yourself, but you can't expect him to follow you if your imperfect pronunciation leaves him in ignorance whether it is a ship or a sheep that is gone out to sea.

GOOD elocution is half the battle, and it will be a great gain for you if you will take some lessons in it. It is an interesting study, and brings all manner of pleasure along with it, and its impress will never pass away from your singing. Learning long passages of Shakespeare by heart cannot but improve you in every way, and whilst you are studying which word to throw the accent on, you often gain new light on the sense of a passage.

A GREAT deal may be learnt by studying those public singers who conspicuously succeed in this branch of art. Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Marian McKenzie, are very good models to go by—people who render every note with care, and whose words can be heard to the remotest part of a concert-room. Notice any good singer singing "Robin Adair," for example, and see how perfectly she will do the "flicks." They will not be like two untidy quavers of almost equal length. She will not leave you in pleasing uncertainty as to which note the accent will fall on. No; every time the intonation will be exactly the same; some will be soft and some will be loud, but all as perfect as if they were turned out of a machine. Then, when the singer pauses on the last one of all, she gets an effect—you know that she has done it on purpose, and not by accident—that she has been steadily aiming at this end from the commencement, and reserving herself all through.

THE power of reserve has a great deal to do with good ballad-singing; no rendering can be broad without it. Certain points must be passed over, for the sake of some particular phrase at a certain part which it is necessary to make much of, and as for which point to pass over, and which to insist upon, only a very good singer can tell you that, or very long experience can enable you to discover it.

The Moth that Wouldn't Die.

THAT all creatures cling to existence however wretched, and that no one knows what he can do without until he has tried, are platitudes only too often heard, but a striking proof may be found in a sphinx-moth, which a doctor, an enthusiastic naturalist, captured off the coast of Brazil, and to which he proceeded to offer, by means of various deadly poisons, the happy dispatch. The moth cheerfully imbibed the poisons, but resolutely refused to die. Even having his thorax crushed in did not subdue his spirit. To effect this required long incarceration in a bottle filled with the fumes of chloroform. When finally he appeared to have succumbed, the operator drew him forth, opened his large fleshy body, removed the contents, which he replaced with cotton-wool, sewed him up again, and laid him on one side. But no sooner did the specimen thus prepared find himself free, than he began to kick and plunge in the most violent manner, and on being set up again on his legs, he conducted himself with as much liveliness as though he found a wadding interior quite as comfortable as his former more complicated organs. That a savage should be able to dispense with the superfluities of civilisation is nothing compared to a moth who can dispense with the necessities of a stomach. How the doctor ultimately triumphed is not recorded.

Household Gardening.

THE PAST.

DURING the year that is now closing gardening has been conducted under more favourable auspices than in the season that preceded it. The winter of 1882 was comparatively mild, and the losses by frost were few. A pleasant spring followed, and this in turn was succeeded by an enjoyable summer—not so hot as to be intolerable, yet not cold, boisterous, and wet, except during the month of July, which was not of a tropical character. The summer was succeeded by a remarkably fine autumn, which prolonged the growth and attractiveness of flowers, and, what is not less important, ripened the wood of fruit-trees, a most essential matter in conducting to their productiveness.

Vegetables throughout the year have been abundant and good, while horticultural exhibitions have never been so numerous before, nor attended by such a number of visitors. The most valuable and important of hardy fruits, Apples, have, for the first time for a period of six years, been plentiful, and this wholesome and nutritious fruit has been sufficient not only for home consumption, but there has been a surplus for export purposes. Other large fruits have been less abundant, but the smaller fruits, Strawberries, Raspberries, Gooseberries, and Currants, have given a satisfactory return to the cultivator, while consumers have been able to obtain supplies at reasonable prices.

This very brief review of the year is thus not on the whole unfavourable; indeed, the season throughout has proved better, more cheerful, and more profitable than any of the past five years.

THE PRESENT.

Since the past season, broadly and generally speaking, has, as regards gardening, been the reverse of unfavourable, individual cultivators ought now to be in a better position than they were at the commencement of 1883. It will be well for all of them, large and small, to take stock of their possessions in rooms, greenhouses, orchards, and gardens. It is not to be expected that every one will have succeeded with everything in the measure he would desire. If this were so there would be no incitement to further endeavour. Even the most successful always find something that fails to satisfy them entirely, and hence have an ever-present stimulus to further effort. The truth is that the most skilled cultivators cannot command success in every matter they take in hand, and every crop they cultivate, for the simple, yet sufficient, reason that they cannot control the weather. Notwithstanding this, none need fail wholly if they assiduously endeavour to turn to account information that may be at their disposal.

A most important element of success is for amateur gardeners to carefully estimate their means and resources. Many failures occur by attempting too much, and endeavouring to accomplish that which is practically impossible. The natural adaptability of certain plants and crops to a garden should always, if possible, be determined, and then, by acting accordingly, it is surprising how much may be done, and how comparatively few will be the failures in each particular case.

Every garden should be in better condition at the present time than it was at the corresponding date of last year, and the floral contents of every greenhouse and window be in a more satisfactory state. That this is so in many cases we are well aware; in this there is ground for encouragement, and thousands of homes are made pleasant and cheerful by the clean, healthy, thrifty condition of the floral pets of the owners. Where the improvement indicated is not manifest, then it is clear that further effort must be made, and there is no better time for entering on a better and improved system of culture than in the early days of the opening year.

THE FUTURE.

However disappointing the past may have been, or however satisfactory may be the present, there is yet room for improvement, for if one thing is more certain than another, it is this—that nothing in which we may be engaged is absolutely perfect. It is at perfection that all should aim, even if the object be unattainable, as the attempt that is made may result in excellence, and that is always worth striving for.

FLOWERS.

Taste in flowers is ever changing. At one period double flowers and quiet colours are in the ascendant; at another time single flowers with high colours find most favour. The latter, of late, have commanded the most attention, and Sunflowers, once despised, have become fashionable, while single Dahlias have for a time quite eclipsed the doubles in popularity, and even single Roses have found a host of admirers.

For general decorative purposes single flowers will be esteemed during the coming year. The gaudy Sunflower will possibly not maintain its position, yet will be grown largely; but the clear yellow Corn Marigold, the white Ox-eye Daisy, the blush and golden Marguerites, the bright star-like Pyrethrums, and the azure Blue-bottle, will be in constant demand; and fortunately they may be grown by everybody who may have a plot of ground in town or country.

Why should single flowers be such favourites? is a question that many ask. It is not always easy to give a reason for the fashions that predominate; but an answer to the question under notice is not difficult to find.

Single flowers can be more artistically arranged in vases and bouquets than is possible with the more massive double forms. These latter, as a rule, when grouped together are heavy, not to say "lumpy," while the former have a free, chaste, elegant appearance. A bunch of Dahlias, Chrysanthemums, Carnations, or even Roses does not display the flowers to advantage. Their beauty consists in their individuality; but a handful of Lilies, Primroses, or Violets is always admired. Still double flowers—those marvellous examples of the florist's skill—can never be ignored, and there will be an increase rather than otherwise in their growth during the present year.

Ferns are always fashionable. They are permanent favourites, and are fortunately so numerous that there are varieties that will luxuriate under almost all conditions, from the Lastras (Lady Ferns) and Scolopendriums (Hart's Tongues) in a London area, to the transparently charming and superlatively elegant Filmy Ferns under a glass shade in the tropical house or warm conservatory. For sunless greenhouses and shady windows there are also kinds in abundance that will flourish in the most enjoyable manner. Thus those who cannot have flowers may have the cheerful refreshing green which the graceful fronds of these lovely plants always afford.

FRUITS.

More attention is being given to the culture of hardy fruits, and never before have so many trees been planted as during the present season. In the aggregate the increase of land under fruit culture will amount to some ten thousand acres, but the most noticeable fact is the marked increase of small cultivators, those who plant their half-dozen or dozen Apple, Pear, and Plum trees, with smaller bush fruits in proportion, in their little home enclosures.

For a long time it was supposed that only those persons could grow Apples and Pears who had orchards for accommodating huge trees, the fruit of which could only be reached by the aid of tall ladders. Such notions are now obsolete, and trees are raised and sold in thousands which bear prodigiously when only two or three feet high, and which can be well grown in small gardens.

In gardens quite close to, and even within the environs of the largest cities and towns, beautiful fruit is now produced, handsome pyramids and bushes adorning the borders, ornamental arches arranged over walks, and trained trees covering fences attractively and profitably. Fruit culture is increasing marvellously, and will increase to the benefit of every householder, hence will be appropriately encouraged in HOUSEHOLD WORDS.

VEGETABLES.

With each recurring year the importance of vegetables as a wholesome staple food is becoming more fully recognised. Medical men have long urged their value, but a long time is needed for their teaching to "permeate" the minds of the million.

Thousands of persons may grow some kinds of vegetables who have as yet not devoted attention to the subject. If they cannot grow Potatoes and Peas in abundance, they can at least produce salads with Mustard and Cress, while many a vacant wall may be made to support the rich red fruits of the now favourite Tomato.

With the object of aiding all who need assistance in the cultivation of any or all of the plants and crops alluded to, with others that cannot be enumerated, we shall endeavour to impart information that may be useful, because in every case founded on experience, and shall hope that our endeavours to render gardens more enjoyable and profitable in the future will not be fruitless.

Three Brave Cavaliers.

A TOUCHING story is connected with the deaths of Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle, who, under Goring, Earl of Norwich, held Colchester in 1648, against Fairfax and the Parliament. The deaths of these gallant Cavalier officers happened thus:

Cromwell had just destroyed the Scotch army of the Duke of Hamilton in the north. The prince was with his fleet in the Downs, the poor king a prisoner at Carisbrooke; the Earl of Holland had been taken near Kingston in an affair of cavalry, and Goring and Lord Capel, with the Kentish and Essex Royalist corps, were shut up in Colchester. The Cavaliers, having eaten nearly all their horses, and despairing of relief, sent to Fairfax to propose terms.

Fairfax would dismiss the common soldiers, but would grant no condition to the officers and gentlemen. A day or two was spent in deliberation. The fiercer were for a brisk sally at all risks, but they had too few horses, and those that were left were weak from insufficient food. Some were for dashing open a port, and for dying sword in hand; but as that was only to be butchered without a chance of revenge calmer counsel prevailed. They all surrendered, threw open the gates, and the officers were at once led to the town-hall, locked in, and guarded. Presently a Puritan officer entered, and demanded a list of the prisoners' names for the general. It was given, and a guard shortly returned for Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Lisle, and Sir Bernard Gascoigne. The butchers had come into the crowded slaughter-house, and dragged out their selected victims. They were brought before Fairfax, who (instigated, as Clarendon thinks, by the inflexible Ireton) told them that after so long and obstinate a defence, it was necessary, for the example of others, that the peace of the kingdom should be no longer disturbed, and that military justice should be done—the three men must be presently put to death; and they were instantly led into a yard contiguous, where three files of musketeers were drawn up ready for the dreadful duty.

Sir Bernard Gascoigne was a gentleman of Florence, who knew just English enough to explain that he required only pen, ink, and paper, so that he might write to the Grand Duke to relate how he had lost his life, and who should inherit his estates. Sir Charles Lucas, the younger brother of a lord, and the heir to his title, had been brought up in the Low Countries, and had served in the cavalry. "He was very brave," says Clarendon, "and in the day of battle a gallant man to look upon and follow, but at all other times and places of a nature not to be lived with, of an ill understanding, of a rough and proud nature, which made him, during the time of their being in Colchester, more intolerable than the siege, or any fortune that threatened them. Yet they all desired to accompany him in his death." Lisle, compared with Lucas, was summer to winter. Though fierce to lead, and certain to be followed, he had "the softest and most gentle nature imaginable, loved all, and beloved of all, and without a capacity to have an enemy."

When the news of the cruel resolution reached the prisoners, the Cavaliers were deeply moved, and Lord Capel instantly prevailed on an officer of their guard to carry a letter to Fairfax, entreating him either to forbear the execution, or that all of them, being equally guilty, might undergo the same sentence. The only answer was an order to the officer to carry out the sentence, reserving the Italian to the last. The three Cavaliers were led forth into the castle courtyard. The soldiers first fired on Lucas, who fell dead. Seeing that, Lisle ran to the body, embraced it, kissed the stern, rugged face, and thinking the firing-party too far off, told them to come nearer. One of the musketeers exclaiming, "I'll warrant you, sir, we hit you," Lisle replied, smiling: "Friends, I've been nearer you when you have missed me."

Thereupon they all fired, and under that shower of fiery lead he fell instantly without uttering a word. Sir Bernard Gascoigne had already stripped off his doublet, and was expecting his turn had come, when the officer told him he had orders to carry him back to his friends, "for which mercy he cared not a whit." The council of war had feared that if his life were taken, their friends and children for several generations, would be in danger when travelling in Italy.

When, what Clarendon calls "the bloody sacrifice" was completed, Fairfax and his chief officers went to the town-hall to visit the other prisoners. The Puritan general treated the Earl of Norwich and Lord Capel courteously, apologised for the necessity of military justice, but said the lives of all the rest were safe, and that they should be all well treated and disposed of as the Parliament directed. Lord Capel's high courage could not stand this; he bade the Puritans finish their work, and show them the same rigour; upon which there were, says Clarendon, "two or three sharp and bitter replies between him and Ireton, which cost Capel his life a few months after." While in the Tower Capel made a daring escape, but was soon recaptured and beheaded, together with the Duke of Hamilton and the Earl of Holland, on a scaffold before Westminster Hall.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That all communications respecting the "Puzzles for Prizes" must be addressed to the PUZZLE EDITOR.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to the Puzzles, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

ANITA.—Whiteley, Westbourne Grove, or any good furrier, would get the skins made up for you.

B. W. J.—The best pills and other medicines for poultry are to be had of Walton, St. James's Road, Croydon.

CURIOSITY.—1. The words are spoken by the roguish doctor in the play of "The Honeymoon":

"For tho' to cure men be beyond our skill,
'Tis hard indeed if we can't keep 'em ill."

2. Several people we know, of some standing in society, have had their visiting-cards printed without the prefix "Mr.," "Mrs.," or "Miss," but it is not considered good style. See "Don't," a little manual of etiquette, the revised edition of which is published by Messrs. Griffith and Farran, price 1s.

FIKE.—1. We are not aware that any alteration has been made in the original form of the hymn, the author of which is the Rev. Sabine Baring-Gould. 2. We believe it has been prohibited on account of its revolutionary sentiments, and it is not possible to get it anywhere in London.

FIRST LADY.—The lines are to be found in "The Spanish Gypsy," Book V., by George Elliot:

He did not say "Farewell,"
But neither knew that he was silent. She,
For one long moment, moved not. They knew nought
Save that they parted; for their mutual gaze,
As with their souls full speech forbade their hands
To seek each other—those oft clasping hands
Which had a memory of their own, and went Widowed of one dear touch for evermore.

I'M A-WEARY, A-WEARY.—There may be many reasons for the feeling you describe. It may be due to indigestion, or to some other depressing form of ill-health, or you may have an irritable nervous system. Worry or annoyance and uncongenial surroundings would all tend to produce the condition you describe. It follows, therefore, that the proper cure must entirely depend upon the cause. But in any case you are safe to take good nourishing food, and plenty of exercise in the fresh air. Avoid constipation. Take a cold bath in the morning; retire early to bed; take as much quiet amusement as possible among congenial associates. Do not take much tea, coffee, or alcohol, and cultivate the habit of restraining your mental irritability or depression, and try to get as much cheerful interest into your life as possible, so that you may at least in some measure rejoice in "the joy of an eventful life."

INQUIRER H.—It was the late Dean Stanley who instituted the special service in Westminster Abbey for children on Innocents' Day. This day, called in Germany "Kindernessee," and formerly in England "Childermass," used to be more strictly observed than it is at present. The office for the festival was one of sorrow, and the church bells were always muffled. In some parishes a muffled peal is still rung on this day.

J. C. S.—1. The paper, we believe, would be provided. 2. No such testimonial would be of any use to you. 3. Your handwriting is not good enough.

MAY.—It will probably require some little trouble to get admission for a girl of thirteen into a training-school. Your best plan will be to apply to the National Central Office, 49, Upper Berkeley Street, Portman Square, where information will be given you of the respective homes throughout the country to which a young girl could be sent, or perhaps the benevolent secretary, H. B. Williams, Esq., of the Destitute Girls' Refuge, Albert Street, Spitalfields, might help you.

MAY 42.—Yes, after ten years' approved service, but, according to the terms of the Treasury Minute, only as the reward of rare and exceptional merit. This being so, it is doubtful how far any individual clerk would be justified in looking forward to this promotion as probable in his case.

ORNAMENTS.—The custom of wearing earrings dates from the earliest times. Michaelis, in his "Laws of Moses," says, according to a Mahomedan legend, Sarah, being jealous of Hagar, declared she would not rest until her hands had been imbued in her bondmaid's blood. Then Abraham pierced Hagar's ear quickly, and drew a ring through it, so that Sarah was able to dip her hand in the blood of Hagar without bringing the latter into danger. From that time it became a custom among women to wear earrings. In England earrings were worn by the Romanised Britons, and by Anglo-Saxons. After the tenth century the fashion seems to have declined both in England and on the Continent, and earrings are neither found in graves, nor discerned in paintings or sculptures. The wearing of earrings was re-introduced into England in the sixteenth century, and Stubbs, writing in the time of Queen Elizabeth, says: "The women are not ashamed to make holes in their ears, wherewith they hang rings and other jewels of gold and precious stones." In the seventeenth century earrings were worn by male fops.

TICKER.—1. It would be much better to buy a new than second-hand silver watch, because it is impossible for you to tell how much the latter may have been worn. An excellent silver watch can be had for 25s. of the Midland Counties Watch Company, Vyse Street, Birmingham. The company undertakes to keep this class of watch in repair free of cost for six months. A gold watch is certainly more ladylike than one of silver, and can be had of this company for 70s., being a really strong and serviceable watch. Your best plan will be to write for a catalogue. 2. The bridegroom usually considers it a privilege to make each bridesmaid a present. Silver lockets, under the circumstances you name, would be appropriate gifts. These can also be had of the above-named company.

Puzzles for Prizes.

The Parodies on Hood's "Bridge of Sighs" being very indifferent in quality, the Puzzle Editor considers them unworthy of Prizes, which are therefore reluctantly withheld.

The Winner of First Prize in No. 134, was Mrs. Shattock, Hillmorton Villa, Soneyd Park, Bristol ("One and All").

The correct answer to the Poetical Puzzle is as follows:

"Sad is my fate, said the heartbroken stranger."—Campbell's "Exile of Erin."

"Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride."—Goldsmith's "Deserted Village."

"Old times were changed, old manners gone;
A stranger filled the Stuart's throne."

Scott's "Lay of the Last Minstrel."

"Open the temple gates unto my love."—Spenser's "Epithalamion."

"I see before me the gladiator lie."—Byron's "Childe Harold."

"Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness."—Keats's "To Autumn."

"Make me thy lyre, even as the forest is."—Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind."

Answers have also been received from—Alice, Alice Norbury, Crystal Palace, Emma Jane, Egerance, Ferret, Sunflower, Tarradiddle.

Odds and Ends.

A LITERARY man in Vienna, possessor of the learned degree of doctor, used to take his midday refection, a contemporary tells us, at a well-known cafe in the Austrian capital. One wet day the place was less fully attended than usual, and the miserable state of the weather induced most of the visitors to seek their various employments as speedily as possible. When proceeding to follow their example, the learned doctor was astonished to find in place of his shabby and weather-beaten covering, a real Paris hat, shining with sparkling brilliancy. He could only attribute this quasi-magical change to the delicate attention of some friend, and hastened to display the acquisition, with no little pride, to his family. The next day a young man accosted him at the cafe, and politely remarked: "Doctor, allow me to claim my hat, and to apologise for the apparent mistake. The fact was, however, I had no umbrella and you had one. I did not know what to do to prevent my new hat from being spoilt in the rain, and as I knew yours could not be made worse than it is, I borrowed it, and now return it with thanks."

"I was visiting," says Mr. S. C. Hall, "a magistrate in Kerry County, when a stalwart fellow was brought in a prisoner, charged with nearly killing an old, bald-headed man. Being asked to swear information against the accused who had wounded him, the injured man was silent, and on being pressed absolutely refused. 'What was it this fellow did to you?' asked the magistrate. 'Nothing,' was the answer. The magistrate turned to the culprit: 'Are you not ashamed, he said, 'to have half-killed this old man, who will not even give information against you. Had you any ill-will to him?' 'Oh, none at all, your honour; I never saw him before to-day.' 'Then what made you do it?' 'Well, I'll tell yer honour the truth. Ye see, I came late into the fair; luck was agin me, for all the fighting was over; so, as I was strutting about, looking for some boy to cross a stick wid, I saw this poor man's bald head poked out of a slit of the tent that he might cool it; and it looked so inviting that, for the sowl o' me, I couldn't help hitting the blow.'"

A DIPLOMATIST was having an after-dinner talk with the Grand Vizier of the Oriental sovereign to whose court he is accredited. "The only fault I have to find with your system of government," said he laughingly, "is its murderous tendency. Why, not a single one of your sultans has died in his bed during the last two hundred years!" "You mistake, sir," rejoined the grand vizier with patriotic warmth. "Four of them have died in their beds during that period; though I must admit that in each case the royal sleeper was found with the mattress on top of him."

A LEARNED clergyman was accosted in the following manner by an illiterate preacher, who despised education: "Sir, you have been to college, I suppose?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. "I am thankful," rejoined the former, "that the Lord has opened my mouth to preach without any learning." "A similar event," replied the latter, "took place in Balaam's time, but such things are of rare occurrence in the present day."

IN an Irish paper was an advertisement for horses to stand at livery on the following terms: "Long-tailed horses at 3s. 6d. Short-tailed horses, 3s. per week." On enquiry into the cause of the difference it was answered that horses with long tails could brush the flies off their backs while eating, whereas short-tailed horses were obliged to take their heads from their mangers.

A FRENCHMAN who took to learning the English language, persevered till he came to the word "ague." When told that its two syllables might be reduced to one, by prefixing p and l, making plague of it, the philosopher remarked that half the English might have the ague, and the other half the plague: as for him he wouldn't bother more about it.

WHEN Morris had the Haymarket Theatre, Jerrold, on a certain occasion, had reason to find fault with the strength, or rather the want of strength, of the company. Morris expostulated and said: "Why, there's V—, he was bred on these boards!" "He looks as though he had been cut out of them," replied Jerrold.

SOMEBODY told a young English nobleman that to be popular in Boston society he must profess to be very fond of baked beans. And so when he dined at Mrs. Beaconsfield's he said in a loud voice to the servant: "Pass me the baked beans, please." There were none, of course, and the hostess said she was insulted.

TALLEYRAND, the Prime Minister of Napoleon, was disliked by Madame de Staël. It so happened that Talleyrand was lame, and madame crossed-eyed. Meeting one day, madame said: "Monsieur, how is that poor leg?" Talleyrand quickly replied: "Crooked, as you see."

A SURGEON, who was on his way to perform an operation on his patient, had his carriage robbed, and lost his surgical instruments while making a temporary stop: "Whereby," adds the reporter, "the operation was prevented and the patient's life saved."

SOME men can never take a joke. There was an old doctor, who, when asked what was good for moths, wrote back: "How do you suppose I can tell unless I know what ails the moths?"

THE freedom of Berlin having been presented to a Prussian officer in a gold snuff-box, a French writer said there was ample room in the snuff-box for all the freedom there was in Berlin.

THERE are some marriages which remind us of the poor fellow who said: "She couldn't get any husband, and I couldn't get any wife, so we got married."

A MERCHANT in New York, who had lost his fortune in a petroleum oil well speculation, was unkindly advised to let well alone in future.

JACK: "We're very proud of our ancestry, you know." TOM: "Yes, I know; but how would your ancestry feel about you?"

BY an Irishman: "Why is a storm, when it's clearing up, like a castigation?" "Sure, and isn't it a bating."

"BROWN, what did you clear by that speculation?" "I cleared my pockets," said Brown.

ROBERT SMITH, brother of Sydney, and familiarly called "Bobus," was a lawyer and an ex-Advocate General, and happened on one occasion to be engaged in argument with an excellent physician touching the merits of their respective professions. "You must admit," urged Dr. X., "that your profession does not make angels of men." "No," was the retort, "there you have the best of it; yours certainly gives them the first chance."

A NUMBER of amateurs were discussing the question of a name for their new dramatic club, and, of course, someone suggested "The Footlights." "Pshaw!" said a second; "too old. We'd better call it, 'The Flies on the Wings.'" "Well," said a third, "if you are going to borrow a name from some of the stage appurtenances, why not call ourselves 'The Flats,' and be done with it?"

WHEN travelling, Dean Swift once called at a house. The lady of the mansion rejoiced to have so great a guest, and with much eagerness and flippancy asked him what he would have for dinner. "Will you have an apple-pie, or a gooseberry-pie, sir, or a cherry-pie, or a plum-pie, or a pigeon-pie, sir?" "Anything but a mag-pie," replied the dean in his usual sarcastic manner.

A GENTLEMAN in a black coat called his friend to him and said: "Come with me while I change my black cravat for a white one for the ball. You will see how it will change me." The change is made. The friend examines his friend with attention. "That's so. Before one would have sent you out on an errand; but now one would say, 'Waiter, some coffee!'"

ON the edge of a small river in the county of Cavan, in Ireland, there is—or used to be—a stone with the following inscription cut upon it, no doubt intended for the information of strangers travelling that way: "N.B.—When this stone is out of sight, it is not safe to ford the river."

A SCOTTISH blacksmith being asked what was the meaning of metaphysics, replied: "When the party wha listens disna ken what the party wha speaks means, and when the party wha speaks disna ken what he means himself—that's metaphysics."

"WELL, to tell the truth, papa, I did not think much of the close of the sermon," said a fashionable young lady. "Probably you were thinking more of the clothes of the congregation," replied her father.

"My Lord Conceit."

(A SERIAL STORY.)

By the Author of "FRAGOLETTA," "DAME DURDEN," Etc., Etc.

CHAPTER I. A FIRST INTRODUCTION.

"MADGE, introduce me to 'My Lord Conceit.'"

The person addressed looked at the person addressing her with big, brown, puzzled eyes.

"My dear, when you give up that habit of nicknaming every person you meet, you will be infinitely more intelligible. To whom do you want an introduction now?"

"Can you ask? Don't his appearance, air, languor, self-satisfaction, announce him as well as my sobriquet? I mean the individual leaning against the doorpost. He looks half asleep. I suppose he's bored. In any case, I want to know him. I think I might put some animation into him."

Madge Dunbar smiled.

"I think you would put animation into the automaton chess-player, leave alone anything that possessed a spark of vitality. That lazy-looking fellow is a friend of Cosmo's. He asked him here to-night. I've never seen him before. He's the nephew of Sir Hector Grant, and his name—"

"Pray don't tell me his name," interrupted Beryl Foster hastily. "Mine suits him infinitely better. Bring him over here, and let me see what he's made of. Mentally, of course. Nature's done her part, I should say, but I never knew much brains go with good looks."

"He ought to feel flattered at your interest in him."

The girl laughed.

"He won't discover much of it when once I know him."

"Now, Beryl," remonstrated her friend, "no wickedness. Remember, you have done harm enough in your time, and on the very eve of—"

"Hush!" whispered the girl hurriedly, and her hand gave a little nervous pressure on her companion's arm. Then a smile broke over her face. "The law of attraction is inevitable," she said. "My Lord Conceit is coming to me, since you won't bring him."

Across the room, with its soft lights and tasteful combinations of colour and effect, in and out of the scattered figures lounging, standing, sitting, as fancy dictated, on and up to the two women who had been discussing him—one of whom was his hostess—came Ivor Grant.

"Mrs. Dunbar," he said, and the listening ear of the girl, whose eyes were so coolly yet critically resting on his face, could detect nothing in the voice to mar the effect of that face—"Mrs. Dunbar, would you have the kindness to tell me the name of the lady who has just sung?"

"Certainly. She is a Miss Kennedy. Do you admire her voice?"

"Can you ask? I am filled with wonder and admiration at the amount of vocal disguise thrown over what I faintly remember as a simple English ballad. She must be very clever, so to metamorphose it."

"Oh, she is!" asserted little Mrs. Dunbar eagerly. "And she has studied in Italy, and—"

"Thank you," he said gravely. "All doubts as to her perfections are set at rest. Of course, if she has studied in Italy that says—everything."

The very faintest trace of a smile was visible on the fresh, parted lips of the girl who, with a grace as negligent as his own, stood leaning against a marble pillar that supported a magnificent vase of genuine Sevres.

Mrs. Dunbar glanced from one to the other. Then she said, not without some misgivings:

"May I introduce you to my friend, Miss Foster? She shares your musical tastes, though she has not been in Italy."

A bow, a quick yet comprehensive glance. Trifles enough. Yet, after all, is there anything in life that so little deserves to be considered trifling as the introduction of two people, strangers up to just that moment—strangers, and living out their individual existences, frank, careless, free-hearted, content—only to date from thence the sorrows and heart-burnings, the misery and remorse, that Fate calls into life beneath a meeting such as this first one of Ivor Grant and Beryl Foster?

Conversation following on a first introduction is not apt to be very brilliant, and Ivor Grant rarely troubled himself to talk to unmarried women. As a rule, he found them insipid, or said he did, which amounts to the same thing. Yet he could talk well when he liked, and was not too lazy.

Keeping to his usual rule, he allowed his companion to begin, and she, having summed up his character by his outward appearance, as she had a way of doing with people, opened fire in a way that startled him.

"I don't think you understand music, judging by your remarks. Miss Kennedy is a beautiful singer."

"Why don't you say, 'is considered so'?" he asked coolly. "That would be a saving clause, and I might take refuge under the plea of being unable to 'consider' her that. My taste in music is very simple. It is my misfortune, of course."

"In the present instance?" was the quick rejoinder.

"Your inference is correct. But to me it seems there might be a worse misfortune."

"What?" she asked, glancing up, and wondering whether he was in earnest or only stupid.

"To be able to appreciate what you said was 'beautiful.' Trills, roulades, screams—Heavens! what it would be to live in the same house with that woman!"

"I am sorry you don't admire her," said the girl demurely. "I enjoy the treat you describe very often. The lady is my cousin."

It was not often that Ivor Grant lost his composure, not often that the serene face changed or altered either its colour or expression. But it did both now. Beneath that embarrassing announcement, before that mischievous glance, he blushed like a girl.

"I—I beg your pardon," he stammered.

"Pray do not," she said coolly. "It is rather pleasant to hear the unvarnished truth sometimes. Society is rather a glass house though, isn't it? one has to be careful where one throws one's stones. After all, your remark is not so bad as that of the gentleman in Punch, who saw a miserable-looking creature lounging against the doorway at some grand reception, and addressed him with, 'I say, this is awfully slow—shall we go out and have a B. and S.' The recipient of the invitation was his host."

"Well, that mistake was a degree worse than mine," laughed Captain Grant.

"But I suppose you won't retract your opinion—poor Grace! if she only knew how those practised 'song decorations' are valued! I suppose you understand music thoroughly?"

"No," he said quickly, and roused out of his habitual languor by his companion's manner, at once so frank and unconventional, yet so removed from the fastness and vulgarity of much of the modern young ladyism. "That's just it. I understand nothing about it except when a thing pleases me. I learnt it as one learns at school, and my friends are pleased to assure me I have a voice. There is some music I feel, and could listen to for—well, say for half an hour—but not much."

"Oh!" said his companion with another glance.

The "oh" might have been meant to close the subject, but the glance encouraged him to continue speaking.

"A good voice is a gift one can't sufficiently value, in my opinion. Why then spoil what nature has perfected?"

"Most people consider nature's handiwork rather crude," she answered demurely. "It is art, you know, that perfects."

"You are not easy to reason with," he said, smiling at the retort. "Will you give me your candid opinion? When you hear an air or melody that is beautiful, that touches you, or charms your ear, doesn't it seem desecration to hide and cover it with those abominations, entitled 'variations'?"

"The composers would be at a loss if they had only their melody to deal with. The working out of the theme is considered the real art of composition, and variation is only another form of development."

"You have not answered my question."

"Haven't I? Do you know, somebody once said that the great art of logic was to say, 'Why?' or 'Why not?' to everything? You asked me if I didn't consider variations a desecration of music. Why?"

"I shall say that, like all women, you can't argue."

"And I shall answer that, like all men, you are too fond of it. See how we are straying from our subject—the 'grace' of musical decorations."

"Women should never make puns."

"Why? Because they put yours to shame?"

"No, I won't allow that. Simply because they don't sound well from refined lips."

"I thought we spoke with our tongues," said Beryl, just raising her flowers to her face and glancing at him provokingly over the snowy clusters.

He bit his lip. The girl provoked him and yet interested him. That glance met his own, and for an instant held it in a sort of wondering regard. He had not thought she was half so beautiful till he saw those splendid eyes glancing over the flowers, provocative, mirthful, yet with something so strange and almost solemn in their intense dark depths that it startled him as much as if he had heard a sermon preached in a ball-room, or seen something equally incongruous.

With all the languor and affectation gone from his own, he returned that glance gravely and steadily.

He found himself saying in his heart, "What sort of girl is this?" and ere he could answer the question in any definite way, her eyes drooped; she let her hand fall to her side with a graceful negligent gesture.

"Are you fond of dancing?" she asked.

"Fond of dancing!" he echoed. "Why?"

"Please don't adopt my line of argument," she said with a merry laugh. "It will be very embarrassing if we keep on asking each other that same question. Why—why? Oh, because most army men are."

"And what makes you think I am an army man. Mrs. Dunbar did not mention my name."

"No, but do you think it was needed? Like that of the Church, the profession proclaims itself. I had formed my own opinion of you before you were introduced. I did not want to hear your name?"

"Again might I ask—why?"

"You might and may; and my reply would be the counter-question recommended to refute all arguments. Why not?"

"I think," he said, smiling in spite of himself, "that your feminine logic is quite unapproachable. I can only consider our conversation a sort of gigantic conundrum, and say, 'I give it up.'"

"Ah," she said quickly, "are you so easily baffled, or is it only too much trouble?"

"To talk to you, certainly not; to understand you, yes."

"You are candid," she said, uncertain whether to be vexed or pleased.

"A rare virtue nowadays. But since you possess it yourself, you ought to appreciate it."

"Does one always appreciate what one possesses?" she said thoughtfully. "I think not. And you think me candid?"

"Very much so," he answered emphatically.

Again she laughed—a little, low laugh pleasant to hear, yet not so mirthful as it should have been, coming from such young lips. His ear, quick at discerning the false ring in most women's laughter, caught this note of sadness in hers. It puzzled him, but then the girl herself had puzzled him all this time. He thought—indeed, he knew—that he had never met anyone like her.

How long or how short a time would it be before that fact came before him in the light of a regret? Happily he did not know then.

"Well, perhaps I am," she went on, when the laugh had died away; "I can't help saying what I think. I should like to do it much more frequently, but—isn't it strange how truth offends, and yet how we are always lauding it?"

"Very strange. We have to thank these artificial habits of society for that."

"Society, society," exclaimed the girl wearily. "How sick one gets of it and its ways and doctrines. We, who pride ourselves on our freedom, are bound to a worse slavery than the poor creatures we gave our blood to free. I wonder," she added bitterly, "what force of courage or strength could free us."

"The situation, reduced to its primitive elements, is simply a case of individual folly," he answered reflectively, "to be altered or annealed only by individual effort."

"Which none of us are brave enough to make?"

"Well, you see," he answered thoughtfully, "it would be a great bore; self-sacrifice, and all those high-falutin' principles that sound so grand and read so well, are awfully troublesome things in real life. It's so much easier to go with one's time than oppose it—"

"And pays so much better, you should add," she interrupted sarcastically.

"Exactly."

There was a moment's pause. Then she said suddenly:

"Do you ever think?"

He lifted his eyebrows.

"Occasionally I do. Do you consider it unlikely?"

She was silent for a few seconds. Then a smile stole over her lips, a smile serious, soft, puzzling almost as herself and her manifold contradictions of face and manner.

"I did," she said quietly. "I suppose appearances do mislead one occasionally."

Once again he coloured hotly, and the flush brought to her a sudden sense of the apparent rudeness of her words. She deemed it best, however, not to notice the mistake.

"It is so rare," she went on calmly, "to find anyone who will allow that he has a mind, or that it has any use beyond the contemplation and discussion of trivialities."

"Would you like ball-room partners to discuss science and the Pentateuch?"

"Certainly not," she said, laughing a little. "'Everything in its place' is a good motto, but even in a ball-room one need not be wholly and entirely frivolous."

"Which reminds me that I have monopolised you all this time, and never once asked you to dance."

"Even after that hint of mine? I do not think you are a Terpsichorean votary."

"You are right. But though not a votary, I indulge in the amusement now and then. May I have the pleasure?"

"Since you have as good as said it is no pleasure, I cannot think of inflicting its pretence upon you," she answered demurely.

"Pardon me, you misunderstood."

"Very likely," she said with one of those puzzling glances, "but don't you think it might be penance to me? Like yourself I really don't care for dancing, though I admire singing."

"You are determined to be unmerciful," he said; "I suppose you will never forgive my unfortunate mistake?"

"Which do you mean?"

"The—the—about your cousin, of course."

"Ah!" she said slowly, and looked at him with a whole world of mischief in her beautiful eyes; "that was unfortunate, as you say, but it might have been worse."

"How?" he asked quickly.

She was moving away now with a bow that seemed meant as a distinct farewell, but he followed her, and offered his arm, which after a moment's hesitation she took.

"Because, after all, the lady whose vocalisation displeased you so much is not my cousin."

"How unkind of you to frighten me so," he answered reproachfully, "and to tell me such a—such a—"

"That's right, spare my feelings," laughed the girl; "I only wanted to give you a lesson. It is so unsafe in society to give your opinion of one person to another."

"Do you think," he said, biting his lip with unconcealed vexation, "that I am so ignorant, so unversed in the ways of society, that I require a lesson in manners?"

"Oh no," she said, glancing at his clouded face with ready contrition. "Pray don't fancy that. I am really very sorry. I only did it for fun."

"Don't look so dreadfully serious over it," he answered as he met the pleading glance. "Even fun and misunderstandings are no bad basis for friendship."

"Friendship!" she echoed, somewhat startled.

"Well, perhaps I was premature in suggesting such a possibility. But I hope we may meet again. It is not too improbable, is it?"

"Improbable?" she said gravely. "Well, perhaps—no. Possible, I hardly think. This is my farewell to society for a long time—perhaps for ever."

"What do you mean?" he asked, startled, and looking fully and searchingly at the face which had grown somewhat pale and—was it hard? He thought so then. He was sure of it a moment after, as she raised her eyes and met his own enquiring gaze.

"I mean," she said coolly, "that I am going to do what my friend Mrs. Dunbar has done—join the 'noble army of martyrs.'"

Something—he could never quite tell what—fell across Ivor Grant's heart at that moment like a discordant sound that jars on ears fresh feasted with some perfect melody. He was silent, and his face grew grave.

"You are going to be married?" he said at last.

"The day after to-morrow," she answered quietly.

CHAPTER II. WHAT THEY BOTH THOUGHT.

IVOR GRANT lit a cigar and strolled homewards to his rooms that warm June night, feeling for once in his life a curious sort of dissatisfaction with himself and the world in general. He could not imagine why.

As a rule he was not given to self-analysis—indeed, he troubled himself very little about anything, having a thorough detestation of worry, and a rooted conviction that people brought it on themselves by not taking life easily enough.

Perhaps it never occurred to his philosophy that the capability of doing so is entirely a matter of temperament. It had been no difficult matter to him from his very earliest days, he having been the spoilt darling of a mother who idolised him, and of an uncle who indulged him in every fancy. He had known very little of life except its fairest side, and owed it more to himself than anyone else that he had not grown up to manhood quite stupid, or quite conceited, or quite useless.

But that sunny, frank temper of his, and, possibly, a fair share of brains with which nature had provided him, saved him from this calamity, and made him a favourite everywhere, quite as much with men as with women.

He was too good-looking not to please the latter—dangerously good-looking many of them had acknowledged, when haunting memories of that perfect face and those languid, mournful eyes had come between them and their night's rest after a flirtation with the owner.

Why the eyes had that expression often puzzled the soft-hearted victims to Ivor Grant's fascinations. There was nothing mournful about the young man himself, and he was cool enough and impassive enough to give people the impression that he sailed along through life on very unruffled waters indeed, but never did any one so deceive at first sight as the individual to whom Beryl Foster had given the sobriquet of "My Lord Conceit."

She had somewhat prided herself on a skill at reading character, and her first glance at the lazy, handsome figure, the well-cut profile and languid eyes, had been one that summed him up as one of society's spoilt and courted darlings, of very little good except to look at.

That he was good for that she acknowledged very rapidly, and indeed she would have been more than singular had she not done so, even though she professed to despise good looks in men.

That he could talk well enough to measure swords with herself had first surprised, then piqued her. Of course he had no right to be anything different to what she had imagined, and yet he was.

Had he not been she would probably never have given him a second thought, whereas now she gave him a great many.

Beryl Foster was as much of a coquette as a pretty girl with an irresistible attraction for most men is sure to become. She had had two London seasons, and had come to them fresh from a country parsonage, and prepared to enjoy them to the uttermost under the chaperonage of her dearest and warmest friend, Madge Dunbar.

Perhaps she enjoyed the homage and admiration all the more from knowing that her own future was assured, that she had no occasion to distress herself or her chaperon on the score of eligibles or the reverse. Her fate had been calmly settled for her long before, and as calmly accepted by herself. She was to marry her cousin, her father's last living relative, as soon as he was ready to have her, and she had grown reconciled to the fact—as well as to the other and more stubborn one of banishment to India, which it entailed—long before the evening when she met Ivor Grant at Mrs. Dunbar's "little dance."

John Marsden was one of those plodding, commonplace souls, who seem thoroughly good, perfectly trustworthy—and, alas! that it should be so—so eminently uninteresting.

He had known his cousin from her babyhood, and had gone through life with the one firm intention of laying his fortune and devotion at her feet. He was twelve years older than herself, but at sixteen she had accepted him, and at twenty-two she was about to marry him, not for any particular reason, not with an atom of enthusiasm in the matter, but simply because she had been brought up to look forward to that fact as an ultimate result of his placid devotion, a natural response to the demands of duty, and a total indifference to any one else who might have called into life a feeling very different to that which John Marsden had inspired.

Beryl always declared she was unromantic. Her love of reading, great as it was, had been of a kind very different from that of most girls of her age and time. Her father was a clever man, and had imbued her with the idea that minds are meant to be cultivated to some good end, not left as waste ground for such tillers as the world, the flesh, and the devil. Her disposition was naturally a happy one, and life had been a placid and untroubled thing to her, though always busy, useful, and well occupied. Her success in society had not dazzled her a whit, though she was well pleased with it. Mrs. Dunbar had often felt puzzled with her, for what could one make of a girl who was as glad to talk with an old man as with a young one, provided he could "talk well," and who made herself just as agreeable to women as to men.

Only sometimes had her friend felt a little uncomfortable foreboding of Beryl's future when, in some chance glimpse of the girl's mind, she had caught sight of possibilities she had never dreamt of, a strength and depth of feeling, and an acuteness of sympathy, which proclaimed her capable of much suffering in time to come.

Long as she had known Beryl, dearly as she loved her, she yet felt always that she never quite understood the girl. She had watched her through two seasons of London life, and acknowledged that she understood her less than ever.

Sometimes she felt sorry that she was going to be married, sometimes glad, for she knew that the sterling honesty of the girl's nature would make marriage a safeguard and a bond. But invariably, as she looked at John Marsden's commonplace face, or listened to his uninteresting conversation, she felt herself saying, "Oh, if it were anybody else!" Still, there had never been anybody else whom Beryl considered more suitable, or at least appeared to consider so, and now everything was settled and arranged, and the marriage was to take place on the next day but one.

When her guests had departed that night, Madge Dunbar went up to her friend's room for a chat before retiring.

She found Beryl sitting in a low chair, gazing into the fern-filled fireplace. She had not removed her dress, or done anything apparently, except throw her flowers down on the dressing-table, and herself into the chair.

"I was wondering whether you would come," she said, looking up as Mrs. Dunbar entered. "I hoped you would. Are you tired?"

"No, not at all," answered her friend, taking another chair. "But I thought you were, as I missed you long ago. Why haven't you gone to bed?"

"I was not tired," answered Beryl somewhat absently; "I only wanted to think."

"What about?" asked Madge Dunbar quickly.

"About—oh, many things. The near approach of my wedding-day; the fit of my dress; the success of your evening with its incongruous combination of music and dancing—don't try the two again, Madge; the"—looking up with a mischievous glance—"the perfections of My Lord Conceit."

Mrs. Dunbar laughed.

"I hope you found him interesting. Why didn't you dance with him? He is one of the crack waltzers of the day."

"Enviably being!" murmured Beryl lazily, as she leant back in her chair and unclasped a bracelet from one round white arm. "I didn't waltz, though he asked me, because I preferred talking to him. I am glad I wasn't aware of his reputation, otherwise I should have concluded he carried his brains in his heels. Most dancing men do. I suppose the poor things get addled."

"I think, my dear," said Mrs. Dunbar gravely, "that you should not jump so rapidly at conclusions. How can you tell what a person is like from just a few formal sentences spoken to each other in society?"

"And I think, my dear," answered Beryl with a mocking imitation of her friend's voice and manner, "that you can find out a great deal about a person in even a few formal sentences. Shall I tell you what I found out about My Lord Conceit?"

"Certainly, if you wish."

"Imprimis," said the girl, laying one slender white finger gravely against another, "he is in the army."

"Household Brigade," murmured her friend.

"Well, he's a soldier for all that, I suppose. Secondly, he has some brains. Thirdly, he can talk, not badly; and fourthly, I am very sorry I have met him."

The conclusion was so sudden and so unexpected, that Madge Dunbar looked in undisguised astonishment at the girl.

"Why?" she asked.

"Why, why? Oh dear me!" laughed Beryl, rising somewhat impatiently, as if to put an end to the interview. "Why is one anything—why does one think, or feel, or like, or dislike? How can I tell why I feel it? I only know I do."

"Was he so disagreeable?" asked Mrs. Dunbar, rising also, and looking with hesitating glance at the beautiful pale face before her.

Again Beryl laughed.

"Disagreeable! Oh, very much so. I never met such a disagreeable man. He quite spoils my evening."

"I am sorry for that," answered her friend; "but you know you would be introduced to him."

"What great events from little causes spring," quoted Beryl, unfastening her dress and slipping out of it in some quick impulsive fashion of her own; "not that My Lord Conceit is a little cause though. About six feet of bone and muscle—eh, Madge?"

"He is one of the handsomest men I have ever seen," remarked Mrs. Dunbar thoughtfully.

"Handsome! How I hate that word!" cried Beryl impatiently. "What does it matter about a man's looks? The uglier he is the better. There is some chance then of his giving his other qualities fair play."

"Is it impossible to do that, and yet be good-looking?"

"Quite," said the girl determinedly.

She was moving restlessly about now, had thrown on a loose white wrapper, and unbound her rich brown hair, which fell to her knees, tall as she was.

"You are full of prejudices, Beryl," said Madge, smiling, "and rather obstinate about acknowledging them. Was Captain Grant good for nothing except to look at? If so, he kept you employed at that rather a long time."

"I was studying him," said the girl quietly.

"What makes you so fond of studying people?" asked her friend. A little faint smile stole to the lips that were so firmly set, and so perfect in shape and colour.

"Some day perhaps I shall write a book," she answered. "I am collecting materials."

Mrs. Dunbar laughed outright.

"I can't fancy you doing that, Beryl," she said; "you are too impetuous and impatient. If you could begin one day and finish the next, you might succeed—not otherwise."

"Madge," said the girl suddenly, and with that startling irrelevance to the subject in discussion which was one of her peculiarities, "tell me how you felt the day before you were married."

Her friend looked at her in astonishment, then a soft, rosy flush stole over her face, and a smile parted her lips.

"Very happy," she answered readily. "You see I was very much in love—"

"In love!" interrupted the girl impatiently. "What has that got to do with it?"

"Everything, I should say," answered Mrs. Dunbar gravely.

"Do you mean to say you don't love John Marsden?"

Beryl drew the comb slowly through the long rich tress of hair she held in her hand.

"I have been engaged to him since I was sixteen," she said thoughtfully. "I am twenty-two now. I don't think in all that time it has ever occurred to me to ask myself that question. Yet, I suppose love and marriage always go together."

"They ought to," answered Madge Dunbar. "Unfortunately they very seldom do nowadays."

"Then I am safe," laughed the girl, with one of those rapid changes of manner which always puzzled her friend; "my case is on the side of the majority."

"Beryl, my dear," said Mrs. Dunbar anxiously, as she came and stood beside the girl, and looked up at the beautiful, wilful face, "will you tell me one thing: Are you quite content to marry John Marsden? Are you quite happy?"

"Two things!" said Beryl, laughing. "My dear, I have never been unhappy in my life except once, when poor Fido broke his leg in a rabbit-burrow. What makes you look so grave? Is matrimony so very dreadful? I shall tell Cosmo to-morrow that you tried to frighten me out of it."

"I wish you would be serious for five minutes," said Madge plaintively.

"Dearest child—five! I was serious for a whole quarter of an hour. Now, good-night. I must get some beauty sleep, you know, and we have heaps of things to do to-morrow."

Yet, despite the light words and careless manner, there was something wistful in her eyes, and in the lingering kisses that touched Madge Dunbar's soft lips, something that haunted her friend's memory for long after, and left a sort of longing in her heart that her lips had no courage to frame.

"I hope Beryl is not making a mistake."

Beryl herself stood for a long, long time before that glass, which reflected a tall white figure with rippling hair.

She was looking at herself quite unconsciously—looking back at her deep eyes, soft and full of dreams—dreams that for the first time in her life brought her face to face with some undreamt-of possibility; something which stirred the fearless innocence of life and thought, and made her ask herself at last: "Am I right to do this thing?"

She could not understand why the doubt had arisen. She could not define the vague unrest which filled her heart that night. What possible association had these things with the memory of a handsome face, or the lingering echo of a voice? Aye, and what possible association with a path of stones and thorns that the brave young feet must tread in years to come, or with the tears that gathered even now in the radiant eyes, to which tears were so strange and so unfrequent?

Ivor Grant smoked his third cigar through, dismissed his man, drank two brandies-and-sodas, thought he would go to bed—thought he wouldn't, turned over the pages of a new novel, shut it up impatiently, finally went over to the window and threw it open, and stood looking out at the quiet starlit street.

"I wish I hadn't met that girl," he muttered to himself, "or that she wasn't going to be married."

(To be continued.)

A Pertinent Question.

LIGHTS from the windows are gleaming and glancing,
Music and laughter are echoing near,
Save where the twain move apart from the dancing,
Uttering vows each was longing to hear;
Tender his tones in their low modulation,
Timidly downwards her glances are cast,
Eyes match'd with sapphire, and cheeks with carnation.
Fair is the vision. How long will it last?

Think, when old Time, of all jokers the grimmest,

Whitens the tresses and furrows the brow,

Changing the forms that are lithest and slimmest,

Will your affection be steady as now?

True that to-day, in its ardent devotion,

Love takes no heed of the future or past;

Curbing and checking the tide of emotion,

Prudence should whisper: "How long will it last?"

All were in vain, though the caution be needed,

Prudence is ne'er the companion of youth;

Passion for aye leaves unnoticed, unheeded,

Warnings of wisdom and guesses of truth.

Forging the fetters that bind them together,

Gilding the hours that are flying so fast;

Careless of sunlight or stormiest weather,

Love never questions: "How long will it last?"

Two New Years' Eves.

A Tale of the Press Gang.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"By George, there she is again!" exclaimed Captain Hugh Alden, of His Britannic Majesty's Navy, as he was swaggering through the streets of the quiet little borough of Sandwich one fine December morning of the year 1811, and paused to look back at the retreating figure of a young lady closely wrapped up in furs, who had just passed him.

"She is a pretty girl and no mistake about it, and pretty girls are not so common in these outlandish parts of the kingdom that they can be just glanced at and forgotten. Now I wonder who she is?"

So pondering, he turned back and followed the subject of his eulogium. He watched her enter a doorway, over which was inscribed upon a board: "Thomas Burt, carrier to all parts of London, every Monday, and returning on Saturday night;" and muttered:

"Miss Burt—hey! Well, I must try and find out some more about Miss Burt. I've met her ever so many times, and each time she seems nicer and prettier. It'll be a strange thing if rustic Miss Burt resists the advances of—well, rather handsome and accomplished Hugh Alden of His Majesty's Service."

With these complacent notions he retraced his steps towards the quay on the bank of the sluggish Stour, where lay moored a smart cutter flying the naval ensign, and bearing in gold letters on her stern the name "Cynthia."

Captain Alden was in fact in command of the Cynthia, which was engaged upon "particular service" of a particularly unpleasant nature, at least to the inhabitants of the ports whereat she touched, inasmuch as she was engaged in impressing men for service on His Majesty's frigate Guerrière, daily expected off Sandwich on her way to America.

The cutter was naturally the object of much admiration and curiosity to the good folk of Sandwich, who, however familiar their ancestors might have been, in the palmy days of the old Cinque Port, with the spectacle of the entire national fleet within their waters, were strangers to the sight of one of the king's ships almost literally at their very doors, so that a very large proportion of them spent their days in lounging on the quay-side in groups, and speculating upon the possible reason for the appearance of such a phenomenon.

Captain Alden was pacing up and down the spotless deck of the cutter upon the morning following the little episode above described, inwardly praying that the Guerrière might be delayed on her passage round from Woolwich, in order that he might get another glance at the pretty face which had so charmed him. It was Sunday morning, and the number of quay-side loungers was greater than usual, so that the captain, who was really not a bad-looking man, and who was fully aware of the impression made upon simple minds by an attractive uniform, strutted his very best, and looked every inch a monarch. Great was his delight, therefore, when he espied amidst the gaping faces the pretty features of Miss Burt. Politely raising his hat, he said:

"Would Miss Burt like to step aboard and see the Cynthia?"

The young lady blushed, hesitated for a moment, and then without availing herself of the officer's proffered arm, jumped lightly down on to the deck.

"You do the Cynthia a great honour, Miss Burt," said the captain, "for it is not often that our monotonous lives are enlivened by the presence of ladies."

"But my name is not Burt," said the girl. "Who told you that it was?"

"Why—well, I saw you go into a doorway yesterday, above which was written the name of Burt," replied the officer, "so of course I made sure that you were Miss Burt."

"Oh dear no. My name is Mavis Carroll," laughed the girl. "Mr. Burt is my guardian."

At the name Carroll the captain started and stammered:

"Oh, Mr. Burt is your guardian! Then have you no father or mother?"

"I don't remember them," replied Mavis. "I came here when I was a little bit of a girl, and I was always told that I was an orphan."

The captain seemed lost for a few moments in profound reverie, and almost forgot his visitor, but suddenly recollecting her, showed her all over the ship to her huge delight, until the sound of the church-bells reminded her that she must go.

"And I'm sure you won't mind my bringing Tom, will you, Captain Alden?" said Mavis, as she stood with one foot on the accommodation-ladder, ready to jump on shore.

"Tom—who is Tom?" asked the captain.

"Tom! Why, he's—he's my sweetheart," answered the lass demurely; "such a dear old fellow, and so fond of ships, for he has been a sailor and knows all about them."

Of course the captain could not reject the proposal, so he said:

"Very well, then; bring Tom after church."

So the damsel thanked him, sprang on to the quay, and disappeared through the crowd which was slowly dispersing.

The captain left alone fell again into reverie.

"Mavis Carroll!" he muttered to himself; "fancy meeting Mavis Carroll here. Why, she's reputed dead long ago. By George! if the London lawyers only knew that she was alive! Why, I suppose I should have to give up that comfortable little income which I enjoy as having married her sister—the next-of-kin, as was supposed, to old Carroll. Married! That's a nasty word, but it's there staring me in the face. I married Dorothy Carroll and Dorothy Carroll is my wife—that is, if she's alive—I haven't seen her for five years; but I must be careful. And who's this Tom? Some slouching country bumpkin, I suppose, and he'll marry her, and her name will get out, and then—By George! he mustn't, he sha'n't marry her. It's a deep game, but it's worth playing, for if I can make this girl Mrs. Alden, the lawyers may come on as much as they like—unless—unless they find that I'm already married and that my wife is alive, which I don't think is likely, considering the state I left her in. Yes, it's five years since I got into that rage, and—"

He stopped short here, for the reflection was evidently unpleasant, went down below, lit his pipe, and filled himself a glass of spirits.

At the expiration of an hour and a half an increased hubbub and clattering of feet on the quay-side proclaimed the fact that the Sandwich churches were discharging their congregations, and presently Captain Alden espied his charmer threading her way through the groups on the arm of a burly, broad-shouldered young fellow, whose face, although of a jovial mould, was twisted into contortions occasioned by his wearing a very tight and uncomfortable suit of orthodox Sunday-black.

"Here's Tom," exclaimed Mavis breathlessly and proudly. "Come on, Tom; the captain said I might bring you on board."

Tom seemed to look rather shyly at the captain and the cutter, much as a hare looks suspiciously at anything which bears a resemblance to a trap, but at repeated instigations on the part of Mavis he floundered on to the deck and stood pulling his forelock and scraping his foot whilst Mavis laughingly introduced him.

In a few minutes the captain had put him completely at his ease, and he felt actually proud as he paced up and down the deck in full view of the admiring crowd, a real king's officer on one side talking to him like an equal, and on the other the prettiest girl in Sandwich.

"It's always been a puzzle to me," said the captain in the course of their conversation, "how fine young fellows like you can be content to lead a humdrum land-lubber's life in these stirring times."

Tom looked askance at the captain, as if the vision of the trap had reappeared, but said:

"Well, sir, I'm a carrier now, that's true, but I ain't allus been. I know a thing or two about ships, cos I was pressed in 'six, and I sailed along with Admiral Duckworth in the West Indies, and again in the Dardanelles; and in 'seven I was along with Admiral Gambier in the Terrible, at Copenhagen; and in 'nine I was in the Tribune, Captain Reynolds, and got a wound fightin' agin' four Danish brigs; an' then I got invalidated home, so I took up the old man's carrier business."

"I suppose that's almost as hard work as sailing?" said the captain.

"A deal sight harder, sir," replied Tom. "A sailorin', you gets your grub reg'lar, and has plenty o' sleep; but I starts from here to-morrow mornin' afore daylight, an' I gets in to The George Inn, Borough, late o' Wednesday night, barrin' accidents, and early o' Thursday mornin' I starts off again home. I has to sleep where an' when I can, and get my grub anyhow; but I wouldn't go back—not I!"

"And of course you know why, Captain Alden," said Mavis demurely.

"Well, yes, I can pretty well guess," said the captain; "and when's it to come off?"

"When's what to come off?" asked Mavis.

"Why, when are you going to be married?" said the captain.

"Oh, I don't know," returned Mavis, blushing. "That depends on Tom. Not just yet—perhaps a year."

"We said we'd be wed o' New Year's Day," said Tom.

"So as to begin the year well," said the captain; and so they went on, talking and laughing, until, as the churches chimed the dinner-hour, and the happy couple prepared to go, the captain had succeeded in completely winding himself round their hearts, and accepted an invitation from them to go to Delft Street and make the acquaintance of old Thomas Burt.

The Guerrière arrived off Sandwich the next day, but the welcome news was brought to Captain Alden that her complement of men was complete, and that he was still to remain in charge of the Cynthia at Sandwich. So during the week he had plenty of opportunities of seeing Mavis, and was established as a guest in the house of the old carrier, although, with regard to his position as an officer, he paid his visits sub rosa.

Old Thomas Burt, whose chief source of pride, next to his adopted daughter Mavis, was his boast that during fifty years on the road he had never lost a package or met with a serious accident, considered that a very high honour was paid him by the presence in his humble house of so distinguished a guest as the captain, and, as the latter was most circumspect in his behaviour towards Mavis, never dreamed for a moment that any motive but friendship was at the bottom of the condescension; while Tom, being absent from home during the greater part of the week, had no idea of the risk he was running by encouraging this acquaintance. He was a simple-minded, confiding man, although he had been a sailor, and, moreover, he had no opportunity of beholding the airs which Miss Mavis put on, upon the strength of the new honour done her house, amongst the Sandwich lasses, who were beside themselves with envy when they found that a real gentleman and an officer was in the habit of paying frequent visits to the carrier's house.

But the poison thus introduced worked its insidious way. At first the girl's head was simply turned by the attentions and politeness of the captain; little by little these attentions grew more marked; the politeness assumed an air of gallantry; their intercourse became more open and more free. The captain went in and out of the house like a friend of long standing, the old carrier confided to him his plans about Tom and Mavis, and talked to him more as an equal and an intimate than as a casual acquaintance. In fact, neither of them could resist him.

In such a small place, where everybody knew everybody else's business, gossips soon got talking about the affair, and once or twice the old carrier was warned. But he saw in Captain Alden only an affable, jovial gentleman, who could tell a good story, join in a hearty laugh, and talk genuine common-sense, and he no more believed that Mavis could have any stronger feeling for him than respect and regard, than that she would give up her affection for Tom for a powder-monkey on board the Guerrière.

But Mavis, simple and country-bred as she was, was but a woman. She knew and felt what was going on; Tom was still a dear old fellow in her eyes, but somehow or other he ceased gradually to occupy the only place in her mind. She did not cease to love him one whit, but he was no longer the only man in the little world of her own heart.

Then she began to draw contrasts, and directly a woman begins to draw contrasts, her allegiance is shaken. But she put the feeling from her so long as she was able. She was sometimes even rude to the captain—often she was cold and distant. Then he would absent himself for a few days; she felt the blank occasioned by his absence, and when he returned with the same gentle, suave manner, she would undo all she had done by returning to her old freedom and amiability. The captain was a master of his craft, and played both her and the old carrier as an experienced angler plays a fish.

Christmas-time came and passed. As this was the busiest time of the year on the road, Tom Burt, the younger, had been unable to join the little family party in Delft Street, except for a few hours on Christmas Day, but the captain came in during the evening, after having dined with the officers on board the Guerrière (which was still detained by bad weather outside Sandwich), and amply filled the blank caused by Tom's enforced absence.

But all looked forward to New Year's Eve. Tom would be free then, and there would be a banquet, and bell-ringing, and first-footing customs, and general hilarity, to assist in all of which the captain was cordially invited.

He was expected to arrive at about nightfall, although, as the snow was deep on the roads, he might be detained. However, the fire burned cheerily on the hearth, the old carrier was in his accustomed chair, with his long pipe in his mouth, listening to Captain Alden's lively chat, whilst Mavis, coquettishly arrayed in her best, was busily

Mrs. Dunbar laughed outright.

"I can't fancy you doing that, Beryl," she said; "you are too impetuous and impatient. If you could begin one day and finish the next, you might succeed—not otherwise."

"Madge," said the girl suddenly, and with that startling irrelevance to the subject in discussion which was one of her peculiarities, "tell me how you felt the day before you were married."

Her friend looked at her in astonishment, then a soft, rosy flush stole over her face, and a smile parted her lips.

"Very happy," she answered readily. "You see I was very much in love—"

"In love!" interrupted the girl impatiently. "What has that got to do with it?"

"Everything, I should say," answered Mrs. Dunbar gravely. "Do you mean to say you don't love John Marsden?"

Beryl drew the comb slowly through the long rich tress of hair she held in her hand.

"I have been engaged to him since I was sixteen," she said thoughtfully. "I am twenty-two now. I don't think in all that time it has ever occurred to me to ask myself that question. Yet, I suppose love and marriage always go together."

"They ought to," answered Madge Dunbar. "Unfortunately they very seldom do nowadays."

"Then I am safe," laughed the girl, with one of those rapid changes of manner which always puzzled her friend; "my case is on the side of the majority."

"Beryl, my dear," said Mrs. Dunbar anxiously, as she came and stood beside the girl, and looked up at the beautiful, wilful face, "will you tell me one thing: Are you quite content to marry John Marsden? Are you quite happy?"

"Two things!" said Beryl, laughing. "My dear, I have never been unhappy in my life except once, when poor Fido broke his leg in a rabbit-burrow. What makes you look so grave? Is matrimony so very dreadful? I shall tell Cosmo to-morrow that you tried to frighten me out of it."

"I wish you would be serious for five minutes," said Madge plaintively.

"Dearest child—five! I was serious for a whole quarter of an hour. Now, good-night. I must get some beauty sleep, you know, and we have heaps of things to do to-morrow."

Yet, despite the light words and careless manner, there was something wistful in her eyes, and in the lingering kisses that touched Madge Dunbar's soft lips, something that haunted her friend's memory for long after, and left a sort of longing in her heart that her lips had no courage to frame.

"I hope Beryl is not making a mistake."

Beryl herself stood for a long, long time before that glass, which reflected a tall white figure with rippling hair.

She was looking at herself quite unconsciously—looking back at her deep eyes, soft and full of dreams—dreams that for the first time in her life brought her face to face with some undreamt-of possibility; something which stirred the fearless innocence of life and thought, and made her ask herself at last: "Am I right to do this thing?"

She could not understand why the doubt had arisen. She could not define the vague unrest which filled her heart that night. What possible association had these things with the memory of a handsome face, or the lingering echo of a voice? Aye, and what possible association with a path of stones and thorns that the brave young feet must tread in years to come, or with the tears that gathered even now in the radiant eyes, to which tears were so strange and so unfrequent?

Ivor Grant smoked his third cigar through, dismissed his man, drank two brandies-and-sodas, thought he would go to bed—thought he wouldn't, turned over the pages of a new novel, shut it up impatiently, finally went over to the window and threw it open, and stood looking out at the quiet starlit street.

"I wish I hadn't met that girl," he muttered to himself, "or that she wasn't going to be married."

(To be continued.)

A Pertinent Question.

LIGHTS from the windows are gleaming and glancing,
Music and laughter are echoing near,
Save where the twain move apart from the dancing,
Uttering vows each was longing to hear;
Tender his tones in their low modulation,
Timidly downwards her glances are cast,
Eyes match'd with sapphire, and cheeks with carnation,
Fair is the vision. How long will it last?

Think, when old Time, of all jokers the grimmest,

Whitens the tresses and furrows the brow,

Changing the forms that are lithest and slimmest,

Will your affection be steady as now?

True that to-day, in its ardent devotion,

Love takes no heed of the future or past;

Curbing and checking the tide of emotion,

Prudence should whisper: "How long will it last?"

All were in vain, though the caution be needed,

Prudence is ne'er the companion of youth;

Passion for aye leaves unnoticed, unheeded,

Warnings of wisdom and guesses of truth.

Forging the fetters that bind them together,

Gilding the hours that are flying so fast;

Careless of sunlight or stormiest weather,

Love never questions: "How long will it last?"

Two New Years' Eves.

A Tale of the Press Gang.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"By George, there she is again!" exclaimed Captain Hugh Alden, of His Britannic Majesty's Navy, as he was swaggering through the streets of the quiet little borough of Sandwich one fine December morning of the year 1811, and paused to look back at the retreating figure of a young lady closely wrapped up in furs, who had just passed him.

"She is a pretty girl and no mistake about it, and pretty girls are not so common in these outlandish parts of the kingdom that they can be just glanced at and forgotten. Now I wonder who she is?"

So pondering, he turned back and followed the subject of his eulogium. He watched her enter a doorway, over which was inscribed upon a board: "Thomas Burt, carrier to all parts of London, every Monday, and returning on Saturday night;" and muttered:

"Miss Burt—hey! Well, I must try and find out some more about Miss Burt. I've met her ever so many times, and each time she seems nicer and prettier. It'll be a strange thing if rustic Miss Burt resists the advances of—well, rather handsome and accomplished Hugh Alden of His Majesty's Service."

With these complacent notions he retraced his steps towards the quay on the bank of the sluggish Stour, where lay moored a smart cutter flying the naval ensign, and bearing in gold letters on her stern the name "Cynthia."

Captain Alden was in fact in command of the Cynthia, which was engaged upon "particular service" of a particularly unpleasant nature, at least to the inhabitants of the ports whereat she touched, inasmuch as she was engaged in impressing men for service on His Majesty's frigate Guerrière, daily expected off Sandwich on her way to America.

The cutter was naturally the object of much admiration and curiosity to the good folk of Sandwich, who, however familiar their ancestors might have been, in the palmy days of the old Cinque Port, with the spectacle of the entire national fleet within their waters, were strangers to the sight of one of the king's ships almost literally at their very doors, so that a very large proportion of them spent their days in lounging on the quay-side in groups, and speculating upon the possible reason for the appearance of such a phenomenon.

Captain Alden was pacing up and down the spotless deck of the cutter upon the morning following the little episode above described, inwardly praying that the Guerrière might be delayed on her passage round from Woolwich, in order that he might get another glance at the pretty face which had so charmed him. It was Sunday morning, and the number of quay-side loungers was greater than usual, so that the captain, who was really not a bad-looking man, and who was fully aware of the impression made upon simple minds by an attractive uniform, strutted his very best, and looked every inch a monarch. Great was his delight, therefore, when he espied amidst the gaping faces the pretty features of Miss Burt. Politely raising his hat, he said:

"Would Miss Burt like to step aboard and see the Cynthia?"

The young lady blushed, hesitated for a moment, and then without availing herself of the officer's proffered arm, jumped lightly down on to the deck.

"You do the Cynthia a great honour, Miss Burt," said the captain, "for it is not often that our monotonous lives are enlivened by the presence of ladies."

"But my name is not Burt," said the girl. "Who told you that it was?"

"Why—well, I saw you go into a doorway yesterday, above which was written the name of Burt," replied the officer, "so of course I made sure that you were Miss Burt."

"Oh dear no. My name is Mavis Carroll," laughed the girl. "Mr. Burt is my guardian."

At the name Carroll the captain started and stammered:

"Oh, Mr. Burt is your guardian! Then have you no father or mother?"

"I don't remember them," replied Mavis. "I came here when I was a little bit of a girl, and I was always told that I was an orphan."

The captain seemed lost for a few moments in profound reverie, and almost forgot his visitor, but suddenly recollecting her, showed her all over the ship to her huge delight, until the sound of the church-bells reminded her that she must go.

"And I'm sure you won't mind my bringing Tom, will you, Captain Alden?" said Mavis, as she stood with one foot on the accommodation-ladder, ready to jump on shore.

"Tom—who is Tom?" asked the captain.

"Tom! Why, he's—he's my sweetheart," answered the lass demurely; "such a dear old fellow, and so fond of ships, for he has been a sailor and knows all about them."

Of course the captain could not reject the proposal, so he said:

"Very well, then; bring Tom after church."

So the damsel thanked him, sprang on to the quay, and disappeared through the crowd which was slowly dispersing.

The captain left alone fell again into reverie.

"Mavis Carroll!" he muttered to himself; "fancy meeting Mavis Carroll here. Why, she's reputed dead long ago. By George! if the London lawyers only knew that she was alive! Why, I suppose I should have to give up that comfortable little income which I enjoy as having married her sister—the next-of-kin, as was supposed, to old Carroll. Married! That's a nasty word, but it's there staring me in the face. I married Dorothy Carroll and Dorothy Carroll is my wife—that is, if she's alive—I haven't seen her for five years; but I must be careful. And who's this Tom? Some slouching country bumpkin, I suppose, and he'll marry her, and her name will get out, and then— By George! he mustn't, he sha'n't marry her. It's a deep game, but it's worth playing, for if I can make this girl Mrs. Alden, the lawyers may come on as much as they like—unless—unless they find that I'm already married and that my wife is alive, which I don't think is likely, considering the state I left her in. Yes, it's five years since I got into that rage, and—"

He stopped short here, for the reflection was evidently unpleasant, went down below, lit his pipe, and filled himself a glass of spirits.

At the expiration of an hour and a half an increased hubbub and clattering of feet on the quay-side proclaimed the fact that the Sandwich churches were discharging their congregations, and presently Captain Alden espied his charmer threading her way through the groups on the arm of a burly, broad-shouldered young fellow, whose face, although of a jovial mould, was twisted into contortions occasioned by his wearing a very tight and uncomfortable suit of orthodox Sunday-black.

He was expected to arrive at about nightfall, although, as the snow was deep on the roads, he might be detained. However, the fire burned cheerily on the hearth, the old carrier was in his accustomed chair, with his long pipe in his mouth, listening to Captain Alden's lively chat, whilst Mavis, coquettishly arrayed in her best, was busily engaged in laying the table, ever and anon rushing to the window as she heard the sound of wheels on the rough cobble-stoned street. Seven o'clock chimed from the tower of St. Mary's.

Said the old carrier:

"The roads must be uncommon bad, to be sure. I guess they've a job getting down the hill from Ash. Howsomedever, he'll be all the readier for sommat to eat an' drink when he do come. I don't reckon that even sailorin' gives a man a bigger appetite, captain, than a long drive on a cold night."

Half-past seven chimed. The old man fidgeted in his chair, and Mavis stationed herself at the window. Still no Tom. As eight o'clock struck, she uttered a cry of joy, and rushed to the door, accompanied by the captain. The old cart, thickly coated with snow, drew up at the door, but no Tom jumped down from it.

"Now, Tom, it's too cold to be playing tricks," she cried. "Come out of the cart, I know you're hiding, and supper's been waiting ever such a while."

Still no answer but a low moan, which came from the dark recesses of the cart.

"Oh, he's hurt!" exclaimed Mavis, and sprang into the cart.

There was only poor little Jem there, huddled up in a corner amongst a heap of packages, crying bitterly. They lifted him out and brought him into the house. For some moments he was unable to speak from terror. At length he said:

"Oh, Miss Mavis, I dunno where Muster Tom be. We was comin' down Ash Hill, an' Muster Tom was drivin' an' I was lyin' down covered up behind him, when I saw a lot o' lanterns flash, an' the cart was stopped, an' a man says to Muster Tom, says he, 'Look here, my man, we want you, an' you'd better come quiet.' An' I looked an' saw a lot o' men dressed like sailors, with swords an' pistols, an' Muster Tom he said as how he wouldn't go, and he tries to make old Chestnut go on, but a lot o' the sailors they jumped up, an' there was a drefful fight, an' in the end they knocked Muster Tom down, an' the last I seed of him was bein' carried away like a dead body. And oh, please, Miss Mavis, I couldn't help it, an' I shouted, but I was all alone in the dark, an' old Chestnut she came on all of her own way."

Mavis, who had listened to this with eyes and mouth open, and her hand pressed on her heart, sank back into her chair and sobbed bitterly.

"The press-gang!" said Captain Alden. "Quick, Mr. Burt, we may catch them up, for there's some mistake. The Guerrière's got her crew, so that I can't make out what they want to be pressing for."

They rushed down to the quay. The Cynthia was alongside. They jumped on board and roused the watch.

"To the Guerrière," said the captain to the mate.

"Guerrière, sir?" exclaimed the man. "She's weighed anchor an hour ago."

"Mr. Burt," said the captain, in a voice of the deepest commiseration, "we are too late."

CHAPTER II.

It was a heavy blow to Mavis. Whilst her Tom was near her, from sheer vanity she played the part of a flighty, careless maiden, but now that the dreadful truth was staring her in the face, that the simple, honest, confiding fellow, who would have laid down his life for her, had been carried off by main force, never, perhaps, to return (for Sandwich folk were sufficiently familiar with the press-gang to know what the result of being pressed usually was), she felt the truth of Shakespeare's words:

That what we have we prize not to the worth
Whiles we enjoy it, but being lack'd and lost,
Why, then we rack the value.

The captain was temporarily master of the situation, but when he saw how Mavis took her loss to heart, he had the tact not to force his condolence and sympathy until Time should have softened the sting of the blow. He absented himself, in fact, from Sandwich, ostensibly to use his influence in procuring, if possible, the young man's release, in reality to go to the Admiralty in London and tender his resignation as an officer in His Majesty's service. Then he returned, low-spirited and despairing; and the poor old carrier, who, notwithstanding his long life's battling with all sorts and conditions of men, trusted and believed anyone who was not connected with the press-gang, felt deeply the kindness and sympathy of the suave captain, and regarded him as a protector and confidential adviser.

The captain set to work warily. He encouraged Mavis with the hope that, after all, Tom might return shortly; he told her that the very fact of his having been already pressed would militate in his favour; he assured her that peace between Great Britain and the United States was daily expected; he bade her keep up a good heart, and she spoke so kindly and cheerfully and disinterestedly that her old spirits gradually returned; and the pleasant intercourse between her and her new acquaintance, which had been temporarily interrupted, was resumed. Although the captain's quarters were nominally at The Bell Hotel, he spent by far the greater part of his time in the little house in Delft Street, and as the old carrier was always present during the interviews the captain had with Mavis, and invariably accompanied them upon the little expeditions they made in the pleasant early springtime, no construction other than harmless could possibly be put by gossiping Sandwich upon the marked attentions paid by the gallant officer to the humble household. It was clearly proved that Captain Alden had nothing whatever to do with the impressment of Tom Burt, and it was well known that he had spared no efforts to procure his release, it having been stated that he had been to the Admiralty in London especially for that purpose. Moreover, the old carrier spoke so highly of his guest, and the captain's deportment towards Mavis had been so carefully watched, that the fact was generally recognised that he was a friend and nothing more.

The only evil, in fact, which resulted from the turn affairs had taken originated with Mavis herself. She began again to draw contrasts between Tom and the captain; she was captivated by the latter's address; the wound caused by Tom's abduction healed in a wonderful manner, the blank occasioned by his absence was being so adequately filled; and by the time summer came round poor Tom was rarely spoken of, and in the estimation at least of the simple, susceptible girl, the captain was everybody. But she never forgot that her troth was plighted, nor did she by word or action give the captain the smallest hint that under a little pressure that troth would be broken.

So far, matters looked well for the captain's project, but there were one or two little things which somewhat bothered and annoyed him.

He was in the habit of receiving regularly from London, the London Packet and Daily Whitehall Intelligence, which for certain reasons he kept to himself, and burnt as soon as they were read. The great reason for this reticence was, that of late an unpleasant announcement had appeared in this paper to the effect that if anyone of the name of Carroll, claiming relationship with Sir Septimus Carroll, who died in the year 1790, applied at a certain address in the City, he or she would receive some valuable and advantageous information, and it was not at all convenient to the captain that any such relation should be known to exist—just yet.

Another disagreeable circumstance was, that he had an idea he was watched by a mysterious gentleman, a stranger in the town, against whom he was continually running during his progresses to and from the carrier's house in Delft Street.

So it appeared to the captain that if the iron was to be struck at all, it should be struck when hot, and he began regularly to lay his parallels and approaches to the heart of Mavis. He experienced less resistance than he had bargained for, and, as usual, was favoured with luck worthy of a better cause, for the news was spread about the town that on the 19th of August, the British frigate Guerrière had been captured after a fight of half an hour by the American frigate Constitution, and that the loss of life had been great.

The poor old carrier's state of anxiety upon the receipt of this news was deplorable, and again Mavis felt her heart touched in a sore place; but the captain was cheerful and sanguine, and told them that until details were to hand there was no need to despair.

However, in a fortnight's time he appeared with a long face, and the Intelligence in his hand.

"I am sorry to be the bearer of ill-news, Mr. Burt," he said, "and I hoped against it as long as I could; but read that;" and he handed the old man the paper.

The old carrier put on his silver-rimmed spectacles, read the detailed account of the fight, and then half-way down the list of casualties was:

"Thomas Burt, quartermaster's-mate, seriously wounded."

"And you know what that means," said the captain gently, taking the old man's hand in his.

"But, Captain Alden," said the carrier, wiping his eyes with the back of his hand, "you don't mean to say that my poor boy, my Tom, is—is—"

"No—no, I don't say that, Mr. Burt," interposed Alden; "but from my experience of the service, when a man's reported seriously wounded, especially if he's a prisoner as well, I fear it generally implies death—sooner or later. There's very little choice between a prison hospital-hulk and a grave."

The old man was deeply agitated, and said:

"Poor Mavis! She will never bear this!—I can't break it to her, captain—do you. Now Tom's gone, I seem to look on you as my friend—my only friend, and when you have to go, I shall be alone in the world. I did love poor Tom, and"—the old man stopped suddenly, his eyes flashed, his brow contracted, and he brought his fist down on the table with energy—"I'm ashamed of my country when I think that she wins her battles with poor fellows dragged away by brute-force from their homes, and their wives, and their sweethearts, and their occupations; and, although I'm an old man, if I could find out who it was that ordered my poor boy to be pressed, were he the Lord High Admiral himself, I'd kill him, for I hold him guilty of murder; I'd kill him—gladly."

So Captain Alden broke the news to Mavis. She was stupefied at first, and refused to believe it. Then she said:

"Captain Alden, when he is reported dead in the papers, or if he does not return by a certain time, then I will believe it. Now, I do not; I hope—oh, how I hope!"

Weeks passed on. Summer drifted into autumn, autumn faded into winter, still there was no news of Tom Burt. Captain Alden still remained in Sandwich, and, as may be imagined, improved every hour of every day to the utmost. His presence had now become an absolute necessity to the old carrier, who gradually became more reconciled to his loss, although he was never the same man as before; whilst his intercourse with Mavis was still closer, and they went out together without provoking comment except from lasses who had been rivals of Mavis for Tom Burt, and who declared that she had got over his loss in a remarkably short space of time, and that all along she had never cared a pin for him.

One fine November morning Alden asked Mavis to stroll with him to the ruins of the old Roman castle on the cliff, about a mile out of the town. Under the shadow of the grey, ivy-mantled walls, against which time and weather have fought so unsuccessfully for nearly nineteen centuries, they paused, and Alden opened fire.

"Mavis," he said, "you must know that I love you dearly, and that I have loved you ever since we first met; although, out of respect for poor Tom, I have smothered my passion. I know that you can never think of me as you thought of him; but now that he is—well, dead—tell me if you can take me into the empty place in your heart?"

Mavis looked at him for a moment somewhat in surprise, and then, affecting to be absorbed in the twisting of an ivy root, said:

"Do you mean—do you ask me, Captain Alden, to marry you?"

"Yes, yes," he replied eagerly, "that is what I mean. I have never dared to speak of love to you before, partly because, as I said just now, I knew that you were betrothed to poor Tom, and partly because it would have seemed so much like taking advantage of my introduction to Mr. Burt's house as a mere acquaintance. But now that it is evident that poor old Tom is——"

"But," interrupted Mavis, with a pleasant look which somewhat reassured the captain, who had not been very confident in the success of his bold stroke, "I can never give you the love, Captain Alden, which I gave to Tom. I like you very, very much, and I thank you for all your kindness to us in our trouble, especially to poor old uncle; but——"

"Could you not learn to love me?" asked the captain passionately. "I would be such a good tutor."

"Yes," replied Mavis; "but suppose poor Tom should not really be dead? I have heard of many men during this war—Ramsgate men, Deal men, Dover men, who have been reported as killed, and who have turned up at last."

"But if I tell you that he is dead," pursued Alden; "if I tell you that I have information to that effect——"

Mavis pondered, and twisted a stem of ivy into pieces, and the silence was only broken by the sound of the sea wind murmuring through the breaches in the masonry; then she said, speaking slowly:

"I will tell you, Captain Alden. Uncle has already spoken to me about you. I will talk to him, and I will give you an answer by the New Year."

"And I must linger six long weeks in suspense, Mavis?" said the captain sadly.

"I cannot decide straight off, for more than one reason," said Mavis. "I know I am only a simple country girl, but I have a conscience. I feel that much as I like and admire you, I don't love you—that is to say, I don't feel towards you as a girl should feel who accepts a man's proposal. Besides, I told poor Tom that I would wait until New Year's Eve. And now as it is getting cold, and there is a man coming along, and uncle will be wanting his dinner, had we not better return?"

They retraced their steps down the hill towards the town, and passed a little man, dressed in black, his hands folded behind his back, who was apparently lost in meditation, and did not notice them.

The captain was in no very sweet mood that evening. His dinner was ill-cooked, the fire smoked, and a company of bagmen in the adjoining room were making a great uproar over their pipes and drink, just at a time when he wished to think quietly over the position of matters.

The captain, like most old-school sailors, was superstitious, and the appearance of that black shadow constantly dogging his footsteps seemed to him a warning that, unless he was prompt and careful, his project would be fraught with danger. Who could the phantom be? And yet it was no phantom, for in the broad sunlight of that same morning the captain had recognised in the little man in black, his nocturnal watcher. He was pondering over this when the door of the room opened silently, and a figure draped from head to foot in black, and wearing a thick veil of the same colour, glided in.

A tremor seized the captain's frame as he saw that it was a woman, and he fairly started from the chair when a thin white hand raised the veil and he saw before him his own wife.

"Dorothy! Dorothy!" he hissed, "where have you come from? Is it you, or is it—is it your spirit? I thought you were dead!"

The figure dropped the veil again, and disappeared, as silently as it had entered, without a gesture or a word.

The whole affair was so rapid, and had been so sudden, that he was taken completely by surprise, and could not move. He who had braved dangers and perils in all parts of the world was as cowed and helpless as a child.

With an effort he recovered himself, and rushed out by the door, through the passage, into the dark street. There was nothing to be seen, there was nothing to be heard but the moaning of the wind.

"Pshaw!" he said to himself, "my imagination was on fire. It was but a freak of fancy. She's dead. I know it!"

The six weeks passed slowly and wearily to Hugh Alden, but there was no reappearance of his wife, nor did the mysterious little man in black haunt his footsteps. The advertisement, too, had been withdrawn from the London paper, and there was no further mention of the fate of those who had been captured in the Guerrière, so that he felt to some extent reassured, and looked upon his prize as well-nigh won. His visits to Delft Street were continued, and there was no indication in his pleasant, happy manner that there was a skeleton grinning behind the mask. One little thing alone somewhat disturbed him, and this was that Mavis, instead of growing more cordial and intimate as the time-limit approached its completion, seemed to be if anything colder and more reserved. This, however, he attributed to the natural anxiety of a girl on the eve of a momentous period in her life.

On New Year's Eve of 1812—a blustering stormy night which seemed to the fanciful mind typical of the struggle which was taking place between the year dying and the year at hand—old Thomas Burt, Mavis, and Captain Alden sallied forth, in company with many hundreds of other folk, towards the old church of St. Peter's, in the belfry of which the "youths" were assembled for the purpose of ringing out the old year and ringing in the new.

In these days New Year's Eve was very much more of a popular festival in England than it is at present.

Time-hallowed custom ordained that the banquet should be spread, that every house should be thrown open, that master and servant, high and low, rich and poor, should for a time be on a footing of perfect equality, that old grievances and old wrongs should be forgotten, in order that the new year should be entered upon in the true Christian spirit of charity and forgiveness.

Captain Alden offered Mavis his arm up the belfry steps, for Thomas Burt, as churchwarden, enjoyed the privilege, accorded only to a few, of "assisting" the ringers in their task. Mavis declined it. A chill came over the captain at this ominous commencement of proceedings.

The ringers were assembled, stalwart fellows with their sleeves tucked up, each with his rope in hand; huge jacks of ale stood on a bench at the side, and all waited in silence until the first stroke of midnight.

It boomed out, and was echoed from the other two old church-towers, and mechanically hats were doffed in silence as the succeeding eleven strokes made the old tower quake and rock with their clangour.

Then the ropes were seized, backs were bent, and at a word from the leader the chimes proclaimed the arrival of 1813 with such deafening peans of joy that Alden had to draw Mavis aside in order to make her hear the question which had been burning on his lips for so many long weary weeks.

"Will you be my wife, Mavis?" he said.

"No, Captain Alden," the girl replied with a dignity and firmness he had never before witnessed. "You have a wife still living, and I—I have a true sweetheart still living."

Alden staggered as if struck. Everything—the belfry, the forms of the ringers, of Mavis, and old Thomas Burt—seemed to swim before him. He clutched at the wall as a man drowning, and then, without looking back, fled down the steps.

The streets were still filled with groups of people hurrying to and fro, anon stopping to grasp hands and exchange compliments, anon darting into open doors to claim the privilege of first-footing. All was gladness and festivity, everyone seemed happy, and yet that one figure clove through the crowd with hurrying steps and muffled face as if flying from a pestilence. He hurried on by the back streets towards the quay.

Suddenly he heard a cheer; he knew the sound as the hare knows the holloa of its pursuers—he now the hare who had so long been the pursuer. He turned aside to escape notice, but ere he had traversed a dozen yards, rough hands seized him, and he heard a familiar voice shout:

"That's him, lads! That's Alden, of the Cynthia. Don't let him go."

Alden recognised Tom Burt.

They led him to the quay-side, where a boat was in waiting; they hustled him in; he saw that he was the only pressed man; the word was given, the oars plashed in the sullen waters, and the victim was hurried on to the fate to which he had consigned so many others.

A dozen yards from the shore he heard a shriek, and looking back, could espy a tall female figure on the quay-side, waving her arms frantically.

Tom Burt, who was steering, stood up and sung out the very same words that Alden had used:

"Too late! too late!" But he added: "Never fear! Go to the carrier's house in Delft Street. I'll be back soon."

But little remains to be told. Tom Burt received a perfect ovation in the town on his return the next morning, and found Mrs. Alden at his father's house, already half-consolated in the society of her sister Mavis. Tom and Mavis were married, and shared with the old carrier and Mrs. Alden the property which had been so long alienated by the villainy of Captain Hugh.

When peace was made at the end of the year 1814, Alden returned, a sobered, altered man, and for many years after the old carrier had been carried to his last resting-place in St. Peter's churchyard, there were no happier couples in Sandwich than Tom and Mavis Burt and Hugh and Dorothy Alden.

Snowdon House.

(A SHORT SERIAL STORY.)

PART IV.

HER father was at home when she arrived. He, perhaps, had formed some conjecture as to what would be the result of the morning's trip, for he looked enquiringly at her as she entered the room.

Agatha did not make a direct reply in words, but held out the arm, on the wrist of which her new bracelet sparkled, with an answering smile.

"That is splendid, indeed, Agatha!" cried the doctor. "I should suppose it was given on some special occasion."

This led to an explanation, at the conclusion of which the girl said:

"I spoke to him also about his kindness to you. I told him I had not heard of it until this morning, or would have thanked him earlier. He was most considerate in the way he treated it."

"He told you I had given a bill, perhaps," said Fulham, "or would do so when he advanced the money?"

"Yes. But I told him also that I knew it was valueless without security," replied Agatha. "I was sure of that."

"Perfectly so," returned the doctor. "He called it a matter of form—so it is. It would not be much more in any such case; but I know that he has ordered a clause to be inserted in his will to the effect that in the event of his dying before me, this bond is to be given up—in point of fact, the money is a gift."

"He is a generous man!" cried Agatha. Then added something in a low voice, not intended, probably, for her father's ear.

The doctor caught a syllable or two, and replied:

"Too good! Nonsense, Agatha! no man is too good for a good wife, and you will make him one, I am sure. No man could ever ask a better. Besides, you are giving up other eligible chances in his favour."

"I am giving up—what do you mean?" asked his daughter.

"You need not look so alarmed and turn so pale," said the doctor with a laugh. "It is of no consequence; but I dare say you know something about it. It is only a letter from your amiable half-aunt, Mrs. Gurdon. Good Heavens! child, are you faint?"

"No—no," said Agatha, who had turned suddenly pale, and sank upon a chair. "It was only momentary. Please go on."

"Well, I am glad it was only momentary," repeated the doctor doubtfully. "I have seen many a patient in this room with just such a look. She writes in behalf of a Mr.—Mr.—Where is it? Oh, Mr. Tummell—a highly respectable person, it appears; a well-to-do tradesman in the village, consequently a neighbour of their own, and, moreover, a deacon in their chapel. These united recommendations will, she evidently considers, be too strong to be resisted; and although there is a half-implied idea that the worthy Tummell is throwing himself away, and is altogether too good for such a thankless person as yourself, yet, as he is Tummell, and as you are Agatha Fulham, your aunt will act as an ambassador. She offers you, in that capacity, the hand and heart of Tummell—his shop and his pew in the chapel go with them, I don't doubt. Do you know Mr. Tummell? She seems to say you do."

"Oh yes!" laughed Agatha, who had recovered herself by this time. "I know him, and had heard something of his being a victim to the tender passion in past days. But oh, if you were to see him!"

"That shudder is too genuine to allow me to think that Tummell has a chance," continued Fulham, who was in high spirits, and disposed to be especially pleased with his daughter, to whose influence he knew he owed his good fortune; "poor deacon! But your aunt grows mysterious in her hints a little farther on. She talks of some obstacle which she knows to exist, and which ought to be overcome. She says 'he' will never be seen there any more; who is he? I am afraid, Agatha, you must have been very fatal during your twelve months in Cheshire. And why should 'he' be an obstacle? Here is what she says: 'I know why Agatha refused this worthy man, who offered her a position so far above anything she had a right to expect. But of course that obstacle is removed; he will never, can never come back, and as Mr. Tummell is charitable enough to forget the past, she may be thankful for the opportunity.' The doctor's prolonged speech had given Agatha time to recover herself, and he was too much amused in reading the letter to notice her closely.

"Oh, Aunt Gurdon was always saying something of the kind," returned Miss Fulham, in the most careless tone she could assume. "How shall you answer her?"

"I think I had perhaps better tell her of your approaching marriage," answered the doctor; "we shall hear no more of the deacon after that. Don't you fancy that will be the best plan?"

"No, I think not," said his daughter after a pause. "I should prefer her not knowing anything about it until—" She left this sentence unfinished, and went on: "She is so ill-tempered a person, that the less she knows the better. I would write to her, of course, acknowledging the letter, and saying that you could not give any promise to use your influence as she has asked you, but would write to her again in a short time. Then, when you do write again, she may learn the reason why Mr. Tummell need not trouble himself any more."

The doctor laughed again, and agreed to write as suggested; he probably would have agreed to any suggestion made by his daughter that evening, in such an excellent temper was he.

Then he gave Agatha an account of the negotiations on foot for the purchase of Dr. Z——'s practice—negotiations of which we have already given some hint. It only needs to be said that this was one of the best connections in Bridgeley. So much higher indeed was it than the practice of Dr. Fulham, that the latter would have been at a disadvantage in taking to it, had not Dr. Z—— promised to remain at least a year with him, in order to familiarise him with the patients.

The telling of this took up some time, for the doctor was highly loquacious, and although a temperate, even an abstemious man, felt justified in taking an extra glass of wine on so auspicious an occasion. His daughter listened with an appearance of interest, and smiled at his not very pungent jests, as women can do, but she felt the discussion as an infliction, nevertheless. Dr. Fulham was not satisfied until he had passed in review all the events of the day, and had again and again congratulated his daughter upon her good fortune.

"With such a pair of ponies as those," he said, in what was, happily for his listener, his concluding speech, "and such a carriage, you will cut out all the second-rate stuck-up gentry of this stuck-up town, who have tried to look down upon us. It will be our turn now. I thought of that as I walked homewards after leaving you this morning. After leaving you, by the way, I had a little adventure, or, if not exactly an adventure—Well, well, I won't trouble you with that. I can see you are tired, Agatha, so good-night; do not sit up any longer."

His daughter, having kissed her father, gladly obeyed this injunction, and left him to the indulgence of his cigar, and the reveries which were now so delightful, and so different to the gloomy harassing trains of thought which were his only a short time before. He did not need the aid of his wine to maintain these reveries, for, as just said, he was a temperate man; yet long after his daughter had been, as he thought, in bed and asleep, he sat up musing and picturing the pleasant future.

But he was mistaken in supposing that he was the only watcher in his house—the only one who had busy thoughts which could banish sleep. The conversation he had held with his daughter, the tidings which he had communicated, had in her mind jarred terribly with the day's proceedings in which the doctor found such unalloyed pleasure, and had awakened afresh memories which kept the girl from her pillow for hours.

More than once she smiled scornfully, and even laughed audibly, at the picture of her suitor, and almost persecutor, Mr. Tummell; the feeling excited by his name was more of contempt than anger, but it was not so when she thought of her aunt, Mrs. Gurdon.

"That woman hates me," she thought, "and would not, and never will, scruple to do me any mischief she can compass. Her letter of to-day proves that. She was in hope to provoke enquiry if I remained obstinate. Well, there is one comfort even in this: she has told all she knows now, she can do no more harm, and her arrow has fallen short of its mark. When I can think more coolly on the matter I shall be glad she has done her worst, but now I can only think of—the past."

Whatever her thoughts of the past might have been, they were certainly not pleasing, for she sat with knitted brow, and often quivering lips, until far into the night. At last she shed some tears, and this seemed to relieve her, so that she soon slept.

During her vigil it had never occurred to her to frame a single conjecture as to the nature of the little adventure to which her father had so slightly alluded.

When Dr. Fulham left his daughter and Mr. Wayre, his round of visits occupied him a considerable time, and finished in the iron-works or Shaletown district. Not much longer, he thought to himself, would his calls so often lead him to such poor neighbourhoods as now contributed the bulk of his town practice, involving so much work and so little profit. In Shaletown he had not many patients. There was a "club doctor," and on his books most of the hands were entered. Dr. Fulham's practice, therefore, lay chiefly amongst such dwellers in the locality as were not employed at the factory.

He had seen the last of his cases, and was going home, taking, for a short cut, a half-finished street, which promised to be even uglier and more grimy than the main street—such as it was—of the place, when, as he was passing one of the cottages, a man came out directly in front of him. The man would have come out, it would be better to say, but he slunk back on seeing the doctor, as though to escape observation. It was too late for this, however, as Fulham's quick eyes had seen and recognised him.

"Ah, my patient of last night!" exclaimed the doctor. "Have you felt much of your injuries to-day?"

Before answering the man glanced warily over his shoulder into the room behind him, where his questioner could just see a woman and one or two children.

"I am pretty well to-day, thank you, sir," replied the man; "pretty well considering, I mean. My hand is rather sore. I have been at work all day, and that rather tries it."

"At work with such a hand as that—as either of them—" cried the doctor, "and with such wounds on your neck? You must be mad!"

"It's all very well to say 'don't work' and the like to poor fellows like me," retorted the other; "but how are we to live?"

"Well, you must decide that for yourself," said the doctor, "but your injuries should not be neglected. Are you not in the club?"

"No, sir," returned the man, after another glance over his shoulder. "I have not been any great while here. And would you mind my walking a little way with you, sir? My wife is in there, and she is fidgety enough already about my hurts, and if she was to hear you say much about them she would get worse. Besides, she does not believe I got hurt as I say I did."

"Humph!" ejaculated the doctor. "Your wife is a shrewd woman, I don't doubt. Come with me by all means."

A doctor, even if he be among the most superfine of his class, can afford to walk with any poor, ruffianly, or suspicious-looking person without incongruity or losing caste in the slightest degree, so no one thought it strange to see Dr. Fulham walking down Spanner Street, and across the ragged field which lay beyond, on his way to Bridgeley, in company with, and listening to, one of the hands from the factory.

"Before you say anything to me," began the doctor, "I wish you would answer a question which has been in my mind from the moment I saw you. Have you always been a labourer, or anything like it?"

"No, I have not," replied the man. "I have been better—and worse."

"So I supposed," returned Fulham. "That is all I have to ask. Now go on."

"You did not believe last night that I had cut myself with panes of glass," continued the other. "You told me as much."

"I believe I did," said the doctor. "I was certain then as to how the lacerations were really caused. I am certain now. They were done by a dog."

"Ah, you think so, do you?" returned his patient. "And what dog should you suppose?"

"The dog that tore you," interrupted Fulham, "was the great hound at Snowdon House—Mr. Wayre's. Of course, you need not be afraid of my betraying you, but, for your own sake, do not run the risk again."

The man made no answer to this warning, but walked on in silence for a few paces; then he said:

"Is what I have heard true, doctor—that it is your daughter who is to be married to Mr. — to the gentleman at Snowdon House? You need not feel offended, sir; no offence is meant."

"No offence may be meant, perhaps," retorted Fulham, "but your question sounds so impertinent a one that I should like to know what you do mean by it."

"I take an interest in it if it is true, sir," replied the man, "and I do not feel hurt by your angry tone. I expected it. But it will not hurt you, nor the young lady either, to answer me; and my question does not concern her any further, when once you have answered it. I only want you to say if I am right."

The man's language and manner were so different to those which were common to his class that the doctor could not help answering him in a different strain to that in which he had at first replied, while at the same time he was conscious of an uncomfortable feeling, almost akin to a foreboding, at such a strange question being so put.

"The report is correct, so far as we can speak of matters which have not yet happened," he answered; "but what it has to do with you I cannot see."

"It has nothing at all to do with me in itself," replied his companion; "but it shows that you are the person I want—at least, I think so. With your permission, I will call on you again, when I hope to get you to do me a favour. We are at the high-road now, sir, and as I am not fit company for a gentleman, I will leave you, thanking you for your attention."

Without saying more, he turned upon his heel, and Dr. Fulham, after watching him for a few seconds, resumed his homeward walk. After some meditation he at last struck upon what seemed to him the correct solution of this puzzling interview and conversation.

"He is a begging impostor of some kind," he muttered; "and he wants me to use my influence with Mr. Wayre in order to get him something. He will find it difficult to get forgiveness for his battle with Nero. Mr. Wayre will send him to Bridgeley gaol for that, if he has the chance. That he means begging of some kind I am sure. If he has been at the game long that will account for what I took to be his superior address; just a part of his stock-in-trade, that is all."

Although the doctor thus declared himself certain that he had found the key to the man's language, he kept recurring to the matter in his thoughts, and debating it, as though it were not so completely settled as he had asserted.

However, when he reached home, the receipt of Mrs. Gurdon's letter, followed by his interview with his daughter, and, above all, the intelligence which she brought, quite obliterated the remembrance of his interview with the man, or at most allowed him to regard it so slightly, as to be content with the most casual mention of it, as shown.

"I dare say he will look me up, according to his promise," was his reflection on the next morning. "Men of his stamp don't forget such appointments. Egad! I don't even know his name."

Dr. Fulham had now not much time to speculate on this, or any minor matters; the near approaching marriage of his daughter, and the purchase of Dr. Z——'s business, absorbed him sufficiently. The past time had been full of anxiety for the doctor, but the rocks were cleared away now; no longer was there any restriction on his credit, and not the slightest shadow of a county-court fell across his path. Beyond even these substantial reliefs, were the improved spirits and increased docility of his daughter. All through his diplomacy and management, even when it seemed most successful, he had a dread of some difficulty with her; but she was changed now.

"And, by Jove!" muttered the doctor one evening, as he thought over the position, "she ought to be satisfied, if ever a girl was! What a chance for her! I believe Wayre might have married many a nobleman's daughter, if he had been so inclined."

This reflection took place at his favourite period for meditation—while he smoked his cigar late at night, and after all business for the day was done.

It was only a day or two after his interview with the man at Shaletown, yet recent as was the event, it was not in his mind at the moment, and when he heard some one turn the handle of his surgery-door, the lateness of the call surprised him, but he did not even think of his still later visitor of only a few nights back, until the door was quietly opened, and a grimy face looked in—a face which he at once recognised as that of the man from the ironworks.

"Good-evening, doctor," said the stranger; "I see you are alone. You will excuse my not knocking, as I did not want to attract attention. I saw a light, so took the liberty of entering."

"Quite an oration from a factory labourer," thought Fulham; then added aloud: "Come in, my friend, and sit down. I suppose this is the interview for which you asked a day or two back?"

"It is, sir," replied the visitor, who carefully closed the door behind him, and then took the chair to which he was invited; "you will not mind my troubling you, I feel convinced."

"I am not so sure of that," thought the doctor, but merely said aloud: "Go on."

"You perhaps know my name, sir?" continued the other, whose manner grew more embarrassed as he went on. "You do not? I thought you would have found that out. I am employed at the ironworks in Shalatown as John Brooks—everybody knows Jack Brooks, although I have not been there long."

"But you are not Jack Brooks; is that what you wish me to understand?" asked Dr. Fulham. "You say you are employed there as Jack Brooks, which is as much as saying that you are there under a feigned name."

"Well, I will be shot if you are not the sharpest party I ever had to deal with!" exclaimed the other with genuine admiration in his tone. "You ought to have been a lawyer, not a doctor. Anyhow, you are quite right; my name is not Jack Brooks, nor anything of the sort. You remember that I asked you if your daughter was the young lady who was going to marry Mr. Wayre?"

"You did, and you also said that your business did not concern her," returned the doctor. "As that is the case, you will please to leave her name out of our discussion."

"No offence, sir; I shall say nothing which can annoy either the young lady or yourself," said his visitor; "but the fact of such a marriage being probable causes me to speak to you. I also said I should ask a favour; you remember that?"

"Of course I do, and I wish you would come to the point at once," cried Fulham, who began to feel all this preface somewhat irritating. "If you have anything to ask, ask it, and have done."

The man did not seem quite able to comply with this command at first, but hesitated, and made two or three distinct gulps, as though he found some difficulty in speaking.

"The favour I shall ask, sir," he said at last, "will be the easier for you to obtain, because of your influence through this marriage; you will be glad to see it arranged, and that is why I ask you. Of course you know Mr. Wayre—Mr. Luke Wayre—very well?"

"I do," returned the doctor, who was watching the speaker very closely, and with great attention, as though he felt that the deferred explanation was now really at hand.

"But—but you did not know him before he came to these parts, I think?" continued Mr. Brooks.

The doctor shook his head without speaking.

"So I thought," resumed the man; "well, you do not know, perhaps, that he has been married before?"

"Yes, I do," replied the doctor; "I have long known that he was a widower. You do not dispute that he is a widower, do you?"

A sudden thought had flashed upon the doctor's mind, that perhaps this fellow had come to declare the existence of a previous wife. The idea was wildly romantic—absurdly so, indeed, he felt as he thought it—but it did great credit to his presence of mind to be able to smoke his cigar unmoved, and to look his visitor in the face without betraying the slightest sign of the shock it had given him.

"Oh, he's a widower, there's no doubt about that," replied the man; "but he was not altogether happy in his married life. It was the fault of others more than himself, perhaps. I would not have admitted as much some time ago, but I do now. Did he ever tell you that he had any children?"

"No," said the doctor, rising more erect in his chair, and looking at Brooks with a sudden increase of keenness; "I know, if he had, that he has none now, for he has repeatedly told me that he has no one in the world dependent on him."

"He is right, quite right," said the man, whose embarrassment still increased; "but for all that he had a son, a wild young fellow I don't deny, but the mother took his part when he might not have deserved it. A great deal of trouble came through this, and among other things the young fellow, perhaps, has to answer for breaking his mother's heart. His name was Saul—a curious name you will say, but it was that of his mother's father."

"How do you know all this, and what has it to do with me?" asked Fulham, as the other paused.

"You will soon see how I know it," replied the man; "it will depend upon yourself whether it has anything to do with you. I think you will be glad the matter has come into your hands. Well, the mother died, the son left home, which he was forbidden ever to enter again. He knew his father's resolute temper too well to suppose he would change in this resolve. A little while afterwards Mr. Luke Wayre heard that this young fellow had died. He made some enquiries, which quite satisfied him that this was the case, and I believe he went into mourning. He must have been glad in his heart to learn that his son was gone, for their quarrel was bitterer than I have perhaps given you to suppose. But the son was not dead, nor has he died since."

"How do you know?" said Dr. Fulham, and his voice was in turn husky as he spoke.

"I know it, because"—the man paused for an instant here, then went on with a change of tone, and with more firmness than his previous speech had displayed—"I know it, sir, because I am Saul Wayre. I am the justly discarded son of the man your daughter is about to marry."

Startling as was this announcement in itself, it did not greatly startle the doctor. There had been a foreboding in his mind, during a great part of the conversation, which warned him that he was about to hear some strange disclosure, while the tone of the visitor's remarks, vague as they were, had to some extent prepared him for what was coming. Nor had he the least inclination to doubt the truth of what he heard; on the contrary, he immediately felt a conviction that the story was absolutely true.

"If this is as you tell me," he said, the other pausing for a while, "why do you not go to Mr. Wayre yourself? He does not bear malice, I dare say."

"Perhaps not," returned the man; "but there is a disagreeable fellow in his service, one Ezra Crake, who hates me, and would inform about me. I tell you honestly, it was me that the dog seized the other night, and my hurts were from that dog's bites. You found it out, as I suppose any doctor would have done. I have been hanging about the place a good bit—Snowdon House, I mean; among other things, I wanted to see the girl who was likely to be my mother-in-law. No offence, doctor, it was only natural."

"And did you see her?" asked Fulham.

"No," returned the other, "I could never get away at the right time; but I did see a girl there once—well, that don't matter, I knew it wasn't your daughter because—nor does that matter. On that night I tried to creep to the house to see if a sister of Crake was there, whom I used to know, and who used to be friendly with me. I have learnt since that she is not there. I got very nearly killed in trying to find it out that night. No; if I appear in person Crake will peach."

"Crake will peach! What do you mean?" exclaimed the doctor.

"It must come out sooner or later," replied the visitor, "so I tell you I mean this. He knew that I was not dead, and he knew that I had committed an offence. It was called highway robbery, but was a paltry affair enough, for which I was sentenced to penal servitude for a long time. I should not have been dealt with so severely but for my assaulting the officer who arrested me, and that was through my being excited by drink. Yet Ezra was deceived in his turn; he thinks I died after getting my ticket-of-leave; as you see, I did not. I committed another offence—it is of no use disguising it, you know, now—and was recognised. I got away, but of course I have been compelled to change my name, and hide myself ever since. If the police get me, I shall go to Portland for long enough to last my life, I know."

"But how does this Crake know of your conviction, when your own father was in ignorance of your existence?" asked the doctor.

"Why, because I sent to the sister I told you of, a good old soul," replied the man. "I sent to her, by a sure hand, for money to get a lawyer. The poor old girl had none by her then, so was obliged to borrow from Ezra, and had to tell him about me. I believe he was glad to think I had got my deserts, but this sister, who had been my nurse, made him swear to keep the secret. I find she is dead now, and he would do anything to injure me, but, as I tell you, he thinks I died after my release."

"And what do you tell me all this for? What do you want me to do?" demanded Fulham.

"I want you to tell the governor all I have told you—that puts me in his power, and your power as well," answered the man; "I tell you both I should be sent to Portland to work out my old sentence and a new one besides. Ask him for enough to start me and my family—I have got a wife and two children to keep—in Australia, or America, or somewhere, and you may bet your last coin I shall never come back again. I don't want to interfere with the governor's comfort, I have done enough in that way; but he might forgive and forget so far as to lend me a helping-hand once more."

"This is a strange tale," said the doctor; "how am I to know?"

"If you want any proof," interrupted the other eagerly, "you have only just to tell Mr. Wayre all I have told you, and take him half-a-dozen lines which I will write, referring to something known only to us two, and you will be thoroughly satisfied. I will see him if he wishes it; but I must avoid that man Crake. I once thrashed him in a quarrel, and he has never forgiven me."

The doctor sat and smoked his cigar in silence, during a pause which must have seemed tediously prolonged to his companion; but the latter waited patiently until his reverie was finished.

"I do not know what to say to you to-night, and that is a fact," said Fulham; "I know where to find you, so can communicate with you at any time, and you have shown that you know where to find me. I must have a day or two to think this over. You have waited so long, that it cannot hurt you to wait a little longer."

"It can't hurt me, as you say," returned the man; "only that my wife and young ones are half starving on the wages I get, and I don't want to prolong that a minute more than I can help. We are a rough lot, of course, but I'm just as fond of them, you know, as if I had married a duchess."

"I don't dispute it," said the doctor, rising to show that the interview was concluded, and there was something in his tone which perhaps implied contempt of the sentiment just expressed; "but never mind your domestic affections. You shall hear from me soon."

"I say!" exclaimed the other—there was a change in his manner which instantly dispelled the assumed indifference of the doctor, and the latter looked round with a swift glance in which there was perhaps something of alarm. Brooks—to call him by his first name—was an altered man; there was a scowl on his face not pleasant to see, while his features seemed suddenly to have hardened into those of the convict and outlaw he admitted himself to be. "I say," he repeated, "you don't mean any foul play, do you? You are not going to put the police on to me, are you? I don't like your looks, and if I thought you meant peaching, I'm — if I wouldn't—"

He thrust his hand into his pocket, in lieu of finishing his sentence.

The doctor at once guessed he kept his knife there.

"I won't 'peach,' I tell you that," said he; "and I tell you this too. If you are fool enough to offer any violence here, I will shoot you."

As he spoke, without moving from the spot, he took from a drawer a revolver, which he cocked.

"I do not travel in these localities without protection, my friend," he continued; "but I am not much afraid of you. Go home, and in a day or two you shall hear from me."

With a few grumbled words which might have been an apology or a defiance, so indistinct were they, his visitor slunk off, and the doctor, with a quiet smile, replaced the weapon in the drawer.

"At any rate," he muttered, "I never will travel in these localities for the future without such protection."

Grey.

GREY hangs the grey sky o'er the rain-drenched hills,
Grey mases the clouds above the setting sun,
And the sere leaves the low winds, moaning, beat,
Sink to the wet grey grasses one by one.

Grey as the autumn gloaming shows to me,
Looks the blank future spreading for his eyes,
Musing on whom, the cold slow-gathering tears
Blur all the darkening world and sullen skies.

Yet with to-morrow light may wake again,
And the broad sunshine dazzle gaily down;
And with to-morrow hope and joy may rouse,
And laugh to scorn misfortune's lowering frown.

And as the birds and flowers forget the chill,
And as the brave young heart surmounts the sorrow,
Will the pale watcher catch reflected glow?
Nay—for Life's autumn dawns no second morrow!

The Old Oak Chest.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

"AND when Ralph de Bohun was fighting at Agincourt, her ancestors were blacking boots and sweeping crossings," I said angrily.

My mother had been smiling before, now she laughed outright.

"Oh, Ralph, Ralph," she said, "do not be so wrathfully proud. Besides, are you quite sure that there were any boot-blacks in those days, because I am not?"

"Pshaw, mother! what has that got to do with it? You know very well what I mean."

"I don't think I do, my dear. It is not like you to be so angry about a trifle. I have no doubt Miss Lile really admires the chest very much, and you know old oak is all the rage just now."

"Yes, and of course she thinks that we have no right to anything fashionable, especially anything which 'would suit The Grange so perfectly.' But she shall never have it."

"So you told her, my dear—with rather unnecessary emphasis, I thought."

"Not at all, mother. I meant her to understand me."

"But you need not have hurt her with your abruptness."

"Nonsense! mother, she was only angry. I couldn't hurt her if I tried. She is much too high and mighty to feel hurt at anything I could say."

"Ralph," mother said gravely, "I think you are most unjust. You judge a gentle girl very harshly."

Judge her harshly! I, who worshipped the ground she walked on; I who, though she was "Lady Clara Vere de Vere" and I only the "poor yeoman," had dared to find my heaven in her eyes, my sole earthly joy in a sight of her sweet face, a word from her ripe, red lips.

If mother was right, and I did indeed judge her harshly, then my passion and my misery must be my excuses.

She was not really Lady Vere de Vere, only plain Miss Lile, but then she was so rich; whilst I, Ralph Bohun—we had dropped the "de"—was literally as poor as Job. It was quite true what I had said in my haste, that when my ancestor Ralph was fighting at Agincourt hers were blacking boots, or performing whatever menial work the lowest of the low did in those days. For the Liles were nowhere as to family, though in almost the first flight as to wealth. We had steadily grown poorer and poorer, they had grown rich almost at a bound, and yet I dared to love her.

I had guarded my secret well, or so, at least, I fancied until this day of which I write. Then, when she had come down to see mother, as was her daily wont when she was at The Grange, something she had said or looked made me fancy that I had been deceiving myself, and that she knew my weak madness, and pitied me.

She had been admiring—for the thousandth time—a great, grandly-carved oak chest, whose history of antiquity was told in the simple fact that "it had always been in the family."

"I never noticed before," she said, "how perfectly it matches the carving in the Oak Room at The Grange. How well it would look standing between the windows there!"

"Possibly that was its rightful place once," mother said quietly.

"What do you mean, Mrs. Bohun? Was it sold from The Grange?"

"No, my dear; it was moved before The Grange was sold."

"What! did the Trenfields move it?"

"No; it was moved, I believe, when the Trenfields purchased the estate from Mr. Bohun."

"From your husband?"

"No; from his grandfather."

"But then— But perhaps you would rather I did not ask any more about it?"

"Indeed, dear, I do not mind. It is an old tale now, and I am sure I do not often think about it, for, of course, it all happened long before my time. But years and years ago The Grange and all the country round was owned by the Bohuns. For generations they had flourished and prospered; but in the time of Ralph's great-grandfather, fortune turned shy of them. The Grange was the first to be sold, I have heard; then piece by piece the land went until this little place is all we have left."

"How sad!" the girl said softly. "How much you must regret it, Mr. Bohun! How many visions and plans you must have for winning it back again!"

"I hope Ralph is too wise to indulge in any such vain regrets or futile plans," mother said hastily. "We are happy and content at The Dene, and that is enough."

"It is enough for the wise, I know, but we are not all wise enough for that, Mrs. Bohun. Some of us are foolish enough to indulge even more hopeless plans and visions—more's the pity."

Those were the words which rankled in my mind, which made me fear she had seen through my hopes and visions, and wished to give me a friendly hint as to their utter hopelessness.

So when after a moment's pause she turned to me, saying, "Well, I should dearly like to see the old chest back in its proper place again. Will you let me have it, Mr. Bohun?" I answered harshly and abruptly:

"Never, Miss Lile. You are quite mistaken if you think that I have the slightest wish or intention to replace or restore anything."

She looked gravely at my flushed face, but said no more to me; only, as she was going away, she laid her little hand on the old chest with a caressing touch.

"Good-bye, you dear old thing," she said softly. "I don't despair of putting you back in your own proper nook one of these days."

She had come to say good-bye to us also, for she was going away on the Continent for several months.

"But I mean to be home in time to bring you a Christmas-box," she said to mother at parting. "I should not like to spend Christmas anywhere else."

After mother's rebuke of my harsh judgment, I wandered away into the old garden, to smoke my pipe and think it all over. But the more I thought the more miserable I became, until I arrived at the resolution to try and induce mother to consent to The Dene being sold, so that we might go away, far away from the Liles, The Grange, and all the rest of it.

And many times during the next three months I did try, but quite in vain.

"If you want a change, my dear, by all means take one," she said gently. "I will get some one to manage in your place, and when you are tired of wandering, then come home to me again. But, as to me, I am too old to change."

But of course I would not do that. I would never leave her who had been more than all the world to me until Lillian Lile came into my life.

Mother heard from Lillian now and then. Bright, friendly, gossip letters they were, which pleased the dear old lady very much.

But by-and-by they ceased to come. For nearly six weeks we heard no word of her, and then, one day, there came a letter with a heavy black border to the envelope, telling of sad news within.

She said that her father was dead—had died after four weeks' severe illness—and that she was starting for home at once.

"For, though we only lived at The Grange so few years," she wrote, "yet it feels more like home to me than any other place on earth. I am all alone now, dear Mrs. Bohun—quite alone. Papa told me that, when he was gone, I should have three hundred thousand pounds, absolutely, to do just as I liked with. Three hundred thousand pounds, and not one single living relative! Oh, I do feel so very, very sorry for myself."

"Poor child!" mother said when she had read the sorrowful letter; "poor, lonely, over-burdened child! Whatever will become of her?"

"Oh, no doubt she will do very well," I answered rather shortly; "of course she has plenty of guardians, and trustees, and all that sort of thing, to take care of her."

"To take care of her money, I dare say, but that is not all she will want. We must be good to her, Ralph."

"Nay, mother, she won't want much of us now, unless maybe she still has a fancy for the old chest."

"Ralph, why are you so unjust to her? She has never made a parade of her wealth, or assumed anything on the strength of it; she has always behaved to us as to her equals."

"Her equals! Of course we are; but she does not think so. She would not think so as to any serious matter."

"My dear! what matter more serious than the daily civilities and kindnesses of life could ever arise between us? and as to those, she has always been irreproachable."

It was clear, you see, that mother had never guessed my secret, had no idea that my heart had allowed itself sometimes to dwell on the possibility of there one day being far more than mere kindnesses and civility between Lillian Lile and me.

How should she guess such a thing? How should she ever imagine that her sensible, practical, farmer son could soar so far into the region of wild imaginings? I was glad and relieved that she could not, and sternly resolved that she never should be so troubled.

"Had you any idea Mr. Lile was so rich as that?" I asked presently.

"I always understood he was very rich, but never heard at all how rich. It is a fearful responsibility for a woman to be so wealthy."

"Oh, she will soon get someone to help her bear that, mother. Her only difficulty, I expect, will be to know how to choose amongst so many."

"Ralph, I do not at all like your manner of speaking of Miss Lile. I—"

"All right, mother, I'm sure I don't want to speak of her; it is no pleasure to me, I assure you."

Which was quite true. I did not care to speak of her, for I was in constant fear lest I should betray myself; but I thought about her every minute of the day, and a good part of the night.

I quite believe that the utter hopelessness and imbecility of my passion fed and strengthened it. I knew, of course, that I—the poor owner of a paltry three hundred acres of land, and an old tumble-down house—might as sensibly hope to woo and win a royal princess as this wealthy young plebeian. People would not have thought me half as mad had I fixed my affections on one of Earl Rosslyn's impecunious daughters, and I should have been quite aware that such an aspiration would not have been half as hopeless as the one I was fool enough to indulge.

Mother had another letter from Lillian, written after her arrival in London, where she was detained by business. She again bewailed her lonely lot, and spoke of her money with something very like loathing.

"People are very kind," she said, "and I hate myself for being suspicious of their kindness; but how can I help it when so many of them warn me against each other, bidding me beware of fortune-hunters, and of those who only seem friendly for the sake of something my money or influence can do for them. Oh, Mrs. Bohun, I am sick of it all already, and I think with horror and dismay of the long future before me, and of the load of responsibility I must bear. It would have been so different if papa had brought me up differently; if I had never known any life but such as they all say I must live now, and ought to have lived all the time. They say it was wrong of papa to live so simply as he did, and to bring me up as if we had only a few hundreds a year; but, if it was wrong, it was very pleasant, and I wish—oh, how I wish—that I need make no change! Papa lived simply, I know, but, if he did not spend much money that way, he did in better ones. I had no conception of the amount he gave away, until all his papers were examined, and then we saw. I think everybody was surprised. Old Mr. Grant—he is the lawyer, you know, and a very grave, stern man—turned to me, and said quite softly: 'My dear, your father very literally obeyed the injunction not to let his left hand know what his right was doing.' And yet they say that all this must be altered now; that, being a woman, it will be better and safer for me to go in the known and well-worn tracks of money-spending, and a great deal more of the same sort. I have promised to think it over, but I shall not decide until I have been to The Grange for Christmas, and talked it all over with you. I intend to be down one day in the first week in December."

When mother had read this letter she gave it to me to read also, and as she never asked for it again I have kept it ever since as one of my dearest treasures.

I was as bad as a child reckoning for its first holidays; I counted the days—aye, and the hours too—until I should see Lillian again. Knowing all the while that her coming would bring me nothing but sorrow, I yet longed, with an unspeakable yearning, for the day which was to give her back to us for a little while.

But before the day really came something happened which put all thought or care about it out of my mind. My dear mother met with a sad accident, which nearly killed her outright, and the effects of which laid her prostrate on her bed, and kept her for many weary days hovering between life and death.

I scarcely ever left her. The neighbours were very good, but I did not like to leave her alone with strangers; and there were none of our own kin near enough to come to us.

Everyone who has nursed the sick knows that the worst and most lonely times are the hours when day is changing to night, and night giving place to day. I used to feel sometimes at these periods as if the best thing which could happen to us two would be just to lie down and die, as we had lived, together.

It was when mother had been ill more than a fortnight, and I was feeling more than ever miserable and despairing. The dull, heavy semi-stupor in which she had been most of the time had given place to an intense restlessness, which, I heard the nurse whisper to a neighbour, "seemed to show that the end was near."

I was alone with her, for the nurse had gone down to her tea, and feeling in every nerve of my body the suffering which I had no power to alleviate.

Presently I heard, without heeding, a slight noise at the door, and after a minute or two became aware in some mysterious manner that I was no longer alone or lonely.

I cannot define the feeling, nor try to account for it. I only know that, whereas a moment before I had felt to the last degree lonely and despairing, now I felt that comfort and hope, in full measure, were come to me. Yes, I felt all this, surely and completely, before I looked round and saw Lillian Lile standing just within the dim light of the shaded lamp.

She was standing quite still, her hands clasped loosely in front of her, and her fair face, with its halo of golden hair, looking like an angel's on an errand of mercy.

She raised her finger warningly as I looked round at her, and came softly over towards the bed. I rose as she came near, and held out my hands towards her, more with a feeling of adoration as to some unearthly presence than of a greeting to a friend. She took them in hers with a gentle pressure of the soft little fingers, and with a silent nod and little smile sat down in my place while I went and stood by the fire, watching her as a devotee would watch his patron saint.

I cannot tell you exactly what she did. I saw her smooth the hot, tumbled pillows, straighten the rumpled clothes, touch the patient's face with soft fingers and rosy lips, bathe the hot forehead with cool essence, and caressingly stroke the thin, restless hands which lay on the quilt.

I had done all this scores and scores of times without any result, but now, to my wonder, I saw that every touch seemed to have its due effect. The dear old grey head lay still and peaceful on the pillow, the hands ceased their restless moving, and the haggard eyes softened, flickered consciously for a second or two, and then closed, softly and restfully as a little child's.

Lilian sat still for a long while, tirelessly ministering these gentle comforts. Every moan was soothed by a tender touch, or gentle easing of position; every restless movement of the hands was met and allayed by that firm but tender stroking or pressure, till by-and-by the regularly-drawn breath told of a natural sleep.

Then she rose and came and stood on the other side of the fire opposite to me.

"Why did not you tell me before?" she whispered. "It was not kind."

Even then it was on my tongue's end to say, "How should I know you would care to hear anything about poor folks like us?" but I resisted the demon of pride this once.

"If I had known you had been a magician, you may be very sure I would have told you long ago," I said.

"A magician?" she questioned, smiling up at me.

"Yes; it must be magic you have used. She has not slept like that before, since it happened."

"She was ready for it. I saw that directly I came in. I am very glad I was in time."

"When did you come home?"

"By the four o'clock train."

"Then, haven't you been to The Grange?"

"No. They told me of Mrs. Bohun's illness, so I came at once to see how she was. You do not mind?"

Mind! Does a shipwrecked mariner mind the sight of the life-boat? Or a condemned criminal the sight of pardon or reprieve? No, not very likely; but just as likely as that I should mind her coming.

But I did not say so. I only said, as steadily as I could, that I was very, very grateful.

And from day to day she stayed on, only going up to The Grange occasionally; and from day to day my mother's health mended. In a week from the time of Lilian's coming she was able to sit up; in another, she was well enough to allow of my carrying her downstairs; and, though very feeble still, was evidently on the road to perfect restoration.

It was on St. Thomas's Day that she came downstairs; and on the 23rd Lilian announced her intention of going home.

"You can do without me now, Mrs. Bohun," she said, "and I always meant to spend Christmas Day at The Grange."

"My darling," mother said, kissing the sweet face which was so near her own, as Lilian knelt by her chair; "my darling, how shall I ever thank you for what you have done for me?"

"Your 'mother's-love,' which I have never felt before, you know, has thanked me already."

"Not half enough, and I do not know how. You must tell me, child."

"Perhaps I will—some day," she said gravely.

I went away early in the day on which she was going, for I could not bear to stay and say good-bye; but when I got home again, almost at nightfall, she was still there.

"Why are you so late?" she said reproachfully. "I have been obliged to send the carriage back twice."

"But what difference could my coming make to you?" I asked indifferently.

"Why, you did not think I should leave until you were back to keep your mother company, did you? Besides, I wanted to say good-bye."

"Oh, good-bye!" I said shortly. "Pray don't let me detain you any longer; but I am wet through, and must change my clothes before I go to mother."

"Of course you must—and before you catch cold. So good-bye for the present. I shall soon be up to see about things."

"You are very good," I said coldly.

"Am I? Will you be good too, and do as I ask you?"

"Certainly—if I can."

"Thank you; that is a promise, mind."

"A promise in the dark," I said gruffly. "What am I to do?"

"Come up and see me after dinner on Christmas Day. I shall be very lonely, you know."

"I cannot."

"Why not?"

"I cannot leave mother alone."

"Ah no—perhaps not. Well, I must bear my loneliness as best I may, then. Good-bye. Do go and change your things directly."

But I did not obey her injunction. I went to my room, to be sure, but, when I was there, I forgot my wet clothes and everything else but my misery; and—well, the long and the short of it is I made a thorough fool of myself.

"Mother, will you mind being left alone for a little while?"

"Alone, Ralph! Are you going to church?"

"No, mother; but I want to go out a little while, if you don't mind."

"Go, by all means, my dear. Ruth will come and sit with me."

I did not tell her I was going down to The Grange, for I had not quite made up my mind, only I was too restless to stay indoors. But, when once I was out, my feet seemed to follow my wishes, and almost unconsciously I found myself being ushered into Lilian's presence.

"I was almost sure you would come," she said. "See, I have put your chair for you," pointing to a luxurious lounge close to her own low seat.

I sat down without trusting myself to speak. I felt that if I once began, then I should not be able to stop on the hither-side of utter madness; so, wisely, I gave myself time to cool down.

But it was hard work. Sitting there, so close to her, surrounded by the subtle atmosphere of her presence, listening to the soft tones of her voice, and looking into the depths of her soft violet eyes, no wonder I felt my senses in a whirl.

"Well," she said presently, "have you nothing to say to me? I thought you were come to entertain me."

By a tremendous effort I conquered my excitement.

"Yes," I said quietly. "I have plenty to say. I have to thank you for the magnificent presents you sent us to-day."

"Do you approve of my selection of books?"

"Approve! They are just what I have always wanted, but—"

"Of course, I knew that."

"But how? I never told you."

"No; you have never told me anything; and yet I know much. I am glad you like them."

"I do like them. But—"

"Well? But what? You have said 'but' twice over. What is it?"

"Nothing. Only you do so much for us who can do nothing for you in return."

"Yes, you can."

"Can I? What can I do?"

"You can give me your old oak chest."

I felt stunned. What could it mean? Could it be that she had only meant this all along; only meant to put us under so much obligation that we could refuse her nothing, not even this whim on which she had set her heart?

The thought maddened me.

"No!" I said shortly. "I said I never would give it you, and I won't."

"Will you bring it back then?" she said, smiling at my vehemence.

"Bring it? No, that would be the same thing. I cannot do it, Miss Lile."

"I think you can. I think your heart would show you a way if you were not too proud to listen to it."

"I do not know what you mean," I said harshly.

"I think you do. I think I have read you rightly, Mr. Bohun."

"As to what have you read me, Miss Lile?"

"As to this—and answer me truly, please. If you were as rich as I am, or I as poor as you, would you, or would you not, ask me to be your wife?"

"Heaven knows I would not only ask but have."

"Then why not ask me now?"

Not the most arrant prude, the strictest stickler for propriety, could have accused her of aught unmaidenly in speaking thus. I never so accused her for one single moment; never hesitated in the answer I should give her.

Neither did I put her to the shame of hesitating in its utterance.

"I do ask you, my darling," I said, kneeling by her low chair, and drawing her close within my arms; "I do ask you, Lilian, to be my dearly loved and honoured wife. If you will give yourself to me, I will try to make myself and my name worthy of your wearing."

"You are more than that already," she answered softly, and nestling more closely to my side; "far more than that or I should not have ventured to be so bold."

I freely confess that when the first excitement was over I had many a sharp tussle with my pride. But one thing I always fell back upon. If she had the best of it as to wealth, I had the best as to name and descent; and so I managed to persuade myself that, after all, the inequality was not very great; and that when I went to The Grange as my home it was but going back to my own.

Of course the old oak chest went also, and was received with much parade and mimic deference. I took nothing else from The Dene—where, spite of our entreaties, mother persisted in continuing to live.

We have spent many happy and prosperous years since then, with no thought of inequality to mar their serenity. I resumed the "de" to my name on my marriage, and went with my wife at once into society, which received us cordially, as it always does receive great wealth. I have been in Parliament some years now, and I flatter myself have made myself known there. My eldest child—sweet fairy Lilian—is just now getting ready for her presentation at Court; my eldest boy is at Christ Church, and my two next at Eton, and, separately and collectively, they are such as no father could fail to be proud of.

But if I ever venture on a word of self-praise, or even self-congratulation, I am laughingly asked how I think it would have been without the aid of the old oak chest.

Brass Repoussé Work.

TEN years ago brass had almost disappeared from our dwelling-houses. The cheerful substantial old fender which brightened the fireplace in winter was displaced by one of cold steel and cast-iron, with, possibly, some introduction of paltry ormolu. The bands which used to surround the stoves, and throw out the heat, were voted old-fashioned, and not to be tolerated. Gasaliers were of sober bronze. Candlesticks, first banished to the kitchen, soon disappeared even from thence. Door-handles were removed when it was possible to obtain substitutes in china, plain or decorated.

Now this phase of taste has passed, everything is reversed, and brass is the heart's desire of every person of taste, or desirous of having a reputation for taste, who furnishes a house. The rejected old fenders are looked up, and bought at fancy prices. Modern fire-irons, imitations of the departed old ones, or at least in character with them, are de rigueur. Gasaliers and girandoles of brass are for use, and for ornament the old brass candlesticks are disinterred. The china plates are replaced with repoussé brass ones, while the rooms are gay with picture-frames, trays, bellows, inkstands, boxes, and many other useful and ornamental articles, of which brass is the most conspicuous ornamental feature.

The most favourite drawing-room occupation of the present is brass repoussé work, the great army of ambitious amateurs striving to copy, or at least imitate, the work of professionals.

Repoussé work is the term applied to sheet metal in gold, silver, or brass, in which ornamental patterns are pushed out, that is to say, raised in relief. When the attention has been drawn to repoussé work examples will present themselves in every house, from the venerable silver sugar-basin, or cream-ewer, down to the smallest card-tray obtained, perhaps, from a Christmas-tree. The old workers in precious metals wrought by hand. Much of our modern work is cast, or it would not come within reach of limited purses. The repoussé work of the modern drawing-room is an attempt to revive hand-work, and make embossed, or chased work, by a punch and a hammer. In its simpler stages, where only very thin and ductile metal is employed, the art is very easy, but skill is required to produce highly-finished work with elaborate designs.

There are two kinds of brass used, rolled and sheet; the former is made in long lengths and various widths and thicknesses; the latter is dearer, being sold by weight, and is good for advanced work when skill has been acquired and larger pieces of work are attempted. Sixpenny-worth of rolled brass, a small hammer such as is supplied in a child's tool-box, and one or two French nails of different sizes, will be quite sufficient materials for a beginner.

To the inexperienced eye repoussé work seems to be done from the back, and many a conjecture has been hazarded how the fingers of an old silversmith worked inside some very small cream-ewer or cup. The pattern is, in reality, produced by indenting the lower parts from the front, and leaving the higher in relief.

Take the thin sheet of brass and decide exactly what is to be done with it, whether it is to be a card-tray, a finger-plate for a door, a bellows-side, or only an experimental piece of hammered work. Assuming that a small card-plate is intended, cut with a sharp shears a circular piece from the plate, and mark with a lead-pencil an inner circle showing where the edge is to be turned up when the centre is finished. In selecting a design remember that all the work is divided into pattern and background, and it is upon the latter that most of the labour is expended. Trace with a pencil a simple pattern—a leaf, one or two scrolls, a Maltese cross, even a succession of small circles will answer for first attempts. Those who cannot sketch can transfer a pattern with tracing-paper; or a design on thin paper can be pasted on the metal. In tracing the design keep the sheet of brass flat upon a board, or a leaden block. For a beginner it is well to have sufficient margin to the brass to turn an edge over the board, as it is apt to turn up.

The nail is used as a punch, and it is well, if the point be very sharp, to grind it broader, as it is liable to go quite through the brass and make a hole. Take the nail in the left hand, the hammer in the right; strike gently, following the outline of the pattern with a series of small dots, very faint at first, so as merely to trace the design. Fill up the ground with a series of little dots close together, and it will be seen that the main design, the motive as it is called, is in relief, and the ground lies below it. This is the whole principle of repoussé work of every kind, but details are added in practice which produce work of a higher class.

For instance, at parts of the motive at which it is desired to raise the design exceptionally, the sheet of metal may be turned, and the leaf, or flower, or scroll, very gently beaten out with the hammer only. The Arabs, who make the brass salvers, familiar in the Oriental shops, face their work with a coating of pitch, and work from the back, beating out the design, then turning the front, clean it, and finish it upon the right side. Pitch is, for ladies, dirty, and not to be recommended, and a great deal of pretty work can be done without resorting to this unpleasant medium.

Patience with perseverance is the secret of good repoussé work. The punch must be used gently at first, going again and again over the same lines. Each time as the ground falls lower and lower, the pattern rises higher and higher. Where a line is to be traced, to mark out the vein of a leaf or any other feature, it must be scarcely perceptible the first time, and deepened time after time.

When the central ornament of the card-tray has been perfected in this manner, the edge must be gently turned up with a round-nosed pliers, and goffered.

Though the nail is suggested as a cheap tool for practice, it is but a clumsy substitute for the real tool, the punch, which professional metal-workers use; and it is impossible to introduce much variety into the groundwork without having a few of these mats, as they are called, of different sizes and patterns. Tracers are for outlining the pattern, which is best done in short lines, so carefully joined as to be like freehand drawing. They are either curved for waved lines, or straight for more formal patterns. Mats are punches with patterned points, circles, trefoils, crescents, etc., and cost about sixpence each. These are used for fancy grounds, and imitations of Oriental chasings. A flattener is useful also, in case the background gets lumpy, to gently beat it down evenly, but with care, not to lower the raised pattern.

The last thing to be done before taking the sheet off the board is to go once more over the outline, remembering that one severe blow will drive the punch right through, and mar all the beauty of the work.

Where it is not convenient to turn over a superfluous margin to steady the metal, lay it upon a board and drive broad-headed carpet-nails into the board all round, letting the tops keep the edge of the brass in place.

With regard to the articles which ladies can make in brass repoussé work, the list may be a long one, or it might be very short, according to individual taste.

A sconce, or hanging candlestick, is a simple article to begin with. Cut a strip of brass sheeting four inches by twelve; turn three inches horizontally; hammer in a pattern; punch out a small hole to hang it by. Get the tinsman to solder a socket on the projecting portion to hold the candle. The upper part acts as a reflector, and the idea can be enlarged, other shapes, such as ovals, circles, shields, etc., being wrought in pretty designs, to hang behind wall-lights, gas, oil, or candles.

Finger-plates for doors are so useful as well as so pretty, that beginners take pleasure in making them. It is a drawback to the satisfaction derived from bringing a finger-plate to artistic perfection that it is necessary to invoke the aid of a professional metal-worker to mount the plate into a thin brass frame to give it finish. In this frame are drilled the holes for brass screws to attach the plate to the door.

Round-headed brass screws are more effective than flat for all brass repoussé work.

Bellows-covers transform a very homely little domestic friend into an elegant gift, and the amateur will soon acquire the art of nailing on the plates neatly, drilling the holes in the brass first, and then using round-headed brass nails of small size. Panels for covering blotter-cases are very popular with amateurs, being easily fastened upon the sides of a writing-case.

As soon as some degree of proficiency has been obtained, it is well to procure professional tools, including a round-headed hammer for beating out the high relief from the inside.

For early efforts the blunted French nail will answer very well.

When the brass, either sheet or rolled, is purchased, it is not polished, and some workers send their specimens to a workshop to be completed. All this adds to the expense and certainly to the difficulty of turning out anything fit to use, or for a bazaar. Vinegar and salt will bring the brass to a good surface, but the burnishing must be done with care, not to beat down, or otherwise injure, the design already carefully executed.

For advanced workers in repoussé many things are possible which would be rather outside the scope of these instructions, which are intended only for beginners, who perhaps have but a few tools. Among these are hinges, plates, brass clamps, key-plates, and other additions to furniture. As these are more substantial, their polish and finish are more important. It may be necessary, after the vinegar and salt, to dry the brass thoroughly, and apply oil and emery, polishing with a chamouis pad,

A still more advanced use of brass repoussé is to make hanging-basins, suspended by chains, in which bowls of flowers may be placed.

In the middle ages the brasero, according to the Spanish term, the braciere of the Italians, was an indispensable article of furniture in large interiors. The huge fireplaces could radiate heat to those who drew round the hearth, but everywhere else it was necessary to be fortified against the effects of ill-fitting doors and windows, and this necessity was met by the brasier; it also served to warm the hands, and over the hot ashes and glowing charcoal it contained were often placed small vessels of perfumed water, which neutralised the fumes of the charcoal, or was otherwise used for ordinary purposes. These old brasiers are charming models for the hanging baskets when they can be met with; but it is rather beyond an amateur to hammer the shape perfectly, so the brasier in its plain form must be cast before the ornament is hammered in.

Arabs and Arab Stories.

LOVE and constancy as understood in Europe were by no means unknown to the early Arabs, and many stories are extant which illustrate the sentiment. Of these we select the following:

Muawiyeh, the first of the Omniade caliphs, was sitting in his council chamber one very hot day at noon, when he saw an Arab approaching whose jaded appearance and limping gait showed that he had performed a long and toilsome journey, and who was evidently making for the palace. The caliph watched him attentively for some time, and at last exclaimed: "Did God Almighty ever make a more wretched creature than this one who has to walk abroad in such a heat and at such an hour?" He then commanded his attendants to admit the poor fellow so soon as he should demand an audience. Being ushered into the presence the Arab began a complaint against Merwan, Muawiyeh's vicegerent at Medina, who, he said, had grievously wronged him. The caliph bid him state his case, which he did as follows:

"Oh, Commander of the Faithful! I had a wife whom I loved, and who was the joy of my heart; and I had a young camel to which I looked for the maintenance of my darling one and me. But misfortunes came upon me, my friends fell off and my neighbours shunned me, and my wife's father took her from me and drove me from his door. Then I came to thy vicegerent seeking redress, and he summoned my wife and her father before him. But when the prince saw her he was seized with admiration for her, sent me to prison, and compelled me by tortures to divorce her, and has married her himself, and now I come to thee for justice."

Muawiyeh's wrath at this recital knew no bounds, and he at once sent peremptory orders to Merwan to restore the woman, threatening to make him "meat for the eagles" if he refused. The viceroy immediately dispatched the woman to Bagdad, but sent with her a letter to the caliph, in which he excused his conduct and hinted, in verse, that his sovereign might probably feel the same temptation when he saw her. Nor were his prognostications wrong; for when the woman was brought before Muawiyeh "he found her appearance charming, her beauty, grace, and symmetry unequalled, and her wit and eloquence without a peer." Instead, therefore, of at once repairing the injustice for which he had so sternly rebuked Merwan, he made the Arab a handsome offer of "three full-grown virgins like moons, with a thousand gold dinars apiece," and an annual pension from his civil list, if he would consent to give up the girl. On hearing this the Arab sobbed aloud and said: "I came to thee for protection against the son of Hakam, but to whom shall I turn from thine?" "By Allah," said he, "I would not take the caliphate itself were it offered without her." Then Muawiyeh replied: "Thou hast confessed thou didst divorce her, and Merwan has divorced her too. Now she shall take her choice; if she choose any but thee, we ourselves will wed her; but if she choose thee, then take her, she is thine." The Arab consenting to this, Muawiyeh turned to the woman and said: "Say, Saïda, which is dearest to thee: the Commander with his power, his rank, his palaces, his empire, and his wealth; or Merwan, with his tyranny and wrong; or this poor Arab, with his hunger and his want?" "By Allah," she replied, "I will not desert him, oh, Commander of the Faithful, because the times have changed and because the days grow dark. I cannot forget that I have been his companion from the first, nor is our love worn out as yet. Should I not bear with him in adversity who have been happy with him in brighter days?"

Muawiyeh was not always lucky in his own marriage relations. One of his wives was Maisûn, the daughter of Bahdal, whom he brought from among her people, a wandering Bedawin tribe. The luxury of a Damascus palace, however, had slight attractions for her. She pined for her home in the desert, and one day her imperial spouse heard her reciting the following lines:

A tent wherein the breezes blow
Is dearer than a palace fair;
A crust upon the floor below
Is dearer than the daintiest fare;
The winds that in each crevice sigh
Are dearer than these drums I hear;
An 'Abbah' with a gladdened eye
Is dearer than these gauzes here;

A dog that barks around my tent
Is dearer than a fawning cat;
The camel foal that with us went
Is dearer than a mule like that;
A boorish cousin, though he be,
Too weak to work on my behalf,
Were dearer, dearer far to me
Than yonder clumsy rampant calf.

The caliph, on hearing this last uncomplimentary comparison, packed off the lady again to her desert friends.

Among the many cruel and superstitious customs practised by the ancient Arabs, and one to which Mahomed effectively put a stop, was that of burying their female children alive, which was apparently most often done to avoid the expense of their maintenance, though sometimes from a mistaken idea of sparing them a life of trouble or disgrace. The following proverbs, "An excellent son-in-law is the grave," and "To bury daughters is an act of mercy," sufficiently indicate the Arab feeling on this point; and even to the present day a Bedawi, if asked how many children he has, replies by only enumerating his sons, for, as a Sinai Arab once said to the writer, in their eyes—El Benat battaleh—"Daughters are good for nothing." A terrible story is told of Kais ibn Asim, a chief of the tribe of Taim, who, finding that one of his daughters had been saved at birth and brought up in another family unknown to him, got possession of her and buried her alive. They relate that the only tears that this man was ever known to shed was when he kissed his little daughter before consigning her to her living tomb and she brushed the grave dust off his beard.

A certain king went to visit a madhouse and found there an intelligent-looking youth, who, after replying sensibly to a number of questions put to him by the sovereign, at length addressed the latter, saying: "You have asked me many things; I will now ask you one. At what period does a sleeper enjoy his sleep most?" The king reflected awhile and said: "While he is actually sleeping." "That cannot be," said the madman, "for he has no perception while asleep." "Then, before he goes to sleep," said the king. "How can one enjoy anything," said the madman, "before it comes?" "Then," said the king, "after he has been asleep." "Nay," said the madman, "a man cannot be said to enjoy a thing that has passed away." So pleased was the king with the other's wit that he determined to make a companion of him, had a table set out in front of the window of the madhouse, and bade his attendants hand a cup of wine to himself and one to his mad friend. "You drink your cup," said the latter, "that you may become like me; but if I drink mine, whom shall I be like?" The king, on hearing this speech, threw away the cup, and remained a total abstainer for evermore.

"Two travellers had halted in the desert, and had just killed a couple of fowls for their dinner. Before they could dress the birds the hour of prayer arrived, and they turned, like good Muslims, to their devotions. A fox, who had been skulking in the neighbourhood, seeing them thus engaged, came boldly up, and carried off one of the fowls before their eyes. Prayers over, they began lamenting their loss, when, to their amazement, they beheld the thief at a little distance, dragging his tail submissively behind him, and holding the fowl in his mouth. He then deposited it on the ground and slunk away, with every sign of repentance and contrition. They at once hailed the occurrence as a miraculous testimony to their own piety, and ran to pick up the fowl which had been thus strangely restored to them. On reaching the spot, however, they found that Reynard had only restored the skin with the feathers on, and, in the meantime, had slyly stolen round to their camp-fire and made off with the remaining moiety of their dinner."—(Palmer's "Desert of the Exodus," p. 182.)

"A certain shepherd had a dog of which he was very fond, and which having, to his great grief, died, was buried by him with every mark of affection and regret. The cadi of the village, whose ill-will the shepherd had in some way incurred, hearing of this, ordered him to be brought before him on the serious charge of profanity in having mocked the ceremonies of the Mahomedan religion and buried an unclean animal with sacred rites. On being asked what he had to say in his defence, the prisoner thus addressed the magistrate: 'If your reverence will be pleased to hear my story, you will, I am sure, excuse me. My dog's mother died when he was quite a puppy, and he was brought up by a she-goat of my flock, who adopted him. When she died in her turn she left him all her property, consisting of several fine young kids. Now, when my poor dog was taken ill and found himself at the point of death, I asked him what I should do with the kids which belonged to him, and he replied: "Give them to his reverence the cadi." I thought the animal so sensible for this, that I gave him Muslim burial.' 'Quite right,' said his reverence. 'What else was the lamented deceased pleased to observe?'"

Animals play an important part in the folk-lore of the Arabs as of other nations, and the Mantik ut tair, or "knowledge of the language of birds and beasts," is regarded as the greatest divine gift, and was expressly vouchsafed, according to the Koranic legend, to Solomon, the son of David. Apropos of this the Egyptian poet Beha-ed-din Zoheir has written a clever epigram:

A foolish atheist whom I lately found
Alleged philosophy in his defence;
Said he: "The arguments I use are sound."
"Just so," said I, "all sound, and little sense."
"You speak of matters far beyond your reach,
You're knocking at a closed-up door," said I.
Said he: "You do not understand my speech."
"I'm not King Solomon," was my reply.

Bahram, the Sassanian King of Persia, was so careless in his administration, that half the towns and villages in the kingdom became ruined and deserted. One night, while on a journey, accompanied by a Mobed, or Magian priest, he passed through some depopulated villages and heard an owl screech, and his mate answer him. "What do the owls say?" asked the king. The Mobed answered: "The male owl is making a proposal of marriage to the female, and the lady replies: 'I shall be most delighted if you will give me the dowry I require.' 'And what is that?' says the male owl. 'Twenty villages,' says she, 'ruined in the reign of our most gracious sovereign Bahram.'" "And what did the male owl reply?" asked Bahram. "Oh, your majesty," answered the priest, "he said: 'That is very easy; if his majesty only lives long enough, I'll give you a thousand.'" The lesson, say the historians, was not lost upon the king, who reformed his ways.

The Chemistry of Conversion.

THE Sanitary Engineer of New York is responsible for the following yarn:

A reporter had to attend a meeting at a Wesleyan Chapel for the conversion of the Hebrews to Christianity, after which he reported some addresses on the conversion of sewage into lime and cement. In the printer's hands the folios got mixed up, and the report read: "The Chairman, after the meeting had been opened with prayer, explained that the conversion of the Jews was one of the greatest works that could engage the attention of our sanitary authorities. Filtration was the most perfect method that could be adopted for purification; but a filter had its limits. There was a popular notion that the sewage contained a vast amount of wealth, but the sludge must be taken out of it for purposes of irrigation, as it otherwise choked the pores of the land, and they were a wandering race spread over the whole face of the habitable globe. They were denied the inimitable blessings of Christianity, which might be counted by thousands of tons per annum allowed to run to waste, when by a judicious admixture of lime and clay, the benighted Hebrews who sat in darkness might easily be converted into lime and cement for building purposes, and if thus deodorised, after being first dried and burned in a kiln, this ancient race would once more take its proud position among the nations of the world. Subscriptions were earnestly solicited for the purpose, though he (the speaker) disclaimed any idea of making a profit out of the process, and, in conclusion, he urged increased efforts in the good work, showing that, thus deodorised by a very novel process of evangelisation in large tanks constructed for the purpose, the grateful Hebrews might flow over the land without injury to vegetation, while the expense of conversion, which was progressing as rapidly as the best friends of Christianity could wish, would be more than repaid by the sale of the phosphate of lime and valuable cement for building purposes."

CONSTITUTIONAL TENDENCIES.

IN this world, none of us enter life with absolutely healthy bodies. We may be perfectly free from any visible trace of disease, but we have in us a lurking tendency to it under some form. Such tendencies are of course hereditary. They may come to us from our parents or our grandparents (for a generation is frequently skipped over by them), or they may have never appeared in our direct descent, but only among collateral relatives. How such seeds of disease may develop in future years depends in most cases on the individual and the history of his life. Sometimes the disease asserts itself so soon and so strongly that death ensues during infancy or early childhood. The amount of knowledge, good sense, and care which surrounds each child can do much towards making or marring its constitution. The mortality of infants is very great, and it is impossible to account for it without laying some blame to the ignorance or carelessness of those entrusted with the care of infant life. On the other hand, the number of preventible deaths among adults quite able to take care of themselves is very large. Not a few of these premature ends are due to unchecked constitutional tendencies. And it is in such cases that the individual duty and responsibility exists.

LET us now make quite clear what we mean by constitutional tendencies. A person may be born with a disease which does not show itself for years. Yet the disease is there, ever ready to spring into activity. In other cases a child may be born with no actual disease, but as life goes on it manifests a special weakness on certain lines—a peculiar tendency to certain diseases. In the first case the seed, as it were, is in the soil—in the other the soil is only ready for it. The practical use of considering this subject is that, by knowledge, judgment, and self-control, much may be done to check these tendencies.

WE can best make our meaning clear by giving an illustration. Of all constitutional tendencies, that known as "scrofulous tendency" must certainly rank as the commonest. The term is difficult to define. The word "scrofula" is derived from the Latin "scrofa"—an old sow—the reason being that scrofulous persons are liable to swollen and enlarged glands, which, when occurring in the neck, may have been thought to give them some resemblance to a pig. Doctors learn to know a scrofulous person by a kind of instinct, just as we learn to know our neighbours by their faces, though it would be impossible for us to give a description of their features, adequate to explain our recognition.

It has been the custom with some physicians to describe two classes or types of scrofula. One class consists of dark, coarse-haired people, with long eye-lashes, and pasty-looking skins; a thoroughly unhealthy appearance. The other class includes fair people with blue eyes, and with skins so soft and thin that the blood shines through, giving a brilliancy to the complexion—an appearance rather of fragility than of disease. Most of the beautiful heroines, described by third-rate novelists, are to the medical eye merely scrofulous subjects! Any attempt at classification must be, however, but very partially successful.

SCROFULOUS people show their inherent weakness at every turn. If they receive a wound, it takes long to heal—much longer than in a healthy patient. A blow which would produce little effect on a strong person, often leads to serious mischief in the scrofulous. Their tissues seem feeble. There is a flaw, as it were, in each of the bricks which build up their "tenement of clay," and so a trifling vicissitude wrecks them. A slight cold, for example, will linger with such persons for months, or even years, and finally end in consumption. They are very subject to the glandular enlargements from which their tendency seems to get its name. In these, matter may form. They also suffer frequently from indigestion and diarrhoea.

A PERSON, then, who without any very definite symptoms, is described as scrofulous, is simply one who from general physical weakness in certain parts and tissues of the body is specially liable to a certain set of maladies. Recent researches go far to prove that this feeble or scrofulous habit of body is peculiarly likely to become the prey of an infinitesimal plant called the bacillus of tubercle. Once his microscopic organism has entered the system at some weak point, distinct symptoms of scrofula appear. One other point must be mentioned here to complete our bird's-eye view of this vast subject. It is, that a person born quite healthy and free from all scrofulous taint, may yet develop it by improper diet, bad air, overcrowding, depressing habits, or imperfect recovery from other forms of suffering.

THE reader's mind now probably asks this question: "What are we to do to combat with the foe which you have described to us as so formidable?"

OUR answer may seem somewhat vague, because the peculiarities of individual constitution and of surrounding circumstance vary in each case. We can give you the broadcloth of counsel, but each must cut his own garment from it. However, certain wide principles do apply to most cases. When a child has a scrofulous tendency—that is, when it is, in common parlance, "a delicate child," everything possible must be done to invigorate its constitution from the first. Its food must be nourishing and easy of digestion. Cod-liver oil is largely recommended. It is best taken in the form of emulsions, kept by every chemist. But this, as a medicine, should be no substitute for plenty of milk and cream, taken judiciously as food. The child's nursery should be bright and sunny, and it should be encouraged in merry active sports, rather than to the sedentary games and studies to which it will probably incline. Its clothes should be warm and rational, there should be none of the bare arms, and legs, and necks, which are a cruel tampering with the health of even the strongest. As life advances, its healthiest conditions should be always sought. Health takes precedence of wealth. There should be no overwork either in pursuit of gain or pleasure.

IN cases of incipient consumption, a long sea-voyage gives the best chance of recovery, and where it fails to do quite so much, frequently adds many useful and happy years to life. People often delay this experiment till too late, and end only in dying among strangers, and deterring others from following their example. Sometimes those who have been always delicate in their own country become robust under a change of climate. We have known some notable instances of this in the case of Australia and the South American province of Buenos Ayres.

IT should be realised that consumption is now recognised as contagious, and, of course, those already having a consumptive tendency are specially susceptible. When whole families are swept off by this disease, as we sometimes see, it is doubtful how much of the mortality is due to hereditary tendency, and how much to the disease being allowed to spread in soil only too ready to receive it.

WE have dwelt at so much length upon scrofula, because it so well serves the purpose of illustrating the whole subject of constitutional tendencies. But these hereditary tendencies include many diseases. They exist in cancer and rheumatism, in many nervous affections, such as neuralgia, paralysis, St. Vitus's dance, etc., and in some skin diseases. The first thing is for each individual to find out his own weak point. The next is to find out from some good physician what precautions or active measures are best suited to his case. On these he should, as far as possible, mould his life. From them, too, he should deduce certain rules for his daily conduct.

THIS will make it easy for him to do naturally, and almost involuntarily, what is best for him, without any unwholesome reiteration of the question: "Will this suit me?" For the worst thing he can do is to fret and worry over his possible dangers. Nor should he consult doctors' books upon his particular malady. Few can do this with any profit to themselves, and it is often a cause of great and needless mental anxiety which is sure to deteriorate the bodily health.

IF these general principles were taken as guides, many persons with grave constitutional tendencies would prolong their lives in happiness and usefulness, and might often even outlive their originally more powerful but less wary neighbours.

Singular Recoveries from Death.

IN 1740, a youth who had been found guilty of a serious offence, was hanged at Tyburn. After remaining suspended for two-and-twenty minutes, he was cut down and taken to Surgeons' Hall, that the body might be dissected. On being laid on the table, however, he was heard to groan: he was thereupon bled, and after a while was able to raise himself, though at first unable to speak. The sheriffs were then communicated with; but, the news having spread abroad, so great a mob collected before the hall, that the sheriffs were afraid to take the wretched creature back to Tyburn and again hang him, as with the customary hardness of those times they seemed well disposed to do. They accordingly kept him in the hall till midnight, when, all being quiet, he was taken back to Newgate. Two days after he was reported to be "fully recovered in health and senses," but all recollection of his execution, or even of his trial, had gone—a fact partly accounted for by his having been in a state of fever and delirium ever since his original committal to prison. To this fact also was attributed his extraordinary escape from death. Being unconscious at the time of his execution, and therefore having no fear, his blood, it was thought, circulated with greater quickness and force than it would otherwise have done, and thus saved him from suffocation. The lad was ultimately transported for life.

Another strange instance of recovery from seeming death is that of a man in Ireland, who was hanged for sheep-stealing, and who "came to life again," when in the hands of the medical operator. The latter refrained from giving information to the authorities, and restored the man to health. The malefactor, by a strange application of logic, used afterwards to force the doctor to support him, saying that he was bound to continue the life he had restored, and threatened that if he did not, he, the culprit, would give the authorities information of his own escape from death, and of the medical man's complicity in that evasion of the law.

Pet Expressions.

NOBODY who has busied himself with watching the peculiarities of contemporary speech can have failed to notice the prevalence of pet expressions. English people, as a rule, have very little sense of style, and many of them when they begin a story have very little idea indeed concerning how it is to end. The young man of the day, in particular, has a slow and sluggish mind, and can seldom be troubled to give a careful specification of the particular person or thing which forms the topic of his conversation. He finds it answers better for his purpose to choose some simple generic term which he can use when his thoughts fail him. What the trapeze is to the acrobat, his pet expression is to the modern young man. It serves as a rest to steady himself on, and to sustain him until he takes his next awkward flight. Many a fall would that young man have, many an awkward hiatus or wrongly-chosen expression would there be in his discourse were not his pet phrase always near him to be rested on half-way whenever the exigencies of his narrative become too much for his powers of speech.

THE conversation of the young lady of the period is principally remarkable for its adjectives. Unlike the young man, she has rarely any pet substantive whereby to express most things that come under her notice; it may be that she refrains to use her brother's phrases for fear of being considered slangy. But she rejoices in a curious collection of qualifying adjectives, by the aid of which she manages to make her meaning known. Anything that pleases her, from a bracelet to a sunset, is dubbed by the title of "quite too lovely," while its antithesis, whether used in reference to a public calamity or a bad floor at a dance, is pronounced to be "quite too dreadful." Any act of kindness bestowed upon this young person wins from her the remark that such attention is "truly affecting," and with this pet phrase, and a few more "lovelys" and "preciouses," varied and qualified by the word "quite" and "too" being prefixed to them either singly or together, she manages to rub along very well.

NOTHING strikes the aspiring foreigner so much, on endeavouring to accustom himself to our colloquialisms, as the superabundance of adjectives used by our young ladies. One particularly intelligent Teuton, painstaking after the manner of his race, once announced his intention of making a dictionary of these terms, but has since given it up in despair. Some grains of comfort, however, he did obtain from his summary, some little additional light on an obscure subject. The unbounded terms of admiration for any object that they thought it behoved them to admire appeared to be his principal stumbling-block, but he overcame it. "When you say 'Zat is most beau-ti-ful!'" said he, "it means 'rather nice,' and 'sweetly pretty' means 'I do not like it.'"

WHICH of us has not a friend who indulges in pet expressions—some, perhaps, that we may not notice when we are with them, yet often recall when they are far away? We remember them with a sort of gentle amusement, as we find ourselves using their catch-word, and adding: "As So-and-so would say." For there is a great deal of individuality about a man's catch-words, and his character creeps out that way. Do we not remember our gentle Scotch friend, and the long sigh he would give at the end of some narration of sorrow or sin, summing up the sorrowful or the sinning one with the comprehensive comment: "Ah, poor body!" How much unaffected pity was contained in those words, and very often forgiveness too; for this was a public man, with many traducers, whom, in his large-heartedness, he could afford to despise, and if he were reminded of some past ill-natured deed, the same pet phrase would show how little the wound was rankling, and that he had far more pity left than anger for his enemy.

ANOTHER friend recurs to us whose pet word is "moreover." A certain gentle dignity seems to hang about this man; a love of olden times whose habits and quaint phrases he would revive again if he could. A gentle complacency in explaining and relating, a love of giving details, and of planning out arrangements—all these things seem to be borne to us along with that gentle phrase: "We will do this, and moreover we will do that." "Our guide begged us not to try the ascent, and moreover he explained to us;" so our friend goes on, with unconsciously recurring phrases. As we write, we can see him, in our mind's eye, seated at table in his mediæval refectory, talking with the air of a man accustomed to be listened to with deference.

A GOOD deal of simplicity of mind is shown in the pet expression of another man we wot of. He relates to us some very trivial event, some series of coincidences so singularly trivial that it is strange that he should regard them worth the telling. These narratives he tells with every appearance of care, with a painstaking accuracy as to names and dates, and with manifest fear lest these sister-pearls should forbear to kiss each other so that he should present his story incomplete. His stories are all interlarded with one set phrase which is as necessary to the teller as harking back to Charing Cross was to the old lady who lost her way in the underground railway. This phrase is "strange as it may appear," and by its aid alone does our friend deliver himself of his tale. "I was walking along King Street, Brighton, with my wife," he begins, "when, strange as it may appear, we met Jones. He lives there, you know, which doesn't make it so odd, but who should be with him—strange to say—but Johnson. Now, my wife's family have all known the Johnsons for many years past, but, strange as it may appear, we never had the least idea before that the Johnsons were related to the Joneses." So he meanders on, with a childlike confidence in the strangeness of the facts he sets before you, and is only too disappointed and distressed if his listener does not put in the exclamations of surprise in the spaces so considerably pointed out to him.

THE "good talker" has gone out of fashion, and would now be voted a prosy old bore; it is not the fashion to be careful about the way you express a thing, or to appear to be giving yourself much trouble in entertaining your hearers. The words of the modern young man come out in disjointed fragments—much as one might expect a Dutch doll to talk were it blessed with the power of speech; his sentences seem as if they dropped out of his lips without his own volition.

HE has one favourite word at a time, and he wears it threadbare. If you can understand it, all the better for you; if not, you would not like to show your ignorance by asking; so the young man distinctly scores one there. His pet phrase covers his ignorance or his laziness, and he is borne along with the tide instead of having to row against the stream. A very few words suffice the young man. The social scale is divided by him into two broad portions—"swells" and "cads."

To the one or the other you must belong. If you look superior to your station, you are a cad, apeing a swell; if you disgrace your station, you are a swell behaving like a cad. The young man of the period does not speak evil of dignities. He calls them "toffs." How refreshingly simple is conversation made by these means it is easy to perceive. "Sir Frederick Leighton and other toffs," is a deliciously easy way of describing a few prominent Royal Academicians, or the same word applied to the Lord Mayor and his following ought to conjure up a perfect vision of high sheriffs and aldermen, including perhaps the sword-bearer and the gold-stick.

AFTER all, it is fashionable to be brief, and you must forgive the young man's slang as the pardonable exuberance of youth. To choose your words with care is to talk like a book—so the young man will tell you, if consulted on the point. "Like a book," you repeat after him, as you turn away from his chatter with a grateful glance at the shelves where stand some of those mute companions—their leaves filled with choice and scholarly and sounding prose, to which the greater part of modern conversation bears as much resemblance as does the strong flight of an eagle to a squirrel turning round and round in his cage.

Household Gardening.

WE are now in the midst of what may be termed the working period of the gardening year. Labour must of course be bestowed on gardens at all times, but in the spring and summer this amounts, in many cases, to healthy exercise and pleasant recreation, such as sowing seeds, tying up plants, and watering crops. At this time of the year the work requiring to be done is of a different order, some of it not less healthy, perhaps, to those who may by preference engage in it, and certainly not less effective exercise than "peddling about" among the flowers. The resting season of plants and trees—winter—is the working season of their growers, and hard and heavy much of the work is that needs to be done in many gardens at the present time. Digging, trenching, manuring, and making improvements of a permanent character form a short list of the operations pending now, and the sooner they are completed the better.

ARRANGING WORK.

Some impetuous persons, when they make up their minds to have anything done, will have the work in hand pressed on without intermission, whether the weather be favourable for its prosecution or not. In this they err. Much labour is wasted every year, and positive injury done in various ways by digging when the soil is slightly frozen and even covered with snow; while, on the other hand, walks are cut up by wheeling soil and manure when they are soft and wet. Always take advantage of frost for the last-named duties, and never dig frost and snow in the ground if a workman could be found to do it for nothing. Such practices, and they are indulged in every year in numerous instances, are wasteful and dangerous. There are local gardeners, we know, who will not endorse this teaching, but it will be just as well to enquire if any objections they may urge are not based on self-interest, which, being interpreted, means seeking work. In some gardens there is work for all weathers, but not in all; but what may be done in many with advantage now, is

MAKING A ROCKERY.

It is a question if a limited plot of ground in sun or in shade can be so interestingly occupied, or so satisfactorily turned to account, as by forming a rockery on it, and furnishing it with plants. We have seen charming little miniature mounds containing not more than a barrowful or two of soil in the small forecourts of artisans' dwellings, the mounds being studded with clinkers, shells, and such odds and ends of hardware as could be found, and fixed to impart ruggedness and variety. Such rockeries, when planted with suitable flowers, have a very pretty effect.

Even in some of the cellar-like areas in London, mounds of a similar character are formed with any rough material at hand, and this embedded in a bushel or two of soil in itself affords acceptable relief from the monotonous plainness of brick walls and flagstones; while when the mounds are planted with the strong growing Ferns, small-leaved Ivies, and that accommodating plant, the Creeping Jenny, they have quite an attractive appearance.

Again, in suburban gardens only large enough to swing conveniently the proverbial cat, many corners that would be otherwise unsightly are appropriately and agreeably occupied in the manner indicated, and more might with advantage be seen. A little thought, labour, and pride in rendering the home surroundings pleasant would result in numerous small enclosures being made cheerful that are now decidedly unattractive, and the improvement might be effected at a trifling cost.

Villa gardens of larger size, yet small in comparison with those attached to country residences, can scarcely be considered complete without a rockery, and an appropriate site can usually be found for a mound of the kind in question.

If there is a dark, shaded corner, overhung with trees, where little or nothing will grow, that is just the place for a rockery, to be planted chiefly with strong-growing Ferns, which are sure to be admired in the summer, while in the spring the mound might be attractive with such bulbs as Snowdrops, Winter Aconites, and Daffodils. Such an arrangement will have a far better appearance than broken pots and bottles, stray saucepan-lids, and other refuse of the kind that usually find a place in these barren out-of-the-way nooks.

In sunny positions a rockery may be even more attractive, with a different class of plants, such as dwarf herbaceous flowers and pretty creeping and tufted spring-flowering Alpine plants. With a collection of these some of the most charming and interesting arrangements imaginable are made.

Then there is what may be termed the general purposes rockery, erected in a position neither totally shaded nor yet fully exposed to the sun. It is wonderful what a number of plants will flourish there, for it is not too hot and dry for Ferns, nor too dark for many flowers. A mound well made and judiciously planted in such a position will give far more satisfaction than a bed on the level surrounded by a patchy lawn; in fact, any place where turf will not retain its verdure will be rendered far more agreeable by a rockery with a gravel walk around it.

FORMING THE ROCKERY.

As a rule, an arrangement of the kind under notice cannot be too irregular. The site and surroundings will usually suggest the general form of the mound, and determine whether it should be an oblong, round, oval, or of half-moon shaped outline. The larger the rockery, as a rule, the more rugged it should be, and the deeper the indentations in its sides. In this respect there should be no suspicion of smoothness, no straight lines of any length, nor regular curves. The effect of many mounds is marred by too much neatness and primness in their construction.

BUILDING A ROCKERY.

An initial mistake is often made by amateurs in first packing together a pile of roots and stones, with such other rough pieces of burnt bricks, clinkers, slag from furnaces, and spar when it is procurable, then filling up the interstices with soil, working it down with the hand. This is radically wrong, and sure to end in disappointment sooner or later. We have seen many failures by adopting that mode of procedure, and it is mentioned in order that it may be avoided.

When abundance of hard materials are provided, the work of arranging them and adding soil should go on together, making the stones firm so that they cannot sink or slip, and the soil also so firm that it cannot materially settle and fall away from the roots of the plants.

It is important also to remember that as the soil has to support the plants, the stones too must sustain the soil, and prevent its being washed away by heavy rains or artificial waterings. Each space or "pocket" that is made for plants should be so formed that it will hold water the same as the space above the soil in a flower-pot; the soil then cannot readily be displaced, and the water will pass where it is wanted—to the roots of the plants.

But perhaps the majority of persons who desire to have a rockery, large or small, have not a very abundant supply of hard, rough materials with which to build it, and their object consequently is to make the most of what little they have.

In this case, undoubtedly, the best plan is to first raise a mound of soil, confining the base by a strong boundary of heavy stones, then embed the remainder in the soil, disposing them according to taste, each one being made firm. That plan answers very well for an ordinary rockery of mixed flowers, but it would not satisfy a geologist.

One more obstacle is often present in respect of this work—namely, a scarcity of good soil for raising the mound. For this there is a very simple remedy. When an abundance of good soil is not readily procurable, the bulk of the mound may be composed of bad, or of rubbish of any kind—broken pots, bottles, the contents of ash-bins, anything of a hard nature to form the base. This will not only save soil, but will act as drainage in the same manner as crocks do in a flower-pot.

But the mound must be surfaced with fertile soil for the plants to grow in, a foot in depth of good loam being ample for most plants, or ordinary good garden soil will do. In districts where peat is plentiful, it may be mixed with advantage in the soil for a rockery; it is, however, by no means indispensable, as there are quite sufficient plants that will flourish without it.

Persons with large or small means, who are contemplating adding the enjoyable feature of a rockery to their garden, will now, presumably, have little difficulty in doing the work. With the object of being useful to the majority, we have treated the subject as plainly as possible, and on another occasion we will direct attention to a few plants that will be suitable for occupying the rugged mounds.

PLANTS IN ROOMS AND GREENHOUSES.

Take care that all kinds which are flowering or approaching that stage are well supplied with water, also keep the soil of ornamental foliage plants, such as Palms and Ferns, regularly moist; but Geraniums, Fuchsias, Cactuses, and succulent plants generally, should be kept dry at the roots rather than otherwise at this period of the year.

Odds and Ends.

It was Christmas-time, and the train was almost full. A quiet-looking gentleman walked down the platform in search of a place. He stopped before a carriage in which there was a vacant seat—no, not quite vacant; corner. "Room here?" demanded the quiet gentleman. "No," growled the stout. "No one is sitting there," pointing to the hand-bag. "Got out. Coming back," growled the stout. Perhaps the new comer had his own views as to how far this vague statement was trustworthy, for he said in a quiet tone, "I will sit there until your friend returns." The train began to move. "Your friend is late," said the quiet. It was fairly in of sympathy; "but," he added, "he shan't lose his property," and he hurled the black bag out of the window. The stout made an ineffectual effort to save the bag, and then burst out into language not that of blessing. The package was, of course, his own. He only wished to keep the seat unoccupied with a view to his own comfort. He did not try that plan again on his next journey.

The following was copied from one of the original bills, framed and suspended over the mantelpiece in the coffee-room at the Black Swan, Coney-street, York: "York. Four days' stage coach begins on Friday, the 12th April, 1706. All that are desirous to pass from London to York, or from York to London, or any other place on that road, let them repair to the Black Swan, in Holborn, in London, and to the Black Swan, in Coney Street, York, at both which places they may be received in a stage coach every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, which performs the whole journey in four days (if God permits), and sets forth at five in the morning, and returns from York to Stamford by Huntingdon to London in two days. And from Stamford by Huntingdon to London in two days more. And the like stages on their return. Allowing each passenger 14lb. weight, and all above 3d. a pound.—Performed by Benj. Hingham, Henry Harrison, and Walter Bowman."

A LADY passenger by one of the West Highland steamers had unintentionally been annoying the man at the wheel by asking questions at a time when all his attention had to be directed to his work. At last he so far forgot himself as to tell her to "Go to Jericho," or some other worse place. The lady was greatly shocked and insulted, complained to the captain, and insisted upon an apology from the man. The captain politely promised to see to it. Having called the steersman, he told him that whatever his provocation, he ought not to have spoken so to a lady, and that he must go to the cabin where she was, and make an apology. The man was not convinced of his offence, but knew that he must obey orders, and so went off rather sulkily towards the cabin. Having reached the door, he stood there till the attention of the lady was directed to him, when he called out to her, "You need not go," then turned and went on deck.

A TRAVELLER, who spent some time in Turkey, relates a beautiful parable which was told him by a dervish, and which seemed more beautiful than Sterne's celebrated figure of the accusing spirit and recording angel: "Every man," said the dervish, "has two angels, one on his right shoulder and one on his left. When he does anything good, the angel on the right shoulder writes it down and seals it, because what has been well done is done for ever. When he does evil, the angel on the left writes it down, and he waits till midnight. If before that time the man bows his head and exclaims, 'Gracious Allah! I have sinned; forgive me!' the angel rubs out the record; but if not, at midnight he seals it, and the beloved angel on the right shoulder weeps."

At a populous manufacturing town there was an inhabitant who held a good position as a fishmonger, and, being partial to theatricals, was very kind, and gave great assistance to the Theatre Royal. Being anxious to make his début, it was at last arranged that he should play Polonius for the manager's benefit, that gentleman himself playing Hamlet. The house was crammed, and the play proceeded until it came to the lines, "Do you know me, my lord?" "Excellently well; you are a fishmonger!" when the maternal parent of Polonius (being in front and thinking the line was a personal insult to her son), rose and said: "Well, sir, if he is a fishmonger he has been very kind to you, and you've no right to expose him in public."

It was to introduce to the English public a joint invention of his own and his brother Werner in electro-gilding that William Siemens first came to England. This was in 1843. Speaking, two years ago, to the members of the Birmingham and Midland Institute, Dr. Siemens, as he was then, gave an interesting account of the difficulties which not unnaturally beset the young foreign inventor, so ignorant of the language of the country that his first visit was to an undertaker, under the impression that he was a suitable person to take up and bring out his invention.

MISS MUNRO lately published an amusing sketch of a quarrel between Figaro and a Bartholo. In the "shaving scene" Figaro took the opposing tunk to tie Bartholo fast in his chair, so that when the latter rose to providing himself with a stout cudgel, and, instead of administering the usual mock thrashing to the scampish barber, laid it on in sound earnest. The quarrel was an open secret, and the effect was highly relished by the audience.

The most common error of men and women, is that of looking for happiness somewhere outside of useful work. It has never yet been found when thus sought, and never will be while the world stands, and the sooner this truth is learned the better for every one. If you doubt the proposition, glance around among your friends and acquaintances, and select those who appear to have the most enjoyment in life. Are they the idlers, and pleasure-seekers, or the earnest workers? We know what your answer will be.

MANY of our cares are but a morbid way of looking at our privileges. We let our blessings get mouldy, and then call them curses.

"SPEAK fitly," said George Herbert, "or be silent wisely."
WHEN is iron the most ironical? When it's a railing.

A PASTRYCOOK, who used to write comic operas much in the same way that a wigmaker named André used to write tragedies, read to the Abbé de Latteignant a little piece entitled "La Gallette." The Abbé smiled, and advised him to put his play in his oven. "I understand you," said the metromaniac, "but all the same, Professor —, whom I have supplied with pies for twenty years, assured me that my 'Galette' was full of wit." "Ha, ha! Well, does the professor owe you anything?" "I should say he does: he owes me 600 francs for pastry." "Exactly. Now, you tell him that you are not at all pleased at his not paying his account, and he will tell you that it is a shocking bad play."

THROUGHOUT the empire of Morocco there are villages where the eldest members of the adult population follow professionally the pursuit of fattening young girls for the matrimonial market of Barbary. The Moors, like the Turks, give a decided preference to "moon-faced" wives over lean ones, and are more solicitous as to the number of pounds which their wives weigh than about the stock of accomplishments which they possess. The fattening process begins when the girl is twelve years old. Stiff maize porridge, kneaded up with grease, is daily fed to her in the form of boluses. If she declines to take them they are crammed down her throat.

INVETERATE smokers do funny things. Carlyle smoked up the chimney with a degree of thoughtfulness for the feelings of others not universal in his conduct, and the famous Bishop Burnet, who, like many another author, found composition facilitated by puffs of the seductive weed, disliking the interruption of removing his pipe constantly while he was writing, in order to combine the two operations with due comfort to himself, bored a hole through the broad brim of his hat, and, putting his long pipe through it, puffed and wrote, and wrote and puffed with the most philosophical calm.

At a café in Paris a dispute ran high between a musician and a young banker. The musician—a music-hall "star"—at last sprang up, pulled out a card, which the banker calmly accepted and put in his pocket. Two days later the musician met the financier in the street. Rushing up to him he exclaimed: "Sir, you have not yet given me satisfaction!" "That I have, and to the fullest extent," answered the young banker. "That gave me a ticket for your concert last night; I went and sat out the performance to the end. What more do you want?"

MISS KNIGHT, author of a brace of novels—"Dinarbas" and "Marcus Flaminius"—once called upon Dr. Johnson to pay him a farewell visit on her quitting England with the intention of making a prolonged stay on the Continent. Besides being exceedingly vain of her novels, it so chanced that Miss Knight was a lady of large and portly presence. When the final good-bye came to be said, the Doctor dismissed her with these words: "Go, go, my dear, for you are too big for an island."

"JUMP in, Yeast, and I'll drive you into town," said Crimsonbeak, overtaking that gentleman the other morning. "Thank you, Crimsonbeak; but I'm in a bit of a hurry this morning," sarcastically replied Yeast, glancing at his neighbour's horse, which no one ever accused of being fast, and continuing his walk. "Well, I know my horse isn't fast, Yeast," said the driver, "but I fancy he can beat a donkey. Jump in." Yeast laughed and got in.

"I SENT a sentence to a paper to the following effect," says Dean Alford, in his work, "The Queen's English": "When I came to the spot I met a man running towards me with his hands held up." Next day I read: "When the reverend gentleman arrived in close proximity to the scene of action, he encountered an individual proceeding at a rapid pace in the opposite direction, having both his hands elevated in an excited manner."

"I HAVE," says Mr. G. A. Sala, "seen a good deal of husbands and wives in my time, and, if I have any faculty of observation, it has generally led to the conclusion that the happiest marriages are those in which the bride, when she comes to the altar-rails, has in the way of the world's goods precisely what she stands upright in, and no more."

"How do you do, Mr. Lincoln?" said someone to the President. "Well," said he in his characteristic way, "that reminds me of a story. As the labourer said to the bricklayers, after falling through the roof and rafters of an unfinished house, I have gone through a great deal since you saw me last."

A LADY acknowledged to her father-confessor a passionate fondness for gambling. The latter exhorted her to consider the waste of time. "Ah yes, you are quite right there," was her answer, "there is a frightful amount of time lost—over shuffling the cards."

In announcing a visit of Her Majesty to Scotland, a Scottish paper said: "Preparations are now being made for her reception, several tradesmen having received orders to be immediately executed at Balmoral."

"FATHER, what would you run for if the house were all ablaze?" The old gentleman declared that he should run for a very valuable manuscript. "I wouldn't," replied the boy; "I should run for the door."

"How many deaths?" asked the hospital physician of an Irish dresser at Scutari, while going his rounds. "Three." "Why, I ordered medicine for four." "Yes, your honour, but one would not take it."

A CLERGYMAN tells young men to choose their associates from a class higher than their own. The better advice would be to so conduct themselves that there should be no class higher than their own.

"WHERE Our Storms Come From," read Mr. Broughne, in a scientific paper. "Well, I know where a great many of them come from," he mentally ejaculated, looking up and glancing at his wife.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTIONS.

C. A. C. wishes to know where to get a book of instructions about Grecian netting.

FRANCES ALICE wants to find a poem entitled, "Fallen by the Way," and to know the price of the book in which it is published.

NUMUR.—Can any correspondent say whether it is possible to procure a book entitled, "One Thousand Chances to Make Money," by Edwin Freedly, U.S., published 1859?

SEARCHING writes: "My interest in religious matters having been aroused, I desire to know the creeds of the Roman and Greek Churches, and of all Protestant sects. Can any of your readers tell me of books likely to serve my purpose, by whom published, and the price?"

W. MoW. writes: "Can any reader inform me where the recitation, 'My First and Last Appearance on any Stage' (by Turner), is to be found?"

ANSWERS.

C. A. C.—Calando is a direction, in music, to gradually slacken the pace and decrease the volume of sound.

CUPID.—"The Curfew Must Not Toll To-night" is by Rosa H. Thorpe, and is published by Messrs. Walker and Sons in the Golden Floral Series.

DESIGNER.—There are no Prize Competitions for Christmas Cards going on at present.

DISGUSTED.—Hotel-keepers generally demand compensation for real or supposed damage sustained by cases of severe illness happening in their establishments. Excessive demands of this kind should be resisted. In view of contingencies, the following cheerful notice was recently hung up, neatly framed, in the bedrooms of a large hotel in London: "In case of the death of a visitor, the hotel charge, in addition to that for damage to linen, etc., and cleansing room, will be five guineas."

FRANCES ALICE.—1. "Billy's Rose," by G. R. Sims, 1d.; "A Dead Rose," 2d.; "False Step," by E. B. Browning. 2. Your handwriting would hardly be considered good yet. Try and keep the lines straighter.

JOSE.—"Holbein Stitch" has gone quite out of fashion. It seems impossible to get patterns for it. It is done with silk in a kind of cross stitch, which looks the same back and front.

MARTHA.—The verses are by Longfellow, and run as follows:

We speak of a merry Christmas
And many a happy New Year;
But each in his heart is thinking
Of those that are not here.

We speak of friends and their fortunes,
And of what they did and said,
Till the dead alone seem living,
And the living alone seem dead.

NEMO.—1. Write to the Secretary, Royal Training College for Music, South Kensington, and you will obtain all the information you want. 2. The gentleman raises his hat though he does not know the lady with whom his friend is walking. It shows respect to her.

OLD COCKNEY.—The column and dials were removed before your time, in 1773. The poet Gay thus alludes to the locality of Seven Dials:

Where fam'd Saint Giles's ancient limits spread,
An innal'd column rears its lofty head;
Here to seven streets sev'n dials count the day,
And from each other catch the circling ray.

It is stated that for some unknown purpose the column was removed from the Seven Dials to Sayes Court, a house not far distant from Weybridge, where it lay neglected for some years, till made to serve the present purpose. The stone belonging to it, that gave directions as to the localities of the Seven Dials, may still be seen on the green, close to the public-house. For further particulars, see Dickens's "Dictionary of London."

ROBIN.—Send to Augener's, Regent Street, for a list of Operatic Selections, by Edward Dorn. They are very easy and effective. Sydney Smith's arrangements of operatic airs are also very good; they are to be had at Edwin Ashdown's, Hanover Square. The opera "Carmen" is very difficult to play; but it is so fresh and original, that it will repay any amount of trouble.

TINTAGEL.—1. You had better buy a copy of "Pygmalion and Galatea." It is published by French, Strand. 2. Would Princess Potost do?

TROUBLED MIND.—1. Make a paste of petroleum and finely-powdered bath-brick, and clean the brass with it, rubbing afterwards with a leather. 2. Put a little powdered resin on the peg, then the string will hold fast.

YOUNG HOUSEWIFE.—Probably the following recipe for "Savoury Eggs" is what you require: Cut up into dice a slice of cold boiled bacon, fat and lean, weighing about two ounces. Mix with it a small teaspoonful of chopped parsley and a little pepper and salt; put this in a shallow tart-dish, and pour over it three eggs beaten up with a tablespoonful of milk and one of gravy. Bake until the eggs are set.

Taking the Risk.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"FATHER," said Ned Long suddenly, as they sat together after dinner, "I want to ask you something."

Mr. Long put down the book which he had just taken up, and turned his chair towards the fire.

"What is it, my boy? Any trouble?"

"I don't know yet, sir; I hope not. It depends on you chiefly."

"I don't make trouble when I can help it, you know, Ned; it comes of itself too easily."

"I want to know," said Ned, speaking with a sort of effort, "what it is that makes you treat Mr. Fowler in the way you do?"

Mr. Long looked steadily into the fire. Ned became alarmed lest he had asked too much. He was somewhat afraid of his father, and it had caused him no small amount of anxiety as to how he was to approach the dangerous subject of Mr. Fowler.

He was conscious that there was something mysterious in the relations of the two men, and it is a delicate thing for a son to meddle in the private affairs of his father, especially when they have been carefully concealed from him. However, he had his reasons for doing so, and they were strong ones, as his action proved.

Mr. Long was some moments before he replied. With his eyes still fixed on the fire, and his face turned away from his son, he said:-

"Why do you ask me, Ned? I must know that first."

Ned had made up his mind for that question. He knew his father was a cool man of business, who would not be likely to make any disclosure without a corresponding one on his side.

"I want to know, father, because I wish to marry Nellie, and naturally I should like to know why you are on such peculiar terms with her father."

Mr. Long gave a slight exclamation. He did not pause this time before asking quickly:

"Have you proposed to her?"

"No, sir; I thought I ought not to do so till I had spoken to you."

"Do you intend to do so whatever may be my wishes?"

This was an awkward question, but Ned knew his father well enough to be aware that candour was his best course.

"I certainly mean to marry her, sir; but I am equally certain that you cannot find any reasonable objection to her."

"I am not so sure of that, my boy. But as you have chosen to follow your own course in spite of anything I may say, why take the trouble to ask me your question?"

"Because, father, I should be awfully sorry to do anything that might grieve you. But I never thought this would. If you did not think Nellie a fit wife for me, why did you let me see her so often without saying anything?"

"I don't say she is not a fit wife for you," replied Mr. Long slowly.

"Then you have no objection to my proposing to her?"

"I did not say that," was the father's guarded reply.

"Then what is your objection?" reiterated Ned. "Really, sir, you are treating me too much like a child. If I am old enough to marry, surely I am old enough to be trusted with any secret that may be in your possession with regard to the family into which I hope to enter."

"Don't lose your temper, my boy," said Mr. Long kindly. "Do you object to the way I treat Mr. Fowler or the way he treats me?"

"To both, father, or rather I do not so much say I object to it as that I want it explained."

Mr. Long rose and stood in front of the fire, with his thumbs in his waistcoat arm-holes. In this position he surveyed his son.

"It doesn't seem to strike you, Ned, that a secret is generally the property of more than one person. Before one can divulge it he must have the permission of the other or others. If your mind is made up, you must go to Mr. Fowler, tell him you wish to marry his daughter, tell him also that you have spoken to me, and that I have referred you to him. Whether I say any more to you will depend on what he may say."

"You are not angry with me, father?"

"No, my boy, no. If you are in love with Nellie, marry her by all means. But don't ask her yet. If I were you I wouldn't see her for a day or two; at all events not till you have seen me again."

Mr. Long resumed his seat, and took up his book. Ned understood that the interview was at an end.

It was not an entirely satisfactory one, but then on the other hand it might have been a great deal worse. He had been quite prepared for his father's anger, of which he had a dread founded on the rarity of its manifestation. That at least he had escaped.

Mr. Long was a merchant in a good position in a county town. His son was in business with him, and had proved himself a valuable addition to the firm.

Mr. Fowler was the head-clerk, and had been so for nearly ten years. He was the son of a banker of good position in the neighbourhood, and on his entry into the house it was clearly understood that before long was to be made a junior partner. However, year after year passed, and he still remained a clerk, though he rose steadily to be the head one. It was a puzzle to every one why he was allowed to remain in an inferior position; none the less a puzzle because he never gave any reason for it when some inquisitive friend demanded one. His father had died soon after he had made his start in life, so there was no one but himself to further his claims.

Gross favouritism was the explanation which was most current, and Mr. Long was often spoken of with some bitterness as a hard man, who had taken a dislike to his head-clerk, and therefore treated him with conspicuous unfairness.

But strangely enough, the very man who, in the ordinary course of things, ought to have been the one to complain, was the very one who did not do so. Mr. Fowler rarely spoke of Mr. Long, and when he did so was careful to speak of him in high terms. This was currently explained by the assertion that Mr. Fowler was a poor sort of fellow, who had no pluck in him, and would stand anything.

However this might be, there was no doubt of the head-clerk's ability. That was so marked that the injustice of letting him remain in his inferior position became manifest to Ned soon after he entered the firm, and once he had hinted as much to his father. His hint was, however, received so ungraciously that he never renewed it.

But now that he meant to marry Miss Fowler things were changed. He must know what was the meaning of the strange relations existing between his father and Mr. Fowler, and, as we have seen, he had taken the straightforward mode of discovering.

The more he thought it over, the less he liked the idea of an interview with Mr. Fowler. It would be an uncomfortable one for both of them. He could not talk to him at the warehouse, and if he went to his house he would probably see Nellie, which he had resolved not to do. He had not yet proposed, though he was quite resolved to do so. But he would postpone his avowal in accordance with his father's advice.

After some cogitation he determined to write a letter instead of seeking an interview. He went to his room, and sat down to compose one.

He did not take long to finish it. It was his natural habit to go straight at whatever he wanted, and so he found small difficulty in saying what he wished. His letter ran thus:

"DEAR SIR,

"I write to request your permission to ask your daughter Nellie to be my wife. The very fact of my doing so will, I am sure, prove to you that I love her. Though I have not yet spoken to her I have every hope that I am not indifferent to her. I have informed my father of the step I contemplate, and he, without raising any objection, tells me that it is to you I must in the first instance apply. May I ask for a speedy reply?"

"Believe me to remain, yours very sincerely,

"EDWARD LONG."

He put on his hat, walked down the town to Mr. Fowler's house, and slipped his letter into the letter-box. He had a strong desire to knock, but reflected on his resolve, and refrained. Besides, it was getting late.

CHAPTER II.

NEXT day was not a pleasant one for Ned. His duties led him into frequent contact with the head-clerk, but no word or sign escaped the latter to show that he had received the letter. Ned longed to speak to him about it, but considering that he himself had chosen to communicate by letter instead of verbally, he felt no right to do so.

When he arrived home he found a letter awaiting him. It was in the well-known hand of Mr. Fowler. Ned took it up to his room and eagerly opened it.

It was not a long one.

"DEAR SIR,

"Your letter, though not entirely unexpected, was a surprise. I mean that I had not anticipated a declaration on your part so soon. I should not have expected it at all had I not taken for granted that you were in possession of certain facts of which your father is aware. I supposed—wrongly, it appears, from your letter—that Mr. Long had communicated these facts to you before allowing your intimacy with Nellie. It only remains for me now to say that he has my full permission to tell you everything. When he has done so, it will be time enough to discuss the matter further. It must rest with you to decide whether you think fit to do so when you have heard what he will tell you.

"At the same time, I feel flattered by your letter, and can only say that if any obstacle arises to your wishes it will not be of my raising—I should rather say, of my present raising.

"Yours very sincerely,

"MARKHAM FOWLER."

Ned held the letter in his hand, wondering what it could all mean. At any rate he would know the whole truth before long. After dinner he would again approach his father on the subject.

It was not so difficult to do this time, for Mr. Long evidently expected it to be brought up. Ned handed his father Mr. Fowler's letter without remark.

Mr. Long read it carefully.

"You want to know all about it, Ned?" he asked.

"Of course, sir."

"Don't be in a hurry. If you wish to marry Nellie you may do so; she is a charming girl, and I will receive her as a daughter with pleasure. Are you not content with that? Is there any use in raking up an old story which is a very painful one?"

Ned reflected for a moment.

"I think I ought to know it, father. It will make no difference in my resolve to marry Nellie."

"Very well, I will tell you, and I am rather glad you have chosen to hear it. Eighteen years ago there was a good deal of mysterious work going on in our place, and I set myself to find out what it all meant. I discovered in time that embezzlement on a considerable scale had taken place. A clerk of the name of Chambers was at the bottom of it. He took fright at some enquiries I instituted and bolted. I have never heard of him since. But I also found that Mr. Fowler, who was then a junior clerk, was implicated in the business. I had him up here one night and showed him that I knew all about it, and asked him what he had to say. He was in terrible distress, and confessed his guilt; that is to say, he owned that he was aware of what had been going on, and had tried to screen Chambers, who was a distant relation of his. Of course that rendered him an accomplice. I consulted with Mr. White, the then senior partner, whose death made your entry into the firm possible. Fowler seemed thoroughly penitent, implored mercy on the ground of his recent marriage, of the ruin to all his prospects if the matter became known, and promised that, if he were not prosecuted, he would spend his life in endeavouring to show himself worthy of our forbearance. I needn't give you further particulars of all the reasons which led us to decide to hush the matter up, and let all the blame fall on Chambers; enough that we thought it the right course to pursue, and that I, for one, have never regretted it. Mr. Fowler has served the firm faithfully ever since; I have no doubt whatever that he is absolutely worthy of trust now. But, of course, he can never be admitted into the firm, that was clearly understood at the time, though when he entered our place it was with the idea of becoming a partner at an early date."

Mr. Long stopped for a moment, as if to give Ned the opportunity of saying something. But he did not take advantage of it.

"You see, my boy, the position of affairs," continued Mr. Long. "I believe Mr. Fowler to be a thoroughly trustworthy man, but all the same my duty to the rest of the firm does not allow me to treat him altogether as such. Mr. White and I were the only two who knew of his guilt. Mr. White is dead, so now I am the only one who knows it. I am obliged to act on business principles in a business matter. I am forced to see that we have a guarantee for future good behaviour in the sword which is constantly hanging over his head. Now it is for you to decide whether you will marry the daughter of a man who may become some day a convict."

"How is that possible?" exclaimed Ned. "You do not intend to prosecute him? Besides, can you, now that you have condoned his offence?"

"Letting that point stand over, it is quite possible that it may be discovered some day that he did embezzle, and it would not make much difference whether he were convicted or not."

"But how can it be discovered? Surely you would never expose him if I were to marry Nellie?"

"No; but you have forgotten the existence of Chambers. From what I found out about that young scamp I believe him to be quite capable of using any means to gain his end. If he found himself in need of money he would not hesitate to threaten Fowler with exposure."

"But he would convict himself."

"He would not be fool enough to apply directly. He would employ a third person, of course. He was a very clever young rascal; the way in which he managed his thefts proved that. I only mention this to show that there is a risk; I grant it is a small one, but it exists. Are you ready to chance it?"

"Yes," replied Ned firmly, "I am."

"Then, my dear boy, you have my full consent. If I were in your place I should do just the same."

"Thank you, father," exclaimed Ned, shaking his hand warmly. "Nellie shall never know a word of this affair, and I am sure that the link between the two families will render any further gossip about Mr. Fowler impossible."

"Yes, I know people talk about us," said Mr. Long calmly, "but you, at all events, know how much their opinion is worth. But now, my boy, taking it for granted that Nellie accepts you, how about ways and means?"

"I have enough to marry on," said Ned.

"Only enough to live in a very quiet way, my boy."

"I have no wish to live otherwise."

"Very well; my only advice to you is not to be in too great a hurry. Wait a year, say, before you marry. Nellie is very young, and so are you for that matter. Better have enough to furnish a home really well than to go to a house you can only half furnish."

"A year is a long time, father."

"Time enough, perhaps, to consider how long your engagement will be when you are engaged. When shall you speak to Nellie?"

"To-morrow, sir."

CHAPTER III.

NED decided that the best course for him to pursue now was to propose to Nellie at the earliest opportunity. This would be a sufficient answer to her father's letter. Mr. Fowler had stated that no objection would be raised by him, so Ned resolved to woo Nellie as if there had never existed, and never could exist, an obstacle to their union. Probably Mr. Fowler would never refer to his letter again; if not, Ned determined that he would not be the first to do so.

And now, strangely enough, when he saw his best hopes in course of realisation, after he had found his father's anticipated objections were non-existent, for the first time Ned did not feel quite at his ease about his prospects of success. He knew it was foolish of him, but, foolish or not, he took a gloomy view of the whole affair that evening. He could not help thinking of what might happen if Chambers by any chance should return.

However, he had gone too far now; he could not draw back even if he would. And he had no desire to do so. He had told his father he was prepared to take the risk, and so he was.

He left the office early next day and proceeded to Nellie's home. She was in; he was shown into the small but charming drawing-room which her taste had done much to adorn. It was not without some feeling of trepidation that he saw her appear.

The usual conventionalities seemed more forced than usual, and but few moments elapsed before Ned began telling her the object of his visit. He did not suffer from a lack of words, and as he watched her cheek grow red, and felt her slight form tremble, he wondered how he could ever have hesitated for a moment in striving to win the love of such a girl. He felt at that instant that, if her father were ten times more disgraced than he ever could be, it would be only an additional reason for doing his best to comfort and console her.

"You won't say no, will you, my dearest?" he asked earnestly. "Tell me that you love me a little; I will be content with that, for the present, at any rate."

"No, I will not say no," was her reply, "but I can't say yes—at least, not yet. I must speak to papa first. And you must talk to your father as well."

"That is all arranged, my darling, and neither of them raises the smallest objection."

"Then I won't," she whispered. "But I have been so afraid that this could never happen, because, though I saw you liked me, and I felt I was growing to like you rather too much, I always fancied that Mr. Long did not get on well with papa."

"It was all fancy, my dearest," protested Ned, who would not have let Nellie gain an inkling of the truth for anything. "My father esteems yours very highly, and I believe the feeling is mutual. At any rate, if you do think there is any ill-feeling between them, it's your duty, you see, to marry me, and thus help to allay the feud."

Nellie smiled; it was a great relief to her to find that her fears had apparently been baseless. She, as well as her lover, had noticed that the two fathers did not seem on altogether pleasant terms, and she had failed in extracting the reason from her father as Ned had done from his.

In the course of a few days the engagement was known everywhere, and congratulations were freely offered to both. It was generally considered a very good match for Nellie, but those who knew her well were still more certain that Ned had made a wise choice, though he had chosen no higher than the daughter of a clerk in his own office.

As the weeks rolled by Ned began to forget all about Chambers and the possibility of an interruption to his happiness. If he thought of it at all it was to laugh at his former fears.

But one day they returned in full force. One evening, when he had been dining at the house of his betrothed, Mr. Fowler asked him, as he was going, to stay for a few minutes. Ned obeyed, and followed him into his private room.

"Ned," began Mr. Fowler, "I have very bad news for you. You have behaved so well all through your engagement to Nellie, as well as in the manner you became engaged, that I feel I ought to tell you everything. A man came here this evening whilst you were in the drawing-room; he came from Chambers."

"From Chambers?" exclaimed Ned.

"Yes; he evidently knows the whole story. It seems that Chambers is in want of money; after having made a considerable sum in America he has spent it all, and is now in want. He owes this man some hundred pounds, and told him that if he came to me I would let him have it as the price of his holding his tongue."

"The villain!" cried Ned. "What did you do?"

"That which I determined to do long ago if ever that terrible business should come up again. I told him I would give him nothing, and that he might tell Chambers so."

"And what was his reply?"

"He threatened to expose me—to make my name known as that of a thief."

"But could you not buy him off?" suggested Ned. "Suppose you were to give him a sum of money on condition that he should leave the country?"

"It would only be a temptation to him to come back to demand some more; I have no hold over this go-between. There are two of them who know it now, if not more. No, I sinned once, and this is the punishment for my sin. There is no escape; I may as well face the worst now, as wait till I am drained of every penny, when exposure will come with the same certainty."

"But," pleaded Ned, "think of what Nellie will suffer."

Mr. Fowler turned on him almost fiercely.

"You tell me to think of that?" he cried. "Have I not thought of it night and day for the last twenty years? Has not my life been one long atonement for the crime I committed in my youth? And now, when I had hoped that the danger which had slept so long must have perished, to see it rise anew just at the moment when Nellie's happiness is at stake, is it not enough to make a man almost regret his repentance?"

"Forgive me," said Ned; "I did not mean to say anything to add to your troubles, but only to give an additional reason for turning them away from yourself if possible. Can we not work on the fears of Chambers through his messenger? My father would be quite ready to prosecute him if he had the chance."

"You forget that would incriminate me," said Mr. Fowler.

It was quite true, Ned had quite forgotten it. However, he had long ago made up his mind. He had chanced the risk; it only remained for him to face it.

"Whatever may happen, Mr. Fowler, I can assure you that it won't make the slightest difference in my relations to Nellie. In fact, if anything happens, it will be only an additional reason for hastening our marriage."

Mr. Fowler made no attempt to conceal his emotion. He pressed Ned's hand.

"Bless you, my dear Ned! I can bear anything if I know that my Nellie has some one to take care of her. But it will be a bitter blow to me to have her know what I am."

"No," cried Ned warmly, "she knows what you are; what you have been can be of small moment to her. If that man comes to see you again, I wish you would let me see him, will you?"

"If you like, but I don't expect him again; I gave him a final answer."

CHAPTER IV.

NEEDLESS to say Ned's thoughts that night, as he tossed on his bed, were not the most comforting. Yet he felt a certain sort of satisfaction, the result of the consciousness that the part he had acted was an honourable one.

The chief anxiety on his mind was about Nellie. He could not conceal from himself the fact that it would be a heavy blow to her should anything happen to her father. It must be prevented at any cost.

Why could it not be? The course taken by Mr. Fowler was a wise one. Chambers could make no use of his knowledge except in so far as he could use it as a threat to draw money from his former accomplice. But now that the threat had failed, what more could he do? To expose Mr. Fowler could only gratify his revenge, and it seemed impossible that a man could descend so low as that action would imply.

Thus Ned argued to himself, with not an altogether satisfactory result to his own mind. However, he fell asleep at last, wondering what the next few days would bring forth.

He found no opportunity during the morning of speaking to his father; he intended to tell him what had happened, though he did not see what he could do.

Ned left the warehouse early in the afternoon, in order to pay a visit to Nellie. He did not care to meet Mr. Fowler again till he had seen her, and once more told her that whatever might happen he would still be faithful.

He entered the garden by the side gate, as was his custom, and made his way towards the French-window opening into the drawing-room. It was open, for it was summer-time.

To his surprise Nellie was not alone. A man was with her, who was evidently annoyed at the interruption.

"Oh, Ned, I did not expect you so early," said Nellie. "Let me introduce you to Mr. Harrison."

Mr. Harrison bowed. He was a tall, rather fine-looking man of about thirty-seven or eight.

"I shall be glad if you will let me have a few minutes' private conversation with you, Miss Fowler," said the stranger.

"How long has he been here?" whispered Ned to Nellie.

"Only a minute or so," she whispered back.

"I think, sir," said Ned, "that Miss Fowler will not object to my remaining here whilst you say what you wish. I am engaged to this lady."

"I wish to see Miss Fowler alone," said Mr. Harrison pointedly.

"I am sorry I can't permit you to do so," was Ned's retort, "unless you assure me that you did not pay Mr. Fowler a visit here last night."

The stranger winced.

"What has that to do with you?" he asked.

"A good deal, perhaps. But don't trouble to reply; the servants can tell me if you are the same man."

"You need not ask," said Mr. Harrison; "I am the same."

Nellie stood in wonder during this conversation. She did not know what hidden mystery was under discussion. Ned took her arm and gently led her from the room.

"Now, sir," he said on returning, "be good enough to tell me the meaning of your intrusion."

"You need not get angry," was the cool reply. "I came here to see Miss Fowler, to try and work on her feelings a little, as I have failed for the present with her father. I suppose you know the whole story?"

"Yes, I do, and I've a great mind to give you the soundest thrashing you ever had for daring to force your way in here and speak to Miss Fowler."

Harrison only laughed.

"It would be a bad day's work for you all if you did. Perhaps, as you feel such an interest in the family, you would like to come to terms with me on your own account?"

At this moment the door opened and Mr. Fowler entered the room. He had seen Ned leave the office early, and followed him. He was not surprised to see the visitor, for Nellie had met him and told him that Mr. Harrison was in the drawing-room.

"I thought I told you not to come here again?" he demanded. "I didn't come to see you," was the retort. "I chose a time when I knew you would be at the office."

Mr. Fowler started, and looked at him closely.

"How do you know what time it closes?" he asked.

It was Harrison's turn to start.

"Oh, Chambers told me all about it," he replied.

"Ned," cried Mr. Fowler, "he has betrayed himself. This is Chambers, though he is so altered I should never have known him. You have him at last!"

"Have you?" retorted Chambers, who made no further attempt to conceal his identity. "Remember you are in the same boat with me."

"Not quite," said Ned. "But we will suppose that he is, if you like. Do you know what the result of your staying here another hour will be? You will be arrested as surely as you stand there. Will it help you much if Mr. Fowler, who will not be prosecuted, is dragged through the dirt as well?"

"You won't dare to prosecute me," cried Chambers.

"It won't require much daring," said Ned. "It will be done, I swear to you. So now choose. Will you stay here and find yourself arrested within an hour, or will you sign a paper acknowledging your guilt, and then go straight away to America? I give you two minutes to make up your mind."

Chambers did not take the two minutes; he gave in at once, seeing that Ned was in earnest. Ned drew up a paper in which Chambers undertook never to return to England, and confessed that Mr. Fowler's share in the embezzlement was solely to screen his defalcations.

Mr. Fowler in the meantime carefully watched him, trying hard to recognise in this fine, middle-aged man traces of the youth who had involved him in so much misery. Travel and exposure had, however, so changed him that it was evident he ran no risk in returning to the town where he had rendered himself liable to prosecution.

The paper was signed and given to Mr. Fowler; Ned handed the miserable culprit enough money to pay his passage out, and then saw him off at the station. That was the last he ever saw of him.

A month afterwards he was married to Nellie. Little did she think of the risk which he had run for her sake, and Ned was rewarded for his courage and sacrifice in seeing that his darling wife was able still to clasp her father's neck without a thought of how near she had been to sharing his disgrace.

Gone!

WHERE the waters flash and glitter
In the sunny gleam,
Where the song-birds chirp and twitter
By the silent stream,
Yellow gorse and purple heather
Caught the crimson glow,
As we plighted troth together
Years and years ago.
Once again my footstep lingers
By the vacant shrine;
Once again those slender fingers
Seem to rest in mine.
As the summer sunset flushes
All the lonely place,
Once again I see the blushes
On her pure, pale face.
Still the waters flash and glitter
In the sunny gleam;
Still the song-birds chirp and twitter
By the silent stream.
Love may bind, or death may sever,
Fate may bless or ban;
Nature's aspect changeth never
For the griefs of man.

CHAPTER III. "I, BERYL, TAKE THEE, JOHN——"

A HOT sultry morning. Not a breath of air anywhere—only a haze of burning sunshine, and a sky whose cloudless brilliance was like a dream of Italy.
